THE Canadians are not making very satisfactory progress in suppressing the Riel rebellion in the Northwest. There hav been some skirmishes in which the rebels hav apparently prevailed.

THE Nationalists at Dublin, Ireland, are said to be preparing for a hostil demonstration on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's return to that city. Something of a riot is looked for.

TROUBLE between England and Russia seems to be for a time deferred, but nevertheless it is believed that the war is inevitable. Preparations to fight continue to go on upon both sides.

RABBI STERN, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., committed suicide on the 18th. He had recently become a convert to Christianity. He had been previously known as somewhat Liberal in his views on religion.

EIGHT new buildings being put up in this city fell down one day last week, injuring several workingmen seriously, and killing one outright. Rotten bricks, mud for mortar, and cheap work were the cause.

THE pious James D. Fish, ex-president of the broken Marine Bank, and who is now sojourning in Ludlow street Jail, attended upon religious services last Sunday, and took a prominent part in the exercises.

THE anxiety about General Grant's health is not so intense as it was a week ago. It is now held that the disease may not be a cancer after all, but a bad case of ulcerated sore throat. The patient's health steadily improves, and he took a ride last Monday in the Park.

WALTER GOETHE, a grandson of the great German poet, and his last male descendant, died at Leipsic a few days ago. It is understood that he possessed a great number of posthumous works of his illustrious grandfather, and that he carefully edited them, and left them in readiness for publication.

MRS. AMELIA TOWNSEND, of Oyster Bay, Long Island, N. Y., died last week. She was one of the victims of the negro murderer, Rugg, who has recently been received into the Catholic church. If Mr. Rugg's conversion is to secure him a place in heaven, it is supposable that those he killed will not lose much if they died "unprepared."

ON Friday last two negroes were hanged at Camilla, Ga., for a triple murder; and Thomas Samon was hanged at Concord, N. H., also for a triple murder. At Thomaston, Me., two Italians named Capone and Santore expiated the crime of murder in the same way. All except the negroes are reported to hav accepted spiritual consolations, and to hav died in the faith.

MR. BURCHARD, the director of the mint at Washington, in his special annual report on the production of gold and silver in the United States for the calendar year 1884, estimates the production of the country to hav been: gold, $30,800,000; silver, computed at the silver dollar coinage rate, $48,800,000; total, $79,600,000. This shows an increase over the yield of the previous year of about $800,000 gold, and $2,400,000 silver. The total deposits of gold at the mints during the year amounted to $50,518,179, of which $30,807,200 was reported as domestic.

Papal Infallibity.

As Catholicism is assuming a prominence in this country, and is very activ in its methods of propagandism, we cannot be indifferent to its movements. Its bold and unwarranted assumptions will provoke controversy. Men of no mean abilities, American born and bred, are making their peace with Rome, seeking that repose which ecclesiastical authority professes to insure to the believer.

Prior to Pius IX. all important questions were settled by councils composed of the dignitaries of the church, as in the case of the councils of Nice and of Trent. July 18, 1870, the important discovery was announced, "The pope is infallible," and to deny this infallibility is to make oneself an alien to the one true church.

For centuries the Gallican and the Ultramontane wings of the church had coexisted, and no one was certain which was the real orthodox party until a council convened for the purpose settled the question by a vote, as laws are framed in our national legislature. How can we positivly know the pope is infallible, as this question was put at rest by a vote of the fallible members of the Vatican council? Had the pope declared himself infallible, independent of the council, and acted conformably with the declaration, a greater schism than that between the Old Catholics, headed by Dollinger, and the papal party might hav been the result.

Is it not singular that until July 18, 1870, it was not known whether the popehead was or was not infallible, allowing only the infallibilists are genuin Catholics? An assemblage of fallibles make the important discovery that their leading bishop is infallible! How many fallibles does it require to determin the question of the infallibility of the bishop selected by vote to act as universal pope? Even the pope was not positiv of his own infallibility until the council authorized him so to declare to the world.

In this case the old fable is repeated, the globe resting on the shoulders of Atlas and all finally resting on the back of the tortoise, and the tortoise resting on—what? The Roman Catholic church is simply an ecclesiastical corporation, its infallibility on a par with a railroad corporation or any other corporation which swindles the people out of their inborn rights. In the light of history, we ask if any monopoly known to mankind ever ruled the people more severely, as with a rod of iron, than has this ecclesiastical corporation? At most, are the prelates, or are the cardinals of the Romish communion, anything more than human, not excepting the pope?

Suppose a man but little more than compos mentis by hook or by crook should get into the papal chair? Would this elevation add to his intellectual caliber? Are we to presume that Leo XIII. is mentally superior to scores of archbishops and cardinals whose heads will never be graced by the papal tiara? Will the history of the popes from first to last compare any more than favorably with the Bourbons of France and Spain? Even the pagan Nero has scarcely a blacker record than that of Alexander VI. All the vices and infirmities of human nature hav been grossly exhibited by many an occupant of the papal chair, the characters of Henry VIII. of England and Louis XVI. being saintly compared with not a few of the vicars of St. Peter, so-called. Many of the old Catholic ecclesiastics perfected themselvs in the art of torture so that they hav never been surpassed in the sufferings inflicted at their hands upon the victims of their cruelty. It is this infallible corporation to replenish the exchequers of the church that sold indulgences for all manner of iniquities as a power claiming that whatever it bound on earth was bound in heaven, and whatever it loosed on earth is loosed in heaven.

From the time of Constantine to the present, wherever this ecclesiasticism has had the ascendancy human blood has flowed like water. Its boast is, it never changes. The tree is known by its fruits, and by its fruits we judge it. An American convert says of his church: "She holds not from the civil power, but from God, and is above, and independent of, the state. The state recognizes her authority, and protects, or is bound to protect, her rights with its physical force, if necessary, against any and every one who would violate them; or, in other words, guarantees her full freedom in faith, worship, disciplin, and proprietorship, and professes to govern in accordance with the divine law as she interprets, declares, and applies it."

To accomplish its nefarious designs an uncompromising war is commenced on our common schools. The intention is, if possible, to ruin them. Catholicism is a nation within a nation, or imperium in imperio. A religious corporation with whom before the duties of American citizenship its allegiance to the papal head at Rome takes precedence is not to be trusted. Infallibility! Who has discovered the infallibility of this purely sectarian establishment except its own blind devotees? The Anglican church, the Greek establishment, or the Mohammedans, hav as good grounds for assuming infallibility as has the Catholic hierarchy. If the civil power can be successfully invoked to enforce this claim, what is left the dissenter but to succumb, and establish his orthodoxy by consent?

To show the selfishness and worldly wisdom of this infallibility I will cite the case of Calvary Cemetery, Queen's county, Long Island. The church authorities purchased a tract of land comprising eighty acres for burial purposes at a cost of $18,000. It was made a rebellious act for good Catholics to bury elsewhere without official permission. The established price for a grave three feet wide by seven feet long was $7, and $10 was charged for the right to erect a tombstone. At the prices these graves and privileges were sold at, the sales would amount to $2,400,000. Deducting fifty per cent for gifts and excesses, the church would realize $1,200,000. For these facts I refer the reader to a "Controversy" on the ownership of church property between Hon. Erastus Brooks and the late Bishop Hughes, of New York.

Was any secular corporation ever more selfish in its acts? Was any human institution ever more assumptiv and meddlesome? In the Pantheon of pagan Rome there was room for the gods of different nations, and those representing different nationalities conducted worship in a way most pleasing to their habits and customs; but who ever knew Catholicism to be tolerant when it could crush out a heretical religion with fire and sword? Mgr. Capel comes to this country as the emissary of Rome. He would giv us a sunny view of his church; but her cruel and terrific history may be known and read of all men. The history of Giordano Bruno, of Galileo, and others, show that Rome is not, and never was, the friend of science. The ecclesiastics of Spain confronted Columbus with the text in the book of Joshua respecting the standing still of the sun and moon, when he would go in search of a western hemisphere. What hav even nominal Catholics done in the service of science, unless it has been done in the face of protest on the part of its prelates and higher officials? If, to-day, there is an eminent Catholic who shines in the walks of science, I cannot name him.

Men are trained and well educated for service as officials in the Catholic church, but a disposition is not manifested to educate the ignorant masses beyond a thorough acquaintance with the catechism. Nothing higher can the ordinary layman aspire to than to be the supple tool of his superiors. Does charity require us to believe the more intelligent of the priesthood believe in papal infallibility? We say most emphatically, no! As to the form of national government the church cares but little, if she is free to shape its policy. The czar of Russia is no more the enemy of a free government, which will guarantee to all their rights, than is the policy of that church which plumes itself on its assumed infallibility.

Inspired or Insane—Which?

A book has recently fallen under my observation which, I think, throws a good deal of light on some subjects which hav heretofore been variously regarded and little understood. The book is Dr. Henry Maudsley's "Responsibility in Mental Disease." In following up the subject of manias, and hallucinations, and lunacies, the author illustrates one phase of mental aberration by reference to the Bible. He points out that "in olden times madness was identified with the prophetical mania, and believed to be of supernatural origin." There was an alienation of the mind, he says, which was regarded as the result of divine inspiration, and there was an alienation of the mind which was the result of disease—a mania which was divine inspiration, and a mania which was properly madness, or possession by an evil spirit. Possessed by a good spirit, the individual was a prophet; possessed by an evil spirit, he was a madman. The author acknowledges that it was not always easy to distinguish one state from the other, some of the prophets of the Old Testament, for example, presenting symptoms which can hardly be interpreted as other than the effects of madness; certainly if they were not mad they imitated very closely some of its most striking features.

This is assuredly a novel way of accounting for the freaks of the Old Testament characters, whom all good Christians look upon as certainly controled by heaven; but that it is a reasonable explanation of them a brief examination will show. For a starter, take the case of Jeremiah. If this man ever lived, he was insane. In the thirteenth chapter of that part of the Hebrew scriptures attributed to Jeremiah we find that, believing himself under divine general orders, he procured a linen girdle and put it around his loins. He then took a long journey to the river Euphrates, hid the girdle in a hole in a rock, came back home, and again, after many days, repeated the journey, took the linen out of the hole in the rock, and what did he find? He found that it was "marred and profitable for nothing." The result of the experiment seems to hav been surprising, and altogether unlooked for, and he thereupon made it the basis of a prophecy. Considered as the freak of an insane person, the story is queer reading. Regarded as having a bearing on the present and future happiness of mankind, it is difficult to detect its relevancy.

Again, take the case of Ezekiel. He believed that the maker of the universe directed him to procure a "tile." As high hats had not at that time been introduced, it is supposable that this particular tile was a piece of baked clay, such as the Hebrews used to shingle their roofs with. It is the fourth chapter of Ezekiel that tells about this. He took the tile and decorated it with a picture of Jerusalem. Then he laid siege to the tile. He built a fort against it and piled up earthworks, went into camp, and aimed a battering ram at the tile. For a wall between himself and the enemy he set an iron pan on edge, from behind which he made faces at the tile and besieged it. For three hundred and ninety mortal days, Ezekiel lay on his left side behind that pan and bore witness against the tile. At the expiration of that time he turned over and lay for forty days upon his right side. Then his arm was uncovered, and he prophesied against Jerusalem. This is sufficiently idiotic, but the rest of the chapter overshadows it. Still the doings therein recorded are preserved in print as a part of the Christian fetich.

Another strange thing happened to Ezekiel. According to modern reckoning it was the 5th of June. Ezekiel sat in his house, and the elders of Jerusalem were with him. He tells the story thus: "And it came to pass that the hand of the Lord fell upon me. And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by the lock of mine head; and the spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem. And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there." Shortly after this Ezekiel prepared his furniture for moving, dug a hole through the wall, and carried it out on his shoulder. This action is hard to account for. We do not read that he was in arrears to his landlady.

The sayings and doings of Isaiah afford equal proof of his insanity. He prophesies that God shall "hiss for a fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt," and for a bee from another locality. These should come and rest in holes in the rocks, and upon all thorns and all bushes. Upon the same day the Lord should go through the familiar but remarkable performance of shaving his head and feet with a hired razor. On another occasion Isaiah loosed the sackcloth from his loins, took off his shoes, stripped himself naked, and walked abroad barefoot and nude. For doing the very same thing a man out in Iowa last month was properly arrested and placed in a lunatic asylum.

What Hosea did in the way of choosing wives according to the light he obtained from heaven is well known. Dr. Maudsley cites all these instances, and draws from them the conclusion that to insanity we are indebted for a good deal of what has passed in this and other ages of the world as inspiration. "There can be but little, if any, doubt," he observes, "in the minds of those who do not subscribe to the faith, that an epileptic seizure was the occasion of Mohammed's first vision and revelation, and that, deceiving or deceived, he made advantage of his distemper to beget himself the reputation of divine authority. The character of his visions was exactly of that kind which medical experience shows to be natural to epilepsy."

Here, then, we hav divulged to us in a scientific way the secret of those subjectiv illuminations which hav made prophets of lunatics and dupes of their followers. Having the thread thus placed in our hands, we should not be slow in following it up. Other examples immediately suggest themselvs to our minds. These are Moses on Mount Sinai; Saul the persecutor converted into Paul the apostle by a vision; Joseph convinced of his future wife's probity by a dream; Swedenborg establishing a religion as the result of epileptic fits; Guiteau removing Garfield—and his would-be imitator, the Rev. Mr. Bray, with a similar mission as regards Cleveland. Add to these Dr. Newbrough, with his book "Oahspe." Then we hav great numbers of men imagining themselvs called of God to preach the gospel. It is certainly eminently fitting that the call to expound the Bible should hav the same source as the "inspiration" under which it was written.

Maudsley mentions one of the less marked forms of the insane neurosis, examples of which are in no wise rare. He says of this class.

"One observes this tendency of mind even in those who hav no particular genius or talent; for they hav a novel way of looking at things, do not run in the common groove of action or follow the ordinary routine of thought and feeling. In regard to most beliefs they are more or less heterodox or heretical, though often not constant, being apt to swing around suddenly from one point to a quite opposit point of the compass of belief. It is a fact, too, that they frequently display remarkable esthetic feeling and special artistic talents and aptitudes."

This is the kind of people whom we designate as cracked, and one merit about them is that sometimes the crack lets in light. A great many public benefactors hav, undoubtedly, at one time or another in their lives, imagined themselvs guided by heaven; but in most instances it will be found that their good works preceded the era of their inspiration. Swedenborg is an example of this. He was a civil engineer previous to becoming a seer. Sir Isaac Newton, it is said, accepted religion in his old age, and philosophy gave place to fancy. Sir Thomas More was a great and good man until, his religious propensities sharpened by opposition and his mind weakened by age, he persecuted for the church's sake, whipped heretics in the name of the pope, and died a martyr to superstition.

Dr. Maudsley has done a great work in thus opening up this subject. He has cleared away, to some extent, the fog over the tangled mental swamp, and has given the vapors that hav arisen from it and clouded the human mind their correct name—not Inspiration, but Insanity. Having read this book, persons experiencing premonitory symptoms of divine illumination will not hang out their shingle as a prophet, but will place themselvs in the hands of a reputable physician. GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

Liberal Mugwumps at Chicago.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Although the matter is getting old, I must again ask permission to occupy a little space in your columns. As E. A. Stevens is anxious to eat crow, anyhow, and I hav misquoted him in relation to Charles Watts, it will be only just that I plead guilty; the words written were intended as a paraphrase of what I thought he wrote and had no business to be quoted. I suppose E. A. Stevens felt greatly relieved when he saw the original of his own statement, and was glad it was no worse, now that he sees various channels in which he can prove useful. Does he consider that Bradlaugh was all wrong and that the "severely sarcastic letter of Moncure D. Conway . . . deprecating Watts's position," was unjust? He says he confesses to being prejudiced against Watts, and that I was one of the sources of that prejudice. I will take the responsibility of that and accept the quotation as my own and thus leave E. A. Stevens an opportunity of proving himself no deadhead in the new deal. The gossipy nature of the rest of his letter is not worth dealing with.

As to the official communication, that is poor stuff, anyhow; it is full of mistakes, misunderstandings, and absolute torturing of facts, which can only be explained by supposing that it was written by one of the five who was called in and added on to the original minority three after the events had taken place. These five signers are they who evolved out of the minority three, who evolved into a lecture committee, thence into a board of directors, from whose body came the meeting of friends of the Liberal League, who called the meeting that passed the resolution in support of E. A. Stevens. The place to deal with their misstatements and errors is on the platform of the Liberal League before the people who are mostly interested, and if the League feels aggrieved they know their remedy.

There is one point they raise to which I will giv a flat denial, and that is that a "meeting of the League" was held on the Thursday before Spies lecture, at which meeting, it is stated, Stevens was instructed how to act. No such meeting was held at all, and there is circumstantial reason why it should not. The regular business meeting was announced on Sunday to be held at the house of Mrs. Swank on Friday next. What occasion for a meeting the Thursday evening? Why did not the friends so interested in the League work attend the Friday meeting themselvs? Supposing there was a meeting on Thursday, what right had they to direct Stevens how to vote next evening? And if, as they attempt to make out, the lecture committee alone had the power of deciding who should lecture, or whether any should lecture, what right had the Thursday evening meeting to decide what the lecture committee should do on the following evening, especially as neither that meeting nor the lecture committee knew, as yet, anything about Spies being invited? And why didn't Stevens say that the meeting of the evening before had directed his conduct?

This is the first mention of that meeting and explains much of what transpired since.

If any meeting was held at all it was a meeting of the friends of Stevens whom he had scared to death by all sort of rumors. Gorsuch had threatened to show E. A. Stevens up—had threatened to expose him and his methods, and Stevens got scared. He went round to his friends and scared them, and some of the ladies honestly feared that there was an intention on the part of Gorsuch, or Fielding, to blow Stevens up with dynamite. That is why they attended the private meeting on Thursday and instructed Stevens how to act. It is the reason they feared to attend on Friday. It was the occasion of the policeman's presence, and their solid voting against any of the ten signers of the impeachment being allowed to speak.

If there were twenty-seven friends of the League who were so agreed on the running of the League, why didn't they put in appearance at the business meetings, and why were they so dreadfully frightened to hav the facts of the case brought out, and why did they waste two hours to prevent the subject being discussed for half an hour only? As you remark in your editorial note, "if the members of the Chicago League had battered the common enemy with as much energy as they hav one another, who can tell what good work might not hav been accomplished." Yours truly, A. H. SIMPSON.

Canadian Notes.

Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham is creating quite a sensation in Toronto; he lectured again last Sunday to a crowded audience in Albert Hall on the subject, "Possibilities of Science." He was listened to with great attention, and approbation was manifested by applause loud and hearty. The subject matter of his discourse was full of thought and sparkling with suggestiv ideas.

Christianity is far too complex a result to be referred to a single source, least of all to an exclusivly philosophic origin. In order to become acceptable to the gentile, it felt the necessity of adapting itself to the current ideas of the times, of grafting the Alexandrian philosophy on the tenets borrowed from the Persians by the prophets and Pharisee doctors—Jesus, son of Sirash, Hillel, Gamaliel, and others—and on its legendary history put together in accordance with a few hints scattered through the Jewish records. All its dogmas, all its mysteries and ethics were adopted second-hand, for it originated nothing, neither the immortality of the soul, nor justice beyond the grave, nor the dualistic conception of good and evil, neither angels, contemplation, unity of God—trinity; incarnation, redemption, detachment from worldly goods, nor love of our neighbor. Hence, in order to understand this hasty and confused patchwork of all the mythologies, and all the systems, the starting-point of its vitality must be sought for further back, and beneath all these clumsily soldered accessories out of which it has built up a single system. But the most powerful among all the causes of the rise of Christianity—a cause in itself so potent that it alone and unaided was quite sufficient to account for the phenomena of the church—was that Christianity was a protest against an intolerable moral and social state—but a protest as radical as it was short-sighted. In the name of the oppressed, of the poor, and of the suffering masses, it hurled defiance, not merely at defectiv science, but at all science; not at any given philosophical system or conception, but at all philosophy; not at a corrupt society, but at all society. It became the absolute negation of reason no less than of common sense and of experience; it was Nihilism. But notwithstanding all this, the masses of the population of the whole civilized ancient world felt that the cause of Christianity was the cause of the poor and the oppressed, as against the rich and the oppressors. This cause alone working on its side is quite sufficient to account for the rise of the church.

A literary society in Toronto hav been having a long debate on Agnosticism. I hunted up the following authorities on the subject. The first is from Dr. Murray's London Philological Society's Dictionary, which is now in course of publication and will contain so vast a body of matter as to be more than four times the bulk of the last and newest edition of Webster. It will be the most voluminous and valuable dictionary ever published of any language. The second is from Ogilvie's New Imperial Dictionary, the most voluminous completed English dictionary, containing 130,000 words—12,000 more than the newest Webster's. The third is from Hunter's Encyclopedic Dictionary, now in course of issue by Cassell, which when completed will contain 150,000 words—32,000 more than the new Webster, and next to Dr. Murray's will be the most complete English dictionary extant. The order will be: first, Dr. Murray's London Philological Society's Dictionary, containing more than four times the quantity of matter in the new Webster; second, Hunter's Encyclopedic Dictionary, published by Cassell, containing 32,000 words more than the new Webster; third, Ogilvie's New Imperial Dictionary, published by Scribner, New York, containing 12,000 words more than the new Webster.

Dr. Murray's London Philological Society's Dictionary says:

"AGNOSTIC—From a Greek word signifying unknowing, unknown, unknowable, compounded of a (not) and gnostic (know). Gnostic is one who knows; Agnostic is one who does not know. An Agnostic is one who holds that the existence of anything beyond and behind material phenomena is unknown and (so far as can be judged) unknowable, and especially that a first cause and an unseen world are subjects of which we know nothing. ['Suggested by Professor Huxley at a party held previous to the formation of the now defunct Metaphysical Society at Mr. James Knowles's house on Clapham Commons one evening in 1869, in my hearing. He took it from St. Paul's mention of the altar to "the unknown God."'—R. H. Hutton, in letter March 13, 1881.]

"Spectator, Jan. 20, 1870, 135: 'In theory he [Professor Huxley] is a great and even severe Agnostic, who goes about exhorting all men to know how little they know.' 1874, Mivart: Essence of Religion, etc., p. 205: 'Our modern sophists—the Agnostics—those who deny we hav any knowledge save of phenomena.' 1876, Spectator, 11 June: 'Nicknames are given by opponents, but Agnostic was the name demanded by Professor Huxley for those who disclaimed Atheism and believed with him in an "unknown and unknowable" God; or in other words that the ultimate origin of all things must be some cause unknown and unknowable.' 1880, Bishop Fraser in Manchester Guardian, 25 Nov.: 'The Agnostic neither denied nor affirmed God. He simply put him on one side.' 1876, Principal Tulloch, in an article entitled 'Agnosticism' in Weekly Scotsman, 18 Nov.: 'The same Agnostic principle which prevailed in our schools of philosophy had extended itself to religion and theology. Beyond what man can know by his senses or feel by his higher affections, nothing, as was alleged, could be truly known.' 1880, Birdwood, 'Indian Arts,' vol. i, p. 4: 'The Agnostic teaching of the Sankhya school is the common basis of all systems of Indian philosophy.'"

Ogilvie's New Imperial Dictionary says:

"AGNOSTIC—One of a school of thinkers who disclaim any knowledge of God or of the origin of the universe. This school holds that the mind of man is limited to an a posteriori knowledge of phenomena and the relativ, and that therefore the infinit, the absolute, and the unconditioned are beyond all experience, and consequently beyond its range."

Hunter's Encyclopedic Dictionary, published by Cassell, has a definition similar to the above.

Under-Consumption.

Whoever will consider for a few moments will laugh at the theory of overproduction as a cause of hard times, in the United States especially.

Consider that our population increases at least one and a half million per year, and that most of this addition is non-productiv and largely consuming for a long time. Consider what a large proportion of our population is by position, age, and sex, or other circumstances, non-producing, though ever consuming. Consider the constant consumption by machinery, by the decaying tooth of time, by fire and flood. Suppose what must occur if production should cease for even one month. In truth it requires constant effort on the busy producing part of society to keep up the normal supply. When so-called hard times set in nearly all the people are compelled to economize; to cease from consuming in certain usual directions; to resort to expedients of various kinds. The farmers will feed their stock less, will even resort to feeding hay to swine, will use rye coffee, sweeten it with sorghum syrup, will patch up old clothing to make what they should throw away last a year longer, use benches for chairs, moccasins for shoes. This enforced economy, or non-consumption rather, plays havoc with manufactures and commerce.

The cause of this is the cause of hard times. And it is clear that whatever interferes with commerce, whatever prevents a free and rapid interchange of commodities, is at the bottom of all our so-called crises, whether it be loss of crops, want of money enough to effect exchanges, or a tariff that keeps out foreign imports brought to exchange for agricultural products. HOLT.

Judge Brewer's Approval.

I hav just laid aside last week's TRUTH SEEKER, feeling that the hour given to its perusal has been pleasantly and profitably spent. It starts off well by administering to the urgent needs of the Rev. Mr. Talmage a whole Peck—a Liberal Peck—full measure, heaped up and running over. Very good! Next time make it a bushel.

Furthermore, it is pleasant to note with what artistic accuracy and precision that editorial dynamite bomb is made to explode directly underneath the Independent's laboriously constructed fabric of logic and facts (?). The fragments will scarcely be found.

And once again. That cooling-off process applied to the irate Brother Applebee is excellent. By all means let Brother Applebee try his hand again—keep on trying; and if in his future attacks upon his New York neighbor he succeeds no better than he has in the past, by way of consolation he can fall back upon an excuse for his failure akin to that advanced by the tardy schoolboy who pleaded, in extenuation of his tardiness, that the road was uphill and icy, whereby he was set back two steps while he got ahead one.

And finally, not to spread over too much ground, how just and timely is the reprimand administered by "A. B. B." to narrowminded professors of Liberalism (for such anomalies it seems there are) who send on orders to stop their Liberal paper because, in opening its columns to free and fair discussion upon all subjects relating to human welfare, it admits some ideas which run counter to their notions! It is difficult to understand upon what theory such persons can call themselvs Liberals. It is certain that they hav not yet mastered the Freethought alphabet. Not only are they not Liberals, but they are pursuing the very course adapted to cut themselvs off from the best growth in knowledge and Liberal ideas; for it is my experience that as a general thing we add to our stock of knowledge more by reading the articles of those who hold views differing from our own, than in perusing the communications of those who are in accord with our ideas, and who but echo our sentiments.

Truth seekers should be broad, free, and generous—sufficiently so to accord a patient hearing to all who present their views in a fair and candid manner. The Liberalism which cannot subscribe to that doctrin seems to me to be sadly in need of revision.

The Liberal Club.

German Masonic Temple was not large enough to hold all the people who came to the 375th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club; all the regular attendants were there, and a hundred others came from some mysterious source. And if the audience was great, the interest of the occasion was greater. If the hall was not sufficiently capacious for the one, so words are inadequate to contain the other. The lecturer of the evening was John Swinton, who talked on "Social Organization." Mr. Swinton is growing balder and grayer and more bashful every day. He talks usually with both hands behind him, and when, after glancing at his notes, he desires to remove his glasses, he has a way of working the muscles around the nose so as to make the adjuncts to sight jump into the air in quite an entertaining manner.

Mr. Swinton went briefly over the various sociological schemes from Moses to Plato and Campanella and Fourier. Among these none equaled Moses, or "Moses Evolution." The speaker described the workings of trades unions throughout the country and the world, and gave an interesting account of the strikes and co-operativ efforts that hav been made recently. He was strongly in favor of industrial organization on the methods now adopted. It was not scientific, it was uncouth and rough, but it was effectiv. His philosophy resolved into two propositions—that man is entitled to a place to stand and work, and that he is entitled to the possession of the fruit of his hands. Mr. Swinton was frequently applauded, and at the close of his lecture the hand clapping was especially energetic.

Considerable amusement was created by the announcement that Professor Vaughan had lost a valuable gold watch seal. Nobody had found it.

Mr. Cohen arose to explain something that he had caused to be printed about Brother Wakeman. The hearers were unable to gather exactly the point of it, but it seemed that Mr. Cohen wished to say that if he had done anything he was sorry for he was ready to be forgiven.

Mr. Wakeman suggested that as it was an especial occasion the regular speakers refrain from exercising their combativ powers against Mr. Swinton, and allow some of the distinguished outsiders a chance. He mentioned Mr. Redpath, there present. The way this proposition was received encouraged Mr. Redpath to make a good speech. He said he would go twenty miles any time to hear Mr. Swinton speak. He had been disappointed in dealing with workingmen to find so many who were in favor of adopting violent measures against capital. There was no excuse for it in this country. If there are bad men in power it is the fault of the workingmen who voted them in. Only women and minors are guiltless of the wrongs in our legislation. Workingmen are in the majority, and hav the privilege of the ballot. Whatever they wish, let them take in a legal way, as they hav the power to do.

Mr. Wakeman was here so indiscreet as to invite Professor Vaughan to the platform, probably without being aware to what extent the professor was loaded. Vaughan said he didn't know what there was about his losing a gold seal to amuse so many people. He felt very sad over the loss himself, as the seal was a "momento" which his father left him. Professor Vaughan then wiped away a tear and made his usual speech. In the course of his remarks he quoted Ingersoll's words about giving your last dollar like a prince, but said he didn't believe Mr. Ingersoll practiced that himself. The professor has evidently been trying to tap the colonel, and speaks from painful experience. This orator's peroration was nothing less than immense. With Bombastes Furioso in the cold grave, Professor Vaughan has no rival.

Dr. Eccles followed and opposed Professor Vaughan's advocacy of force. He also took occasion to rebuke the previous speaker for the assertion that doctors were all quacks. For this he characterized the professor as a liar and a rogue. Vaughan jumped up and wanted to know whom Eccles referred to. The chairman told him to keep still and he would find out. The professor desired the doctor to come out in the street and say it. As soon as Dr. Eccles had finished his speech he went home and left the professor master of the field. Professor Vaughan is a Virginian, and takes umbrage on general principles at being called a liar and a rogue. He, however, is believed to entertain a lively solicitude for his own personal safety, and discriminates judiciously between large and small persons who are objectionable to him.

When the smoke had cleared away after the scrimmage between the doctor and the professor, Mr. Blissert was seen to hav attained the platform. He said the trades unions had done much good in England, but their measures were altogether too slow to keep pace with Mr. Blissert's ardent desire to see the workingman liberated. He believed in dynamite, and expressed his belief with considerable profanity. Mr. Blissert is probably the most religious member of the club.

A German gentleman followed, and although not doing himself full justice in English, he could pound the table as hard as any of them, and so got along very well. His remarks were addressed chiefly to Dr. Eccles, and that gentleman can hav little idea of how much fun he lost by going home early.

Mr. King spoke of the immense moral benefits of trades unions. There was no other organization in the world that so elevated the moral standard of workingmen and women. They were far ahead of the churches in this respect, also in mutual helpfulness. The large unions were bound to support the smaller ones, and readily did so.

Mr. Swinton, in replying to his critics, introduced the word "protagonist," which was well received by the club, and may become a favorit. The word "vastitudes," also used by the lecturer, will not be soon forgotten. As no one had criticised Mr. Swinton, he had no particular reply to make. He merely restated his proposition that every man had a right to a place to liv and the fruits of his labor, and added that the average workingman was not his divinity.

At the end of the lecturer's remarks, Professor Vaughan, having donned a high hat that was much too large for him, got upon the platform, and, by the exercise of some agility, captured Mr. Swinton's hand and shook it cordially. Mr. Swinton looked tired.

It has been a long time since the club has had anything like as exciting a meeting as this one was. Professor Vaughan has appealed to the chair to know whether it is the custom to permit one member to call another member a liar without something being done about it. It is probable that the gentleman from Virginia will prepare one of those "stinging answers" which he is noted for printing but never publishing.

Next Friday evening Mr. Chavannes, of Tennessee, speaks on "Happiness and Its Relation to Conduct."

The Tent.—Answers to Questions.

Will the Tent be waterproof?

Yes. The top will be of eight oz. duck—very best quality—warranted waterproof.

How long will it last?

Ten to fifteen years, with proper care. The only trouble is from mildew.

Could Tent be used for conventions?

Yes; and would save from $75 to $150 rent of Opera Houses, and enable our Conventions and Congresses to be held at more suitable seasons. With center-piece in, it makes pavilion 60x100.

Would it not need experience to pitch it and care for it?

Yes. I hav had ten years' experience. Every year, from May to November, always had Tent-master; any intelligent man can learn to care for Tent and all about it in two weeks.

How long would you hav Tent remain in one place?

Until work was thoroughly accomplished; a strong, efficient organization established; science school on Sunday, musical, elocution, and other classes, well started.

Here is the great advantage of Tent effort over all other methods. In halls, three to five lectures are the very most that can be given, because the expense is too great, but with Tent, we hav no rent to pay. Lectures every afternoon and evening (except Monday afternoon). Novelty brings hundreds who would not go to a hall. One or two lectures stir opposition, but do not settle conviction; the good seed sown is easily plucked up by the ministerial crows; but with the Tent, day after day, night after night, the work continues. Lecturer has not to hurriedly pass over important points, nor crowd so much in one lecture—half is forgotten. The whole gospel of humanity, the whole claims of Secularism, are fully expounded—every objection met.

How about discussion, or getting clergy to answer or defend their faith?

At every meeting giv the invitation on every handbill, hav it plainly stated: "Ministers, in good standing in their own denominations, are invited to reply and defend their faith. The free use of the Tent will be given any afternoon, or the first hour of any evening." This would force them to the front, or convince the people they had no defense.

Where to pitch Tent.

Those who most liberally contribute would hav first consideration. Liberalism prompts promotion of greatest good to greatest number, and rejoices at good of others, believing we find our truest happiness not in caring only for self, but promoting others' good.

Would not cost of moving Tent be heavy?

In ten years we never expended $25 in moving Tent, outside railroad freight. Wherever it is decided to pitch Tent, there is always interest enough to prompt some one to volunteer use of lumber-wagon to take Tent to or from depot, and on short moves, of less than ten miles, to carry it free of charge.

How could be it seated? Would seats hav backs?

Plank can be hired from lumber yard—pay for all used or damaged (which is very small amount); three planks stood edgewise, four feet apart, stayed by stakes driven on each side, plank laid across makes seats, then plank edgewise on seats—slight slant—securely braced, makes back to seats; no lumber cut or injured.

How advertise?

Hav papyrograph, or small rotary, and print all our own small bills, questions for ministers, etc. Paint our own posters to suit places and occasion.

How to meet expenses.

Voluntary donations and collections. In most cases a concert and ball last night before leaving; planks making seats, used as flooring, turn tent into magnificent dancing pavilion.

Would not Christians cut ropes, injure, or destroy Tent?

In ten years' experience, preaching doctrin of Seventh-Day Adventists, hated, if possible, more fiercely by the orthodox than Liberalism, having alike the saints and rough sinners bitterly opposed, never had a Tent injured one dollar's worth. Law is bound to protect our cotton meeting-house as much as the most stately cathedral. Proclaiming gospel of humanity we hav hearty good will of all but Christians. There is no danger.

It is time Tent was built now, if we are to take advantage of longest season. Remember, two weeks is sufficient to build up a strong organization of Liberals where now only two or three struggle along, but Tent cannot be had without money.

Suppose you can only afford one dollar—send it at once. Tent will be paid for next week, dear reader, if you will at once—now—right off—send your contribution.

The Tent is a private venture, not connected with the League. It will belong to those who contribute, and three trustees will be elected to hold it in trust for the contributors, and decide where it shall be pitched.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the next TRUTH SEEKER there will be a statement of great interest in regard to the Bruno statue, and a letter from the committee at Rome which incloses my official appointment to receive contributions in North America for this purpose. There has been some hesitation on my part in asking for contributions for want of these papers, but now I know that everything is right and straight. The movement has a reliable committee, and the undertaking has the approval of the Liberals of Europe, and the statue is designed to be inaugurated on the 17th of February, 286 (A.D. 1886). Let the subscriptions from America do honor to the great republic.

A Solution of the Irish Problem.

Dr. Michael Cahill last week sent to the school commissioners or New York city a sworn statement alleging that he is the discoverer of the fact that in the light of holy scripture he believes the earth is in imminent danger of explosion and conflagration, owing to the ice allowed to accumulate around the poles exerting unequal pressure, hydrostatic and hydraulic forces from these, the frequently occurring earthquakes and abnormal floes of icebergs.

In the hands of God he has made a discovery that will avert this dire calamity if properly applied; and save the lives of all men and animals on the earth. He asks that the board order Professor Compton Doremus and Professor Draper to examin and make report upon the plan, which is to withdraw rain and rivers of water from the atmosphere by art, thereby equalizing the presure on the earth's crust. A part of his plan is to send men up in balloons and tap the rain-charged clouds over the Desert of Sahara, let the water fall to the earth, and when it is thus changed to a beautiful region of emerald green locate upon it the discontented Irish of all climes.

ATTENTION is called to Mr. Wettstein's new advertisment of a Freethinkers' badge pin, a sample of which we find to be very pretty, intrinsically valuable and symbolically beautiful, but a trifle too large for personal adornment. Mr. Wettstein has manufactured the pin to sell.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the secretary of the League, Samuel P. Putnam, and of its president, Robert G. Ingersoll; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain.

The American Secular Union.

Such is the title proposed to be officially given at the convention in October next to the organization now known as the National Liberal League. During the present year this association has kept two duly appointed representivs in the field activly engaged in expounding and defending Secular and Freethought views. These gentlemen hav traveled by night and day thousands of miles, established numerous branches of the League (Secular Union) in the various states and Canada, and, what is of paramount importance, they hav carried a knowledge of Secular principles into districts where previously Liberalism had been comparativly unknown. At the next Congress, which is to be held in Cleveland in October of the present year, the secretary will be in a position to present a record of such practical work accomplished that will assuredly gratify every lover of progressiv thought. The battle with orthodoxy is a hard one, but it will be won notwithstanding. Opinions which hav been cemented by centuries of false education are not easily eradicated from the human mind, and the task of doing so can be the better achieved by determined pioneers when they are supported in their efforts by an efficient organization. The representativs of the League, having devoted many months to Canada and the Eastern states, are now in the West breaking new ground and forming additional branches. One of their principal objects this year is to learn the nature and extent of the materials throughout the country upon which the Secular party can depend, with a view of consolidating a systematic course of action at the coming Cleveland Convention. Before starting for the West it was my pleasure to see our president, Colonel Ingersoll, and to hav a long and profitable conversation with him as to the best plan to be adopted to further the interests of the League. From the following letter which I hav received from the Colonel, it will be seen that he is not only with us, but that he intends to take his share of the work before us:

NEW YORK, April 2, 1885.

CHARLES WATTS, ESQ., My Dear Friend: In reply to your last letter, I hasten to say that I intend to be at the Albany meeting in September, as well as at the League Congress in October, and which, as you suggest, ought to be held in Cleveland, O.

You know that when I was elected president of the League I was in California, and knew nothing of the election until after the Convention had adjourned. Had I known of the election in time I should hav declined, on the ground that I am opposed to holding any office whatever. But the Convention having adjourned, and fearing that should I refuse to serve my motivs might be misunderstood, I concluded to accept the position, and fully intended to hav a formal acceptance published in the Liberal journals of the country. Other matters diverted my attention, and procrastination accounts for the rest.

It seems to me that we can do something to unite the Liberals of the country, and personally I feel the greatest confidence in Mr. Putnam and yourself. Speaking after the orthodox fashion, you and Mr. Putnam seem to be the Paul and Silas of this movement. Yours, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Thus we hav glorious prospects before us, and personally I anticipate great results from the Cleveland Convention. Let all Liberals throughout the States and Canada do their very best to assist the League, now that it is in such a promising condition. With such a president as the brave colonel, we hav that which thousands heartily desired; it is therefore their imperativ duty to come to the front and lend a helping hand. Truly may we say, "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation," in the legitimate Secular sense. The officials of the League will do their duty at any cost, risk, or sacrifice, and to every reader of these lines I earnestly say, "Go thou and do likewise."

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President.

News and Notes from the Field.

The following ringing letter by Helen H. Gardener was refused publication in the St. Louis papers on the plea that the editors did not wish to "bulldoze" the clergymen. How daintily these religious gentlemen must be handled! How easily the delicate fibers of their theological constitution can be disturbed! A challenge to fair and honorable debate in the courts of reason is "bulldozing." A lawyer is expected to defend his client, and the political orator is expected at any time to meet his opponent in debate, but the clergyman can fall back upon his dignity so "childlike and bland," and cry out that he is "bulldozed," if one is eager to hear him defend the faith that he believes so necessary to the salvation of the world.

But the bright lance of Helen Gardener will not be flung in vain. The priests may crouch in the elegance of their superstitious temples, but the idol that they worship shall receive the trenchant blow, and the miserable weakness of these defenders of Zion shall be known to the candid and the reasonable:

NOBODY WANTS TO PLAY.

In Sunday's Republican I read, with much interest, and some amusement, a challenge to any one, or all, of seven clergymen of this city. to debate with Charles Watts.

At the time I remarked, "They will be entirely too careful of their reputations for learning to dare to do it. They will wait until he is gone and then their bravery and information will deluge the town and astonish the nations; but they will be precious careful to do it after he is gone." Now, how does it strike the Christians of St. Louis that there are no clergymen here who dare discuss in public the religion they are paid so much a year to expound and defend against the attacks of Infidelity and Agnosticism?

This gentleman from London intends to come here, at all events, and explain some of the false positions (as he believes) taken by these clergymen in their Lenten lectures. He is the peer of any man or clergyman in St. Louis. As a scholar, a gentleman, a moral teacher, and a man, there is no chance for an objection to him. It has the look of sheer cowardice (if no worse) upon the part of clergymen who delight in attacks upon Ingersoll and other Infidel speakers when they are absent, that now, when so fine a chance is given to act like men, and not simply stab those in the back who are absent, one of the clergymen addressed has "no time, because a church is to be dedicated" (!), and the others prefer to handle straw men at their leisure, behind a pulpit closed to the other side, where words hav no par value, and any wild claim or assertion is as sure to go unchallenged as if it were a mathematical deduction. No wonder people pretty generally begin to believe that the clergy do not themselvs believe what they preach. No other horn is left to this delimma but these two: sheer cowardice or insincerity—you pay your money (for a pew) and you take your choice. H. H. GARDENER.

An eager and applauding audience was present on Sunday evening at the Pickwick Theater to listen to Mr. Watts's criticism of these Lenten lectures. The audience was not so large as I hoped for, but the Liberals of St. Louis are so scattered that it is very difficult to reach them except by an enormous amount of advertising. In every large city this must be done, but the means at our commamd are so limited that we cannot at present do it. The clergymen hav their advertising done for nothing, but we hav to pay from fifty cents to a dollar a line, and such advertising as that makes the money fly. The daily press will not favor us a bit, and so in order to reach the general public it takes a large sum of money. This campaign work cannot be carried on in any narrow fashion. We must hav good halls—theaters, if possible—plenty of notices in the papers, etc., and success cannot be achieved in this direction unless there is a large treasury to call upon. If the Liberals of this country desire the advancement of their ideas and the education of the masses, they must see to it that enough of their wealth is contributed to the cause to enable its advocates to meet with advantage the organized instrumentalities of the ancient church, whose age is now the only argument for its support.

We had quite a pleasant time Sunday afternoon with our German friends at the hall of the Frei Gemeinde (the Free Society). The German Liberals are full of the scientific spirit, and giv a cordial support to our work, and they will be a very great assistance to the union in the future. We lectured at Belleville, Ill., on Saturday evening to quite a good number, and without doubt in this place a Liberal society can flourish. Here, too, the Germans hav done a good work in the past for mental emancipation.

The following notice of Mr. Watts's lecture in the News-Democrat shows the favorable impression that was made:

"Mr. S. P. Putnam introduced the lecturer after giving a brief outline of the work which the Liberal League is seeking to accomplish. Mr. Watts held the attention of his audience for over an hour. His Liberalistic theories and arguments do not materially differ from those advanced and familiarized by Ingersoll. but he handles his subject with great skill, and invests it with many embellishments of oratory and eloquence, for which he has talents of a high order."

On the whole, I am quite well satisfied with the work done in and about St. Louis, and although the present outlook in this city is not so brilliant as I wish, and there are many and great difficulties in the way, yet I believe that Liberalism will be a recognized power in this metropolis. It is fearfully orthodox and no mistake; and a cloud of superstition seems to rest upon it like a nightmare, which has a most depressing effect. Besides, this superstition is mingled with an immense amount of hypocrisy. St. Louis is a peculiar city. It has a combination of religion and immorality that is quite astonishing, and never in any place hav I so realized the utter hollowness and corruption of Christianity, and what a curse it is both to the intellect and the heart.

I was glad indeed to see again the face of Charles Watts, after his vigorous campaign in Canada, and defeat of the boasted warriors of Christianity. Even the brave Sexton was obliged to avoid his tremendous blows and escape the logic of his position by being an "artful dodger." Watts looked as if he flourished on his work, and I hope that my appearance was the same, for only by keeping our fleshly habiliments in good shape can we hope to conquer. I must confess, however, that I hav oftentimes been cast down, and the way has seemed very dark, and both bones and heart hav ached in view of the slow accomplishments of the hour. Let not those at home who read the papers think that all is bright and beautiful. There are times of utter homesickness, when only the faith we hav in the to-morrow can carry us through the bitter disappointments of the present. Amid much indifference and coldness, amid many rude shocks, and fierce opposition, there are friends gallant and true; there are faces bright as morning; there are words full of music; there are spirits aflame with progress—royal souls indeed, heroic, patient, cheerful, and ever onward-looking; and with these what courage we can have, what hope, what perseverance, and what scorn of the miserable hirelings of to-day who liv only for the smile of fashion, and sacrifice honor at the shrine of wealth and popularity!

From St. Louis we sped on to the famous little town of Liberal, out on the wide prairies where the breezes of heaven do blow and the spirit can drink in of the unbounded magnificence of nature. A few minutes we stopped on our way at Kansas City to see Mrs. Krekel, who is full of generous enthusiasm, and is undaunted by the many difficulties that surround our Western campaign progress, firmly determined that success shall come in spite of all. Arrangements are made for a course of lectures at Kansas City, April 25th, 26th, and 27th.

Well, I am glad to be at Liberal, that "godless" town so full of humanity—no churches, no saloons, no policemen. What a happy place! Here is where the Liberal can enjoy a truly blissful state. The broad blue sky is above. Like a beautiful ocean the prairies stretch away on every side. The soil is fruitful here. Corn is the great product, and next to corn, oats. This is not the wheat section, although wheat can be raised in abundance. It has many natural advantages for fruit-raising, stock-raising, etc. There are inexhaustible coal fields surrounding and within one-half mile of the town. The manufacturing facilities are not yet developed, but the materials are awaiting some good, live man.

G. H. Walser was the originating spirit of this masterful experiment. It is a solid success; but it has come by the strong will, the activ brain, and by skilful management. Indeed, I do not know that any man could hav put this thing through so magnificently as Mr. Walser. He is the Napoleon of Liberalism—a man of wonderful fertility of expedients. The Christians hav done all they could to defeat his plans. They hav resorted to every trick imaginable—to brute force even—and, if they could not succeed in any other way, were willing to make an alliance even with the devil of drunkenness. They would smuggle in a church under the wings of a saloon. But in every case they hav been overthrown, and this town of Liberalism stands in smiling triumph on the broad plains, and the light of heaven falls upon it without striking a single church steeple. Humanity is victorious, and the gods hav flown.

They hav two meetings here every Sunday. The forenoon meeting is especially for the younger and infant classes, where they are instructed in the things of this world. In the evening is held the general assembly meeting, where all are free to express themselvs. The Liberal school is well established under the management of Professor Grayston. The local newspaper is The Liberal, ably edited by H. P. Replogle and his wife, Georgia Replogle.

We shall hav more to say of this little town and its good folks next week. We lectured last evening to a crowded house, and shall lecture again this evening. From here we go on to Dodge City, Kan., where we lecture on Sunday next, April 19th. We shall be at Kansas City April 26th; at Chicago May 3d; at Grand Rapids May 10th; at Louisville May 24th; at Canton, Ohio, May 31st and June 14th; at Cleveland June 7th; at Pittsburgh June 21st; and Salamanca, June 28th. We expect to be at Dwight, Ill., Springport, Mich., Auburn, Ind., and other places, but the dates are not definitly fixed.

Ingersoll, as will be seen in another column, will be at the Albany and Cleveland conventions. These will be the grandest Freethought conventions ever held. Let all Liberals throughout the country make arrangements to come to one or both of these splendid gatherings.

C. W. Stewart has been lecturing here to crowded houses, and very successfully. He is an admirable scientific exponent of Liberal views. He is an earnest student and eloquent speaker. He has just had a debate with that "honorable man," Clark Braden, and completely demolished him intellectually—and now the sheriff has demolished this valiant Christian physically, for I understand he is inside the walls of a jail, charged with felony.

Mr. C. W. Stewart and Capt. Frank Green propose to take the lecture-field together—with a tent during the summer, it may be—and I hope for them abundant success. They are both able men, and can do a noble work in this Western country, and I ask the Liberals to provide them with the sinews of war, that their talent and enthusiasm may be crowned with success. Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Something about Agnostics.

"Necessity, thou mother of the world."—Queen Mab.

I beg the reader's indulgence to make a few remarks on what I think the inconsistency of those who do not believe in the necessity of a god or gods shirking the name of Atheist, and adopting the new and indefinit one of Agnostic.

The word is evidently new, and, as yet, without any standard of authority, and my only clue to its correct use is that of your contributors, and from which I infer that an Agnostic is one of those thinkers who, having searched into the origin and destiny of things by researches into physical science, and become convinced that nature is complete in herself, and capable of producing all the phenomena we see in nature of her own intrinsic energies, without aid or need of any extrinsic or supernatural cause whatever. This is the position of the Atheist, too, if I understand it right, but the Agnostic lacks the open candor of the Atheist, who, on the invincible security of his convictions, affirms, "There is no God," while the Agnostic, in the apparent weakness of his convictions, timidly concealing himself behind a doubt, encourages uncertainty by crying, "I don't know."

That this difference between the Agnostic and the Atheist is more in appearance than reality will be evident if we ask the Agnostic if he believes in the existence of angels, fairies, spooks, ghosts (holy or otherwise), and a legion of other "airy nothings to which imagination givs a local habitation and a name." He would no doubt answer without reserve in the negativ. Yet he could not disprove these any more than any other negativ. Is it illogical to deny them.

Ancient tradition reports the existence of a beautiful island called Atlantis, but which modern navigators, passing over every degree of habitable surface of the globe, can find no vestige of. Is it dogmatic presumption to deny that the island exists, and affirm that history is fabulous?

Again, has the Agnostic any reason to believe the Hebrew anthropomorphic deity, Jehovah, was less a myth than the Roman Jupiter, the Grecian Zeus, or the Scandinavian Odin? Yet he would think it no violation of sense or logic to deny that these were anything but the creations of human fancy to personify certain powers or principles in nature, of the causes of which the creators were in ignorance.

Now, I do not wish to cavil about a name, but if I am wrong I wish to be set right, and if I prefer a name it is Secularist, as one having no interest in anything but what relates to this world. But my most solemn, earnest convictions are Atheistical. I do not say this from egotism, for there is no merit in belief; it is the result of conviction, and conviction depends on evience, not will, so that one may be convinced against his will, and not be of the same opinion still.

Perhaps in this plea for Atheism I may seem to speak with the enthusiasm of a new convert, but it is nearly forty years since I took my first lessons on Atheism from Charles Southwell, that stalwart advocate and able defender of that unpopular philosophy.

Since Southwell's time the progress in society by the discoveries and investigations of science has lightened the burden of proofs in natural philosophy, and materially changed the mode of reasoning. It was customary then to accept the Mosaic account of the cosmogony of the world, and to trace a first cause through natural theology. This, of course, implied a beginning, which reason denied, for "had there e'er been naught, naught still had been."

Now, our learned Theists hav abandoned the arguments from design or natural theology as untenable; and the inductiv philosophy of all our modern scientific men seems satisfied beyond cavil that nature is unique, and continues to act of her own inherent energies and qualities, from cause to effect, through eternity, in an interminable succession—past, present, and future—in an unbroken chain. But these thinkers and philosophical reasoners who hav accomplished their emancipation from the slavishness of ignorance are few, while the mass of mankind will ever remain in ignorance—tremble and obey the gods their own fears hav made. On this belief in gods the whole superstructure of theology rests; and by the pursuit of positiv knowledge of nature's processes of force, with combinations and affinities of all the elements in nature, rocks, earth, water, plants, animals, men are brought into being as a necessity of natural law, without the gods; the temple crumbles, and with it sacred altars, shrines, sacerdotal faiths and creeds vanish, and "like the baseless fabric of a dream, leave not a rack behind."

To me there is nothing worth a thought in the whole range of theological controversy but Atheism, which, once established, ends all anxiety, and forever. The eternal future after-life must be the same as the eternal past before birth—nothing to hope, nothing to dread. In the glory and triumph of events in history long past I was mute as a stone, and in the conquests, achievements, and grandeur of the attainments in philosophy or arms in "the good time coming" I shall hav neither part nor lot when I hav "shuffled off this mortal coil."

Theists accuse Atheism of being a cold, bleak, stern, repulsiv philosophy. But the question is; Is it true or not? Truth often presents itself in an austere, uninviting aspect, but improves more and more as we become familiar with it, while fallacy comes smiling, is comely, bland, artful, shallow, and treacherous.

Theists and Supersecularists promis mankind a "mansion in the skies," and the promis has not gone to protest for the reason that "it is a country whence no traveler e'er yet returned" to enter one; only the Atheist protests against the promis to dispense mansions upon the authority of vague tradition, and in the face of philosophy, which denies the possibility of life beyond the grave. But if this philosophy has no mansions to offer her votaries, she compensates that with taking from them the dread of anything after death. To me there is a soothing sweetness in the idea that death is a profound, dreamless, eternal sleep, after the ceaseless cares and perplexities which beset and surround us through life, especially when the afflictions of age approach, and feebleness and decrepitude of mind and body take place. The desire for tranquility and repose relaxes the natural clinging to life, and death is welcomed as a benefactor and friend. J. B.

What Branch of Reform is of First Necessity?

I answer, the branch that givs vigor and validity to all branches. Of course, agreement on a briefly-defined answer is not possible. Since some people can work for but one branch at a time, a large number for but few branches, and since all branches need workers all the time, difference of views may be generally beneficial in times not specially critical. But in dangerous conflicts discrimination is exceedingly important. We are now under a complex crisis—several perils threaten, each fatal to general competence, to the liberty of constitutional legislation, of conscientious speech and duty, and involve the nation and future ages. In such epoch a decision as to which is foundation, which superstructure, which the essential division, etc., is of vast moment, and some years of labor in the all-helping branch are far better than one mad year of devastating dynamite, which will leave a population in no better ability to devise and maintain just institutions. As all efforts to arrest the greatest of menacing greeds, monopoly of power by concentrated wealth, and by conceding to creedal faith with wealth backing belief, hav failed after forty years of trial by agitating thought and conviction, while the greeds hav rapidly gained; hence it proves necessary to adopt action on a vital basis where decided character can be evolved, cultured, and empowered. The indifferent stupor of weak, narcotized, vice-tinctured masses makes them easy prey to tyrants skilled in arts that draw numbers and means into their control. These arts are ancient, historic, with modern elucidations; and it is not presumable that Freethinking scientists are to-day oblivious to the craft, to the disease-bleared subjects it readily captures, nor to the human stamina required to withstand it. The umbrage of supposed problems is a transparency. Reforms long since started hang in feeble states, scarce hoping to arouse energy to resist oppression, or to adopt self-security; and recent organizations seem, in the main, to follow their precedents. Who that has watched their workings with humane interest, and that has no fear of popular snubbing, will fail to declare that sanitary measures, physical vitalization, with its mentally and morally endowed adjuncts, are our legitimate, our only, resorts for private welfare, and strength of character for public protection? Only an impetus in this line can energize the various branches. Gain in power givs gain in care; so it is not so much a distinct branch that is imperativly called for as a method of empowering the people for true action in all branches, for self-sustainment, and strength of public courage to repel invidious appeals and influences, to take rights that can be grasped, and demand the rest. If restoring methods necessitate what seems a separate branch, only weaklings will hence object. Life first, then labor. A bridge pier differs from railing, but is the first necessity.

To consider a regimen of life to poise and qualify the system for varied labors, a minor matter always proved fatal. Our invalid nation is a massiv testimonial. Regimen is an underlying principle for all efficiency. A few, or a few hundred, agitators and advocates can neither achieve nor sustain needed liberties—a sprightly population is the demand. We cannot even teach a real love of liberty, or provoke a patriotic thirst for independence in the sickly victims of these times, stultified in nerve and muscle by constantly deranging habits. The best laws would lapse under their driveling abuse without spies, and with the present sinister hordes of them, ever on the alert, the needs of bodily soundness and moral integrity to obtain and hold fast dear justice should not be a new thought, nor the saying, There are no real men and women to-day, remain so nearly undoubted. Republicism naturally givs lessons not taught in despotisms, and we should not be slow to see that the profligacy and vanity of courts, introduced into democracies, corrode their vital centers, while corrupting the motivs and cankering the very flesh of constituents. So much of exclusiv taint follows the effort at equity that but limited success has obtained here, or in France and Switzerland. The tendency of demoralization is to oppresion. Weakness incites selfishness. An equable government needs a well systematized bureau of Lycurguses to supervise normal conditions. Half the means wasted on vicious parasites would endow such system. If the heroes develop, and a valid people produce a worthy administration, some new method of culture and security will be instituted.

In reading E. C. Stanton's speech given at the late suffrage annual, I find the same complaint of no available interest in the cause that comes up from other branches. She says all arguments hav been laid before all classes, and all hav apologies for indifference (a natural result of her and other public people's course). She says an ecclesiastic stated that motherhood was a limitation of equal rights. The answer she gave handsomely refuted his statements. A fashionable woman averred that her dress was a limitation. She did not dwell on that to refute, but evaded. She made some excellent strictures on the church martyrdom of the noblest of humanity, leaving bigots, cowards, etc., to transmit their kind. Apparently she did not note that a similar martyrizing process still operates, holding her, with legions, in a dilemma of surrendered powers. Fashionables are silent on knowledge of progress, inculcate falseness by their doings, and favor ignorance, to the detriment of all, in utter cruelty to the young. Customs and pressure of sentiments to compel compliance accord with and subserve superstitious schemes. The shame of the age concerning this is that those knowing the shams conform, thus teaching others to, and yield to tyrrany the power they are trying to recover; perhaps seldom thinking they pin their principles, and the principles of all whom they influence, to the inquisitor's stake.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

"Inquisition Most Complete."

At Nuremberg, in Bavaria, there is yet a torture-chamber intact, but, of course, unused. Rev. Dr. A. Wylie visited it recently, and recorded his observations. By way of the Secular Review we get them:

"We found ourselvs in a rather roomy chamber—it might be about twelve feet square. This was the Chamber of Question. Along the side of the apartment ran a low platform. There sat of old the Inquisitors, three in number—the first a divine, the second a casuist, and the third a civilian. The only occupant of that platform was the crucifix, or image of the savior on the cross, which still remained. The six candles that usually burnt before the 'holy Fathers' were, of course, extinguished; but our lantern supplied their place, and showed us the grim furnishings of the apartment. In the middle was the horizontal rack, or bed of torture, on which the victim was stretched till bone started from bone, and his dislocated frame became the seat of agony, which was suspended only when it had reached a pitch that threatened death. Leaning against the wall of the chamber was the upright rack, which is simpler, but as an instrument of torture not less effectual, than the horizontal one. There was the iron chain which wound over a pulley and hauled up the victim to the vaulted roof; and there were the two great stone weights which, tied to his feet and the iron cord let go, brought him down with a jerk that dislocated his limbs, while the spiky rollers which he grazed in his descent cut into and excoriated his back, leaving his body a bloody, dislocated mass.

"Here, too, was the cradle of which we hav made mention above, amply garnished within with cruel knobs, on which the sufferer, tied hand and foot, was thrown at every movement of the machine, to be bruised all over, and brought forth discolored, swollen, bleeding, but still living.

"All round, ready to hand, were hung the minor instruments of torture. There were screws and thumbkins for the fingers, spiked collars for the neck, iron boots for the legs, gags for the mouth, cloths to cover the face and permit the slow percolation of water, drop by drop, down the throat of the person undergoing this form of torture. There were rollers set round with spikes, for bruising the arms and back; there were iron scourges, pincers and tongs for tearing out the tongue, slitting the nose and ears, and otherwise disfiguring and mangling the body till it was horrible and horrifying to look upon it. There were instruments for compressing the fingers till the bones should be squeezed to splinters. There were instruments for probing below the finger nails till an exquisit pain, like a burning fire, would run along the nerves. There were instruments for tearing out the tongue, for scooping out the eyes, for grubbing up the ears. There were bunches of iron cords, with a spiked circle at the end of every whip, for tearing the flesh from the back till bone and sinew were laid bare. There were iron cases for the legs, which were tightened upon the limb placed in them by means of a screw, till flesh and bone were reduced to a jelly. There were cradles set full of sharp spikes, in which victims were laid and rolled from side to side, the wretched occupant being pierced at each movement of the machine with innumerable sharp points. There were iron ladles with long handles, for holding molten lead or boiling pitch, to be poured down the throat of the victim, and convert his body into a burning caldron. There were frames with holes to admit the hands and feet, so contrived that the person put into them had his body bent into unnatural and painful positions, and agony became greater and greater by moments, and yet the man did not die. There were chestfuls of small but most ingeniously constructed instruments for pinching, probing, or tearing the more sensitiv parts of the body, and continuing the pain up to the very verge where reason or life givs way. On the floor and walls of the apartments were other and larger instruments for the same fearful end—lacerating, mangling, and agonizing living men; but these we shall meet in other dungeons we are yet to visit.

"Here there is a vaulted chamber, entirely dug out of the living rock, except the roof, which is formed of hewn stone. It contains an iron image of the Virgin, and on the opposit wall, suspended by an iron hook, is a lamp, which, when lighted, shows the goodly proportions of 'Our Lady.' On the instant of touching a spring the image flings open its arms, which resemble the doors of a cupboard, and which are seen to be stuck full on the inside with poniards, each about a foot in length. Some of these knives are so placed as to enter the eyes of those whom the image enfolded in its embrace, others are set so as to penetrate the ears and brain, others to pierce the breast, and others again to gore the abdomen.

"The person who had passed through the terrible ordeal of the Question Chamber, but had made no recantation, would be led along the tortuous passage by which we had come, and ushered into this vault, where the first object that would greet his eye, the pale light of the lamp falling on it, would be the iron Virgin. He would be bidden to stand right in front of the image. The spring would be touched by the executioner, the Virgin would fling open her arms, and the wretched victim would straightway be forced between them. Another spring was then touched, the Virgin closed upon her victim; a strong wooden beam, fastened at one end of the wall by a moveable joint, the other against the doors of the iron image, was worked by a screw; and as the beam was pushed out, the spiky arms of the Virgin slowly but irresistibly closed upon the man, cruelly goring him.

"When the dreadful business was ended, it needed not that the executioner should put himself to the trouble of making the Virgin unclasp the mangled carcase of her victim; provision had been made for its quick and secret disposal. At the touching of a third spring the floor of the image would slide aside, and the body of the victim drop down the mouth of a perpendicular shaft in the rock. We look down this pit, and can see at a great depth the shimmer of the water. A canal had been made to flow underneath the vault where stood the iron Virgin, and when she had done her work upon those who were delivered over to her tender mercies, she let them fall, with quick descent and sudden plunge, into the canal underneath, where they were floated to the Pegnitz, and from the Pegnitz to the Rhine, and by the Rhine to the ocean, there to sleep beside the dust of Huss and Jerome."

What Has Been Done?

I hav been watching with a great deal of interest the result of the back-somersault performance of the National Liberal League at its last Congress. I hav been hoping a little (not much) that the most sanguin expectations of the advocates of the policy there adopted might be realized in bringing about a greater union among all shades of Liberals, and in an organic movement such as we hav never known. I hav thus far been disappointed in the "little hope," but not in the greater expectation.

It has been the history all reform movements in the past, I believe, that the moment any advocate began to move backward, or take more conservativ positions, that moment their power for good was gone, and some more heroic and self-sacrificing workers must move to the front to carry forward the reform. Will this prove an exception to the general rule?

It has now been seven months since the new deal was made, whereby most of the old officers were retired and new and more conservativ ones put to the front. In that time how many Leagues hav the three agents organized, and how many life and annual members have been enrolled? How many of those that the truckling policy of the League was instituted to please hav come within the fold? In other words, where are the Abbots, Underwoods, Bundys, and Spencers? Simply just where they were, only more so. They feel a just contempt for those who thus catered to them.

The small attendance at the last congress was not not so much caused by the place at which it was held being remote from any large city as it was by the fact that a large number of the Leagues and Liberals were disgusted at the policy that had been advocated by some of the leaders through our papers, and many would not go nor would the Leagues elect delegates. Especially was this true in the West, where most of the Leagues are located.

The most practical move the National Liberal League has ever made was demanding the repeal of the Comstock laws, which gave new and greater power to the church, and was the weapon it could effectually wield against the advocates of Freethought, causing them to be fined, imprisoned, and otherwise persecuted.

When some of the speakers at the last Congress claimed "the issue was dead," it showed they were ignorant of the condition or dishonest in their diagnosis of the case. The issue will never be dead until the law is wiped from our statute books—repealed; and at the present time anyone daring to advocate any unpopular truth is liable to be arrested, as those hav been in the past, by these irresponsible servants of the church. Comstock, in a lecture here, claimed the League was the worst foe he had to contend with. He will hav no hindrance to his success with its present policy. And yet, is there any right more sacred than that of exercising one's own taste and judgment in matters of art and literature? Mr. Watts says:

"This association is formed for the purpose of securing the secular rights of mankind and strengthening the force of mental freedom. To this end we aim to equalize national taxation; to insist that those who think they require religious instruction shall be alone responsible for the expense of its teaching; to abolish all government patronage of any and all religious forms; to do away with the farce of fast and thanksgiving days; to substitute affirmation in our legal proceedings for the present absurd custom of swearing; to repeal all laws that interfere with the free moral and intellectual use of Sunday; to show that high-toned morality is not confined to the Christian or any other religious faith, but that it is allied with our general humanity; and, finally, to protest against any advantage being given to a professor of religion that is denied to an honest skeptic. This, briefly, is the essence of the 'Demands;' and beyond these, as members of the Association, we do not purpose to go."

The church teachings that hav been crystallized into laws, making woman the inferior and slave of man, are not, in the opinion of Mr. Watts, of as much importance as the appointing of a day of fasting. He evidently does not think it in the province of Secular work to help loose the chains ignorance has forged about the limbs of woman, depriving her of rights which, when denied the men of our country, caused our Revolution. That matter is of insignificant importance when compared with establishing affirmation in place of the oath.

I am simply disgusted with such narrow views of Liberalism. If money is wanted, women are urged to giv of their means to help on the work, and are then treated as of no moment in other matters. I hav during this writing received a letter from an old worker in the League—I think a life-member—who has given time and money to the work, from which I will quote a paragraph. Dr. Abbie Knapp writes: "I feel every drop of blood tingle in my veins at the covert insults heaped upon woman. I hav seen the time when I should be just fool enough to 'immortalize my name' (bah!) by planking down $100, but none of that taffy for me now."

There are many earnest, honest, self-sacrificing men and women who hav worked for years to educate public sentiment to the point that has enabled a man of great oratorical powers, backed by wealth and position, to make money out of Liberal work, that are not in sympathy with the present policy, but, having the love of the Liberal cause at heart, hav kept quiet, waiting to see if any organic work would be accomplished, and are getting discouraged.

To be sure, Messrs. Watts and Putnam hav been busy lecturing—a good share of the time in Canada. How is that work to organize the Liberals of this country and change our laws? There are other lecturers working just as constantly and ably, with no fund to back them, for love of the principles advocated, that, could they hav the free advertising these gentlemen hav, would be able to rise to at least equal prominence.

And now a word about "our noble leader." Mr. Ingersoll is a marvel in his line, a comet in the Liberal horizon; a speaker that attracts more by his power to amuse than by his logic. He is wholly unacquainted with the self-sacrifice of pioneer reformers; in fact, does not believe in self-sacrifice, but in self-gratification; has never manifested any interest in the reform movements of the day, and if he has ever lectured upon the secularization of the state, I hav failed to see or hear it. He is simply a brilliant opponent of the Bible as a revelation and the superstitions of the church; an iconoclast, not a builder.

He has always made money by his lectures, and will not lecture if he cannot, quite in contrast with his predecessor in office, who gave time, money, and hard labor without compensation, when he could ill afford it, to the work. Were he now the president instead of the present incumbent, and with the wealth possessed by him, I believe it would be unnecessary for Mr. Reynolds to occupy so much space in THE TRUTH SEEKER in appealing for funds to buy a tent to popularize Liberalism. By the way, Mr. Reynolds shows he is young in the cause when he asserts, "In the past we hav so lacked vigor, persistent energy, and courage, that we hav developed a fearful excess of mollusks," etc. It was in the past we had persistent energy and courage. It was in the incipient stages of every reform movement that men and women took their lives in their hands, and worked for love of humanity.

It is the persons who catch on after the car of progress is under full motion—that are anxious about public opinions, and popular leaders—that are the mollusks—the unvertebrated.

Oh, for more such Liberals as Bradlaugh and Besant, who stood firm when others they had expected would stand by them deserted their cause; more Bennetts and Heywoods who would fight single-handed and alone, if need be, the combined power of church and state for the rights of free speech and press! Oh, for more honest love of freedom and less pretense; more devotion to principles and less time-serving policy!

Liberalism, if I understand its genius, depends upon no brilliant leader, is no man-worshiper, but is broadly humanitarian and democratic.

Fraternally, JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

The Feeling of Gratitude in Religion.

There are two indispensable conditions on which gratitude depends. We can't be grateful to the loveliest objects of nature; we can only be grateful to persons. The second point is, we can be thankful to persons only if we are convinced they intend to benefit us; a favor which has come, as it were, by accident does not invoke gratitude at all. We can only be grateful for the bounties of nature if we suppose there is a person standing behind nature—a person who causes the earth to teem with gold and grain, and has filled the mountains with their treasure—and that that person especially intends to benefit us. We must believe that the world is governed and arranged so as to secure our advantage, and that there is a special providence watching over us in particular.

But as the belief in a special providence is more and more fading from our minds, it would seem that the possibilities of being grateful for the bounties of the world must also fade. If we can only be grateful to a personal deity, or do not believe in one, does that not prove that our religious life is being deteriorated? And are we not, then, losing one of the noblest sentiments that fills, or can fill, the heart? We answer that we do not lose the sense of gratitude, but exchange it for another; the feeling of gratitude is being transformed into something higher and more exalted. We are experiencing, not the destruction, but the metamorphosis, of gratitude.

The difference between our and the old understanding of religion is that the latter looks upon the world as a finished edifice. The old religion says: "God made the world from the beginning. He fixed the stars in their appointed places. He created all the different species of animals, perfect and useful from the outset." We say: "The world is an unfinished edifice. It is still in the making; and we are here to help make it what it ought to be." That great thought marks a new epoch. That givs color to all and every one of our ideas and emotions. That indicates the profound change in religion that has transpired. We should use every happiness that comes to us as a means of advancing the world by our moral elevation. We are to be workers in the world; we may pause for a moment to take in the glorious prospect, and delight in what has already been accomplished, but only for a moment, to draw in fresh inspiration. And so the sense of gratitude is absorbed in a higher sentiment, namely, the sense of our privilege in being allowed to co-operate with the good power of the universe for its great and good ends. We must always remember we dwell in cities not as the inhabitants, but as workmen summoned into it for a time in order to aid in building it up. We may partake of the enjoyments it affords so far as is consistent with our services, but we must be ready at any moment to sacrifice our pleasure, and turn ourselvs away from our joys—yes! from our companions and dear friends, and go out upon the walls, and build and build in the cold and in the darkness, and lift the heavy stones, and bear the heavy burden, and build and build until our strength is spent, and our hands can do no more; until our term of service has at last expired; satisfied even at that last moment with the thought that others will continue the task which we hav but begun, and that the work which we hav completed will endure in the city of the Perfect, which the eternities will complete.—Felix Adler.

THE owners of the McCormick reaper works say they are unable to pay their employees living wages, and the 1600 laborers hav struck. A short time ago Mrs. McCormick gave $100,000 to a theological seminary. The Manchester Union thinks she could hav "served God" better in some other way.

What the Presbyterians Want.

Monday before last the New York Presbytery passed a resolution to send a petition to Congress praying for the abolition of Sunday mails, trains, and parades, so that a more strict observance of what these Presbyterians called the Sabbath might be promoted.

In the beginning of this century in Scotland the use of the fanning-mill for winnowing grain was denounced because "the scripture saith" the "wind bloweth where it listeth," and was held to be sufficient cause for excommunication from the church.

We do not see that these Presbyterians of Scotland were so greatly behind their children of the United States, as is usually claimed.

But one thing seems certain: if the Liberals of this country do not wake up, between the upper and nether millstones of Catholicism and Presbyterianism the liberties of Americans will be ground to powder.

A Christian Rebukes a Swedenborgian.

Commenting upon a recent sermon by Heber Newton on immortality, the Sun of this city said:

"The Rev. Heber Newton, in his sermon on immortality last Sunday, showed a decided predilection for the theory of Emanuel Swedenborg, that so much of man as survives death is an organized substance. The Materialistic argument against immortality is that the soul is nothing but the sum of the activities of the body, and therefore comes to an end when the body is dissolved. But if, as Swedenborg maintains and the Rev. Mr. Newton suggests, man has an inner structure, composed of finer substances than the material body, and liberated from it by death, then it is easily conceivable, even upon the Materialistic theory, that his personal identity and spiritual activity may continue. Of course, whether such an inner structure exists and survives may still be disputed, but it is the only assumption by which immortality can be scientifically defended. Mr. Newton does well to adopt this idea of Swedenborg's."

This theory, we may say in passing, was held by D. M. Bennett, though he did not derive it from Swedenborg, having thought it out for himself.

But Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, is too strict a theologian to adopt any such Materialistic Spiritualism. "Suppose," he asks, "that this inner structure is set free at death, can its existence be proved? Did anyone ever see it? Can anyone find it, or any trace of it? It is an assumption without proof. To fancy that 'immortality can be scientifically defended' upon an assumption which science cannot establish shows an utter want of apprehension of the meaning of 'science' as used by the Materialists and by all who think in the plane of natural science."

Mr. Buckley is emphatic in his denial of the assertion of some theologians that there is any "scientific proof" of the truth of Christianity, of the being of God, of the inspiration of the Bible, of immortality, of the efficacy of prayer, of the existence of the soul, etc. "There can be," he positivly asserts, "no scientific proof of any of them. They are all assumptions resting on the revelation of God and its harmony with the yearnings and the needs of the human soul. 'Where science ends, faith begins.' The man without faith and without a devotional spirit cannot be convinced of these things."

When Christianity is accepted by faith, Mr. Buckley thinks that "many analogies with it may be found in nature, but no scientific proof, for," quotes he, "we walk by faith, not by sight;" and "our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hav entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Fortified thus impregnably by scripture, the Methodist logician continues: "Go not, then, with natural science, to the Materialist, or the skeptic of any grade, to convince him of immortality. Especially go not to him with the dreams of Swedenborg to scientifically prove immortality. He will but hav you in derision, and most justly. . . . The most effectual way of promoting unbelief among those of average or superior intelligence is to attempt to prove Christianity scientifically. Those not trained to think may seem to yield to an array of scientific facts, and inferences drawn from them, but unless they hav an inward experience of the grace of God their faith will be at the mercy of the next learned or plausible skeptic or Infidel into whose hands they may fall."

While we must admire the consistent logic of Mr. Buckley, we cannot help wondering how he expects sensible people to become Methodists after reading his editorial. Does he think full-grown men and women will become as little children, and accept his faith as a child believes in Santa Claus, solely upon the word of an elder? If he does he must hav a very poor opinion of the intellectual attainments of the people. Mr. Buckley has reasoned himself into a well up the side of which he will hav great difficulty in climbing. He is in sorer need of a Jacob's ladder than the angels of old. For they had wings.

Priests on Strike.

In 1884 Bulgaria gave the ministers $160,000. This year the Minister of Public Worship informed the clergy that they must look to their parishioners for their pay, as the government was too poor to vote the annual stipend. Thereu pon the ministers struck, refusing to hold church services, baptize, perform marriage ceremonies, or preach funeral sermons.

To superstitious Christians, like the Bulgarian peasantry, this is a serious deprivation, though a self-reliant, common-sense population would promptly tell the priests to go to hades—that they, the people, could liv without churches as long as the clergy could exist without collecting tithes. But the Bulgarians are not up to this point, and the clergy will probably force them to pay tithes unless the government recedes from the position taken.

What strikes the outsider as most significant in this affair is the mercenary spirit displayed by the clergy. One would think that if they were honest in their professions, they could never be so heartless as to imperil the eternal happiness of their parishioners by refusing to administer the sacraments. Their action shows that they regard their calling in the light of a trade or profession, from which they are to obtain all possible pecuniary benefits, and which binds them to nothing but to return so many genuflexions and sermons for so much hard cash. In polite language, they are members of a profession in the practice of which they earn their livelihood. In plainer words, they are swindling impostors.

Mrs. Severance and the League.

Our energetic and radical friend, Mrs. Severance, has on another page some energetic and radical remarks concerning the National Liberal League and its leaders.

We think Mrs. Severance is a trifle premature in her criticism of the League, and somewhat in error in her estimate of what has been done. The report of the officers of the League for the year 1883 was:

Twenty-three new auxiliaries.
Ten life-members.
Two hundred and forty-six annual members.

For 1884, under the same officers and the same policy, the exhibit was:

Seven new Leagues.
Three life-members.
One hundred and twenty-three annual members.
Total cash received, $309.50.

No lecturers were kept in the field during either of these years, and the paper Man was supported almost entirely by two or three individuals. The League was practically dead. If Mrs. Severance wishes to know just how dead, let her ask the chairman of the executiv committee. Under the new management three lecturers hav been at work almost continuously, many new societies formed in the States and Canada, and nearly $4,000 contributed and pledged. We think this is quite an improvement upon last year, and an overwhelming evidence of the approval of the Liberals of the country.

Mrs. Severance asserts the reason why the last Congress was not more fully attended to hav been the dissatisfaction of the Western Leagues with the policy advocated by some of the National League leaders. This is not the case. With the exception of Milwaukee, and perhaps one or two other places, there were no live Leagues to send delegates. This is the long and short of the matter, and we refer Mrs. Severance to Mr. Reynolds (who attempted to correspond with the secretary of every auxiliary upon the secretary's list,) for any further information she may want.

We also think that Mrs. Severance and Mrs. Knapp will hav great difficulty in pointing out any insult heaped upon woman by the League. It is true that "woman's rights" is not one of the Nine Demands, but the League admits to membership men and women upon equal terms, and givs them equal voice in the managements of its affairs. Could it do more without changing the constitution? The League was organized for the specific purpose of secularization of our government. Those persons who find fault with it for not going outside of its charter are unreasonable. Once begin to take on new issues and when would the loading stop?

Touching Colonel Ingersoll, Mrs. Severance is very far astray. He did not ask for the presidency of the League, and now that he has accepted it, that the work may not be impeded by any action of his, it is in the very worst possible taste to slur him as Mrs. Severance does by her quotation of "our noble leader." Whether Mr. Ingersoll believes in self-sacrifice or not, we know he lectured for years in the West and footed his own bills. We know, too, that he could hav been governor of Illinois had he been willing to keep his opinions to himself. We know, too, that he has been outspoken upon secularization of our government, having heard him in the Hayes and Tilden campaign, in political speeches, and also in his lectures in this city. Mrs. Severance's criticisms are, we think, based upon inadequate knowledge.

And finally, we think Mrs. Severance would hav done better if she had waited longer before throwing a stone in the way of the League. The paths of the workers cannot be likened to rose-strewn roads, unless such thorns as she has planted may make the simile. Let her possess her soul in patience, and see what she will see. Rome was not built in a day.

Pilate as a Reporter.

The Chronicle, published at La Moure, Dak., has been imposed upon, and led to publish a document purporting to be a translation of a report made in Latin by Pontius Pilate to Tiberius Cæsar concerning the crucifixion of Jesus, which is a very clumsy canard. Aside from its sensational style, betraying the pen of the modern newspaper reporter or dime novel writer, there are evidences of its fabrication in almost every paragraph.

It represents Pilate arriving at Jerusalem with "but a single centurion, and a handful of soldiers." This is a flat contradiction of the Jewish historian, Josephus. Pilate became procurator of Judea in the year 25 or 26, and his first act was to remove the army from Cesarea to Jerusalem in order to abolish the Jewish laws. The removal was made at night, without the knowledge of the Jews. At no time during Pilate's administration did he lack soldiers to overawe the Jews, and on one occasion a great number of seditious Jews were slain (Jos. Ant. xviii, 3).

The forger of the document, after describing the darkness on the day of the crucifixion, betrays his ignorance by saying: "It was likewise toward the Ides of March." The Ides were reckoned backward from April 1st inclusiv, so that the Ides of March (numbering seventeen) began March 16th. Now that was too early for the Passover by at least ten days; the festival never occurred before the 26th of March.

Another most palpable evidence of forgery is this statement:

"Dionysius, the Areopagite, is reported to hav exclaimed: 'Either the author of nature is suffering, or the universe is falling apart.'"

When Paul visited Athens, which was at least twenty years after the crucifixion, Dionysius, the Areopagite, became one of his converts (Acts xvii, 34). The same Dionysius is said to hav become the first bishop of Athens, and the Roman Catholics claim that he was the famous St. Denis who first converted France (Note to English translation of Latin Vulgate).

The Catholic church invented a history of Dionysius, in which it is said that he was in Egypt when the crucifixion happened, and observing the eclipse that accompanied it at full moon, exclaimed: "Either God himself is suffering, or he sympathizes with some one who is suffering" (Chambers's Encyclopedia). From this fabricated history the forger of the modern Report of Pilate drew the above exclamation, which Pilate is said to hav written down "on the same night that followed the fatal catastrophe"—as if Dionysius was in Jerusalem, or his exclamation had been telegraphed from Egypt!

This report of Pilate is said to hav been filed in the Roman archives by Pilate himself soon after the crucifixion, and to hav remained undiscovered until recently, when an unknown German is said to hav been favored by the librarian of the Vatican with a copy of it, and the unknown German is said to hav transmitted it to an unknown clergyman of St. Louis, at the latter's request. Then a Baptist Home Missionary, the Rev. I. W. Wilkinson, somehow gets a copy of it, and embodies it in a sermon preached at La Moure, Dakota, Feb. 22, 1885.

In vol. xvi, of the Antenicene Christian Library, published about ten years ago, will be found the "Acts of Pilate," translated from various Greek and Latin versions of an early date—as early as the time of Tertullian, who refers to it in his "Apology"—i. e. if he wrote the "Apology," which is doubtful. And the same document probably existed in some form when Justin Martyr referred to it about A.D. 150. The document, as it has come down to us, is doubtless greatly enlarged and altered. Smith's Bible Dictionary, and other Christian authorities, pronounce it certainly spurious.

The same volume of the Antenicene Christian Library contains also, "Pilate's Letter to Tiberius Cæsar," "The Report of Pilate" (both quite different from the pretended recently discovered report), "The Death of Pilate," "The Narrativ of Joseph" (of Arimethea), etc., all early forgeries.

There is no evidence of any real Report of Pilate made to Tiberius Cæsar concerning the crucifixion; and the references to the "Acts of Pilate," by Justin A.D. 150, and by Tertullian A.D. 200 (if genuin), repeated by Eusebius A.D. 325, are doubtless all taken from the ancient document which learned Christian scholars pronounced spurious. And the pretended recently discovered document is as certainly a modern fabrication as the Book of Mormon.

Sectional Liberalism.

A writer signing himself "Independent Thinker" in Mr. Shaw's Independent Pulpit for April says:

"I hav lately had the privilege of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, a weekly journal devoted to Freethought and reform, and published in the city of New York. I hav been much pleased with it, except in one particular. Some of the correspondence, as also some of the editorial matter, exhibits the writers as being deeply imbued with a spirit of bitterness toward the people of the South, and especially by referring to the action of those who went into the late rebellion."

Mr. Shaw indorses this as follows:

"The criticism on THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be found in another column of this issue, is, we think, in very good place. Liberals should now work for a spirit of fraternity that knows no North, no South, no East, or West. Let us love one another and seek the unity that comes by the spirit of peace. Slavery is not an issue now, and the war has been ended. Let us be as liberal as possible, and not spring questions that hav been settled."

After his opening, "Independent Thinker" proceeds with a short essay, in the course of which he quotes the sentences from THE TRUTH SEEKER upon which he relies to prove his charge. They are:

"A correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER says Thomas Paine was an Abolitionist. Another says: 'It will take years of toiling and waiting before the South is intellectually free. She is delivered from the system of slavery which sat upon her interests like an incubus. . . The religion of the colored people is but little removed from the fetichism of their African ancestors; and that of the majority of the white people is not much better.' Another correspondent says: 'One hundred years from now old John Brown will be looked upon as a second savior.' Another, speaking of H. Luse, says: 'He was born a radical Abolitionist, and so he has good blood in him for reform.' Another says: 'All the old Abolitionists are now Liberals.'"

This is the sum total of his evidence that "exhibits the writers as being deeply imbued with a spirit of bitterness toward the people of the South." Our "Independent Thinker" says Paine was not regarded as an Abolitionist by those favoring slavery. How does he reconcile this with Paine's emphatic statement that "man has no property in man?" And where is the error in the assertion that it will take years of toiling and waiting before the South is intellectually free? Everybody knows who has traveled or resided in the South that that section is a long way behind the East and West in development, both physically and mentally. And supposing the statement to be an error, in what way does it show anything but a mistake in judgment regarding the country? Also, everyone knows the gross and degrading superstition in which the negroes are steeped, not excepting those of the Methodist persuasion. Whether John Brown will will ever be looked upon as a savior, however, is only a matter of prophecy, and prophesying is at best but doubtful business. Our opinion is that this particular prophecy is not likely to be fulfilled.

Mr. Putnam's statement that a person "born of a radical Abolitionist has good blood in him for a reformer" is very true. Blood will tell, and heredity is a potent factor in evolution. Though Captain Putnam led a company of colored troops to the war, we know he has no surviving animosity against his former enemies. His heart is too large for that. He has long since laid aside the sword, and now preaches and livs the gospel of humanity, which knows, as the Fourth of July orators say, no North, no South, no East, no West, but one undivided country, glorious, prosperous, and free, from the woods of Maine to the Golden Gate—from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

Our remark that "all the old Abolitionists are now Liberals," was in response to an inquiry, and is strictly true, with not the slightest shade of sectionalism concealed therein. Though a soldier's grave at Manassas Junction is a sacred spot, we hav no hatred of the foemen who took a father's life. All fought for what they considered right. The cry against the South, raised even now by certain political papers, is, in our opinion, not only totally unfounded, but criminally unwise as regards the future of the United States. Let the dead past bury its dead. We believe that, with the exception of a few of the older generation, the people south of Mason and Dixon's line are glad that slavery has been abolished, and are willing to forget and forgiv, and strive now as mightily as their Northern brethren for the upbuilding of the common republic. And certainly Liberals should be among the first to help heal the wounds of war, and we believe they are. There is more tolerance expressed by the old soldiers and the old Abolitionists than by those who never went to war, or the politicians who profited by the war, and would profit by a continuance of the sectional feeling. We are sure that our "Independent Thinker" has drawn wrong conclusions from premises wholly insufficient. Let the Liberal South hold out her hand, and the Liberal North will leap clear across the bloody chasm to grasp it.

An Eminent Blunderer.

A writer in a late issue of the Investigator says:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER prefers advocating the stupid and lying assertion that 'man has no rights—only the duties of obedience,' and aims at usurping a secular power over the masses of mankind equal to that of the Catholic, Protestant, and all the other rellgions among mankind, by substituting one of 'humanity.'"

We will giv a small reward to this gentleman if he can find any utterances corresponding to this sentiment in any of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S teachings, there being two good reasons why it should not appear—it is not the doctrin of Positivism, and, if it were, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is not a Positivist. The critic speaks not merely from insufficient knowledge, but in absolute and stupid ignorance.

Lectures and Meetings.

E. C. WALKER spoke at Frankfort, Kan., April 15th and 16th. He will remain two weeks longer in northern Kansas, and will then proceed north through southeastern Nebraska and thence by the valley of the Elkhorn, and from there into northwestern Iowa. Later in the season he will visit Dakota and Minnesota. For lectures, etc., address him at Valley Falls, Kan.

W. F. JAMIESON is addressing good audiences in Elk Point, Dakota. At his fifth lecture, Sunday evening, April 5th, there was the largest audience of all, many remarking that the churches must be decimated, judging from the attendance at the Freethought lecture. The preachers preached against Jamieson that day viciously.

THURSDAY evening, April 23d, there will be a meeting of the Institute of Heredity at Dr. Foote's house, 120 Lexington avenue. Albert Chavannes will address the members. All interested are invited to attend.

Editorial Notes.

A FEW weeks since Rev. W. M. Walton, of Owosso, Mich., "answered" Colonel Ingersoll in the Detroit Post, in which "answer" he asserted that at one time Colonel Ingersoll had been completely demolished by "the great Theodore Parker." Inasmuch as Theodore Parker had been dead some twenty years before Mr. Ingersoll delivered the lecture said to hav been rendered innocuous by Mr. Parker, we animadverted upon the anachronism in a paragraph in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Walton writes us to say that he meant Joseph Parker, D.D., of the City Temple, London, whose answer was reprinted in the Homiletic Monthly of September, October, and November, 1881. It is fair to the Rev. Mr. Walton to say that in the number of that periodical of that date there is a "reply" to Colonel Ingersoll by a man of that name. But it is not explained how the Detroit Post printers could hav been so stupid as to mistake Mr. Walton's Joseph for Theodore.

ONE of Mr. Cleveland's diplomatic appointments has created not a little agitation in religious circles, and, from the facts so far made public, not without cause. A Mr. Keiley, of Richmond, has his commission as minister to Rome. The Republican of Baltimore says his sponsors were Archbishop Gibbons, of Baltimore, and R. T. Merrick, of this city. Mr. Merrick is a recent Catholic convert of Mgr. Capel's, and the real sponsors of Mr. Keiley are, therefore, presumed to be the archbishop and Mgr. Capel. The objection to Mr. Keiley is that in a speech at Richmond he inveighed against Victor Emanuel and the Italian government for dispossessing the pope of his temporal power, and it is feared the Italian king may object to receiving him as a representativ of the United States. As a primate of the Catholic church Archbishop Gibbons is naturally anxious that Mr. Astor's successor would be a gentleman identified with the church, for the reason that questions relating to the property of American Catholics in Rome hav arisen of late requiring the attention of our minister there. The constant threats of confiscation by the Italian government brought about a successful remonstrance from President Arthur, through Ministor Astor. For reasons which appeared eminently diplomatic to the president, Mr Keiley was appointed and confirmed. His utterances against the occupation of Rome by Victor Emanuel are now generally known, but Mr. Keiley says that he will tell the king that he has said (having been a confederate) worse things about our own country than he ever did about the Italian government. It seems to us that the objectors to Mr. Keiley hav a good case. This country ought not to send as representativ to a foreign country a gentleman known to sympathize with that country's domestic enemies, especially when appointed solely to please those enemies. But in the race for the Catholic vote now being run, it is not probable that any but political considerations of the meanest kind will prevail. Patriotic Americans, however, can but view with alarm the increasing influence of the Catholic church in New York and national politics.

IF the Toronto Mail correctly represents the condition of the church, Christianity is in a bad way. "Here, as elsewhere," it says, "the tendency is towards unbelief. The energy of skepticism and the contempt for revealed truth are as remarkable and portentous in Canada as in Massachusetts. The church is for the time being overmatched. Her ministers were never more alert, her machinery never so powerful, her courage never higher. Pious laymen hav come to her aid with innumerable outside agencies unknown a century ago, and she and they are bending their united energies to withstand the onset of that skepticism of the intellect which is the newest but by far the most deadly of the instruments of evil. And it must be confessed that the battle is going against them. That ultimately they must triumph every man who still clings to belief in a beneficent Creator believes; but just now the vast aggregation of wickedness, with skepticism at its head, is beyond question in the ascendant. As the hard-driven squares prayed for Blucher or night, so from every quarter of the beleaguered church comes a cry for help or a prayer that the Last Day may soon dawn upon the unequal struggle." The remedy for this deplorable condition, in the Mail's opinion, is to giv the schools over to the church, and thus rear an army of defenders to beat back the "remorseless enemy that is storming her inner walls. Rome long ago discerned that if the flood of skepticism were to be withstood, religious training must be the breakwater. How far it has succeeded in enabling Catholic countries to throw back the deluge this is not the place to discuss. France has been submerged, to be sure, but not more completely than the United States, which Protestantism undertook to defend. Ireland is still safe, and the Roman Catholic garrison in Britain, while Spain, Austria, Belgium, and Southern Germany are probably not so Infidel as England or Canada. But putting that question aside, the fact that the Roman church has ever relied upon compulsory religious instruction for the young as a bulwark against the great modern tendency, and that here and elsewhere she is about to strengthen and perfect her methods of imparting it, is certainly worth the attention of the Protestant churches. It is said that the Catholic hierarchy in Ontario will soon ask the provincial government to establish a normal school for separate schoolteachers at which theology will be carefully taught. Such a scheme may or may not meet the views of the Protestant taxpayers; but its significance as showing the abiding faith of Rome in the efficacy of religion in schools cannot be misunderstood. When that is felt by universal Christendom to be a want, no better proof of its necessity ought to be demanded." The Mail admits that the objections raised to the Bible in the schools are formidable, for the Anabaptist might complain if the teacher were a Pedobaptist, the Arminian if he were a Calvinist, the Congregationalist if he were an Episcopalian. "But the question to be considered is, not how the sects may be placated in this supreme crisis, but whether the church itself shall be saved." We only wish the Mail's fears had a more substantial foundation. Christianity in Canada is a too, too solid tyranny that it will take years to melt.

Letters from Friends.

INDEPENDENCE, KAN., March 31, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The past five months I hav been made to feel and sympathize with those who hav suffered for expressing their honest thoughts as opposed to the teachings of the so-called Christian religion.

You are perhaps aware that during the time of my frequent epistles to THE TRUTH SEEKER I was keeping a drug store at Reading, which is a small, dull, and dilapidated town, as is always the case wherever the church holds influence and control. My devotion to the cause of Liberalism and anti-hypocrisy, of course, won for me many friends and also many enemies. Unfortunately my business, as necessitating my violation of the prohibitory law, as it exists in this state, placed me in the power of my enemies. However, all went well until last November. O. A. Phelps, a Liberal lecturer, came to the place, and, without a full understanding of his subject, he was allowed the use of the schoolhouse for three successiv evenings. After the first lecture, he was informed that he could not use the room longer.

I felt indignant at such proceedings, and seated off my store building for his accommodation, and we had the pleasure of his lectures, as antagonistic to the revivals then red-hot, and still heating, across the street. This was more than the bigots could stand. Nothing but "Penfield must be rooted out" could occupy their godlike minds. Church consultations were held as to what could be done that "Penfield" should no longer be permitted to hinder the cause of Christ in their midst. A few of these poor, miserable dupes, who are too lazy to work, and who are made to believe that a daily prayer to God, "Giv us this day our daily bread," is all the mission of life, were hired to inform of my violating the prohibitory law. As soon as I heard of this, I sold my goods and left behind only my store building. I understand warrants were issued for my arrest, but so far my person has not been molested.

As soon as these followers of the "God of Moses" found that I had gone to parts unknown, they burnt my store, which cost about $1,000, and undertook to wreak their vengeance upon my wife and children, by trying to drive her from the place with threats of violence if she did not leave within two days, during the cold blasts of January winds.

I am a man of small means and large family, having six children. In consequence of my persistent efforts for the cause of Liberalism I hav lost nearly all. Sometimes I think I hav done a wrong to my family, but we hav a home and a moderate income. My apology to my family is that I never before realized that these superstitious bigots were really in this day of civilization so closely allied to the spirit of that God which they worship. W. H. PENFIELD.

MALONE, IA., March 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I see my paper will need renewing by March 12th. Please find inclosed $3 for the same.

It appears to be impossible for E. C. Walker to write an article without giving Prohibitionists a dig. All through my life my observation has been that the use of liquor leads directly to ignorance, and that the churches are largely made up of people who are not clear thinkers. For my view of things the Jewish religion, ancient and modern, and whisky hav an affinity for each other. I hold that Freethinkers should hav nothing to do with either, and that the coupling of individual liberty with whisky is ridiculous.

So far as my information extends, two out of three of the men that are engaged in the liquor business are Christians in good standing. They can be seen here in De Witt at any time climbing the golden stairs with a jug of whisky under each arm. The outspoken Infidels that follow that calling are very scarce in these parts.

I will never advocate the building up of a business in which I would not engage. Besides, this business belongs to the churches; I am willing to let them hav their due, and opposed to having it placed as a stumbling-block before the feet of those that are trying to make the world better.

The vital question for the American people to decide in the near future will be that of bread. We cannot take the cream from off our lands and convert it into whisky forever. Everything that man lays his hands upon will wear out. As a people, we should husband our resources while we hav them. I am aware there are Prohibitionist cranks, and regret Freethinkers are not free from them. J. L. WILCOX.

BOSTON, April 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: My mind is greatly disturbed by reading Mr. Truesdell's article headed, "They Who Liv in Glass Houses Should not Throw Stones." If Mr. Truesdell has a mind to vouch for the truth of Mrs. Elmina, he may, I will not. For, before I had ever seen her, having read her articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, expressing a wish to come to Boston had she only some one to call on, I wrote her and sent my card, saying she could hav her entertainment at my house.

She said she wanted to see something of Spiritualism. I told her that I would giv her an opportunity as soon as I had time to make arrangements. I found her rather disposed to make the aquaintance of those whose interest it was to oppose Spiritualism.

The next day she expressed a wish to see Mendum and Seaver, and Mr. Chainey. I went with her to Mendum. She did not wish to return. I told her she should be welcome as long as she wished to stay.

We hav not been favored by her presence since. And she has visited all the most unreliable sources of information in regard to spirits out of the body—as well as the most vituperous spirits in the body—those who are known to be the most bitter opposers to the phenomena, and the biggest frauds to be found, and has proved to me that she fears the truth rather than seeks it. I am honest. I know that I am. I hav lived to be almost seventy-eight years old. I know that there is not a person living, and but one that has ever lived, who has ever turned a hand for me, but that I hav turned mine as many times for them, if not one hundred times for one. And I entered the school of metaphysics forty-eight years ago, and then made a pledge never to condemn anybody, or thing, until I had proof I could demonstrate. And I hav investigated life in and out of the body until I hav challenged all of the professors, offering them $1,000, to meet me in open discussion. Where are they? What is the matter? The doctors, the ministers, the lawyers, the politicians, the daily press, Truesdell, Bundy, and lots of others hav proved they are all dishonest.

I will send you a bundle of my documents, and if you dare, or think it best, you may publish any or all of them. The reason that my own profession do not meet me is, they dare not. If they hav a reputation that is worth a thousand dollars, they know they will lose it. My never-ending regards for you and THE TRUTH SEEKER. N. H. DILLINGHAM, M.D.

P.S.—I am more of a sincere friend to Liberalism, Freethought, Infidelity, and even Materialism, than before becoming a Spiritualist. For they, I perceived, were the mediums between old theology (which is barbarism, heathenism) and the true principles of life. In fact, spirit is life itself, which never dies. N. H. D.

ELMIRA, MICH., March 31, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $13; apply $5 on my subscription, and for the balance please send the indispensable TRUTH SEEKER, for one year, to three new subscribers named on a slip of paper herewith inclosed. Please send me, also, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for E. M., 285. Some of the chicken-eating gentry hav lately been among us, holding a "protracted effort," as they call it, to try to make proselytes of the people of this town, but they hav not been very successful. I believe they hav added to the number of the redeemed two little girls, one very promising but very green boy, and two men that are too lazy to think for themselves. One of these heavenly pilots came to my house to convert me. I received him kindly and told him if his doctrin was true I would like to be converted, as I was a truth-seeker. He gave me the usual dose of the total depravity of man, his lost condition, the great plan of salvation; said we must hav faith in the atoning blood of Christ, or we would all be eternally damned, etc. I asked him if he would answer a few questions. He said he would. The following dialog then occurred:

QUESTION: Do you believe there is a personal God that created from nothing this vast universe? ANSWER: Yes.

Q. Is or was there any other creativ power? A. No, certainly not.

Q. Did he not create the serpent that caused Eve to eat the forbidden fruit? A. I suppose he did.

Q. Did he not create the tree that bore the fruit? A. Yes.

Q Did he not know that Eve and Adam would partake of the fruit before he placed the tree there? A. Why, yes.

Q. Now, as your God created Adam and Eve, the serpent and tree, and all the conditions, knowing what the result would be, don't you think your God did wrong in cursing the unborn millions for Adam and Eve doing just what he knew they would do before he created them. A. No, no; God could not do wrong. He drew up this great plan of salvation in the beginning, so that all that would might be saved.

Q. Did not your God know before the creation just who would and who would not be saved? A. Yes, certainly.

Q Then how could this plan of salvation help those that he knew would be lost? A. Ah, but all things are possible with God.

Q. Is it possible for your God to do something that he knows he would not do, or is it possible for him to save a single soul that he knew would be lost? A. Well, I must go, there is no use talking to you.

Q. I want to know whose anger it was to appease, or whom it was to satisfy, by killing Jesus Christ? [No answer.] According to your own story, did not your God murder his own son? A. Oh! don't call God a murderer, I can't stand it. I must go.

Q. Hold on one moment. Don't you think God's great plan a failure when by it he can't save one-tenth of the people that he created? A. Oh, they might be saved if they would believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.

Q. Did not your God know, when he created man and gave him a reasoner, that he would not believe such an unreasonable story as that of the immaculate conception? A. You shock me.

Q. Don't you think your God did wrong in giving us a reasoner and not allowing us to use it? A. There is no use reasoning with you—I must go.

And so he went; yes, he went amongst his Christian brothers and sisters, and told them that I was a very bad, unprincipled, wicked, and dangerous man; that I was an Atheist, and had said that God had murdered his own son.

As they were holding meetings in our schoolhouse, I thought I would go there and, after the man of God was through with his nonsense, I would state my position about the matter. Well, I went and got abused to the best of their ability. When I arose to make my statement, the shepherd and some of the lambs of the flock acted as though they thought I was a kind of a Christian-eater, and was after a good, fat lamb for breakfast. The sky-pilot wanted me to sit down and wait till they were through with their meeting. I asked them if they would hear me then. As I had been misrepresented, I would like to explain the matter. He said yes, and I sat down; but when they were through he dismissed the meeting, and the whole flock ran as though their lives depended on their speed.

We hav quite a number of good, outspoken Liberals in this place. Prominent among them are the new subscribers I send you. My stirring up the Christians here caused quite an excitement. My Liberal friend and myself talked the matter over, and made up our minds that as the Christians were constantly misrepresenting us, and would not allow us to hav a word to say in their meeting, and as we were not able to organize a Liberal League at present, we would organize a kind of a Liberal Club, and meet and read some good Liberal lectures; and as some of our Liberals here are fair speakers, we could occasionally hav a lecture of our own in the absence of something better, and discuss the merits and demerits of Liberalism and theology, and let the people know what the principles of Liberalism are. We thought such meetings would be entertaining and instructiv. There is only one hall in this place, that is kept to rent for dances, shows, or any decent party or meeting. Our postmaster here has charge of the hall. We tried to hire it of him to hold our meetings in, but he, being a kind of a semi-Christian, refused to rent it to us, declaring that he thought we had no right to oppose the Christians, even if we did think they were wrong and we were right. Consistency is a jewel. He seems to me a rather good fellow, but he has not quite outgrown the soft spot that all babies hav on their heads. We think there is a chance for him to improve, and we shall remember him in our prayers. As soon as the weather gets warm, we shall try to hold our meetings, hall or no hall.

G. G. GABRION.

NEW ALBANY, IND, March 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Although I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER but a short time, I became so much interested in the letters of some of the friends that I concluded to giv my views on humanity as we think it should be. I offer this as a remedy for those tramps Mr. Kinser speaks about in your issue of March 7th, also the moneyless Freethinkers of Miss Morrow's.

Let us organize a mutual society; find a good situation; purchase land, and make it a home for all. Then all work for a common treasury. Say we work six hours a day, we can accomplish more in that time, by all working together, than we could by working separately in ten or twelve hours. Then we would hav time for the much needed study. We could furnish our children good books and good schools, and hav a good library, etc. Moneyless Freethinkers could then hav a chance.

We hav been talking with some friends in Illinois on the subject, and they indorse it fully and think Texas a good place to locate. I am a Materialist and, as such, can see no use in wasting our time in working against each other when we might accomplish so much more good by working together.

I am not much of a writer, but thought there might be some that would like to go into a brotherhood where we would hav equal rights and privileges and good homes. And, instead of working ourselvs to death to support presidents and bosses, we can support our families and hav time for study and amusement.

I would like to hear from some of the friends on this subject, either by mail or through the columns of this paper. I am yours for advancement in humanity as well as religion,

E. E. PARK.

LINDSAY, ONT.

MR. EDITOR: I am led to ask, Is there any regard for morality left in the churches, or did they ever hav any? It is a grave question, but I can't help asking it. When I take a look around right here in this small town of Lindsay and see the rampant hypocrisy and rascality practiced by our most zealous church-going members, I am led to inquire, Is there even one really honest Christian left to command the respect of honest people for the churches? We had a very pious member of the Presbyterian church, and I understand a Sunday-school teacher and a member of our town council. He was doing a nice business in the retail boot and shoe trade, and his zealousness in the cause of Christianity had established a large amount of confidence in his honesty, but that did not prevent him from acting the rogue when he got the chance. There was a large bankrupt stock of dry goods offered for sale here, and this pious young man bought out the goods. It is reported they were worth between $7,000 and $8,000. He had them on hand only a short time, when he sold out the whole stock for $2,000 cash down, handed the money over to his sister, and, I suppose, told his creditors to whistle for their pay. But the creditors did not see it in that light and had him arrested for fraud and swindling, and he now has a chance to hold sweet communion with his sin-atoning savior behind prison bars in Montreal city.

When I had more confidence than I hav now in the blood of Christ washing away the sins of Christians and keeping them honest, I loaned $100 to a very pious Methodist preacher here; he was to hav paid it back in six weeks. Before the six weeks was up he got a call from the Lord to a more useful field over in Pennsylvania, and although years hav elapsed the Lord has not been able to convince him that he ought to pay that money back.

I hav come to the conclusion that if God took it into his head to destroy Ontario as he did in old times to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah (if the story is true), and if getting together half a dozen honest people would save the place, he would hav to look amongst the Infidels and not the Christians to find them. If any person is keeping track of the "Crimes of Preachers," I can send a record from this place that will throw the Jesse James family in the shade. OBSERVER.

BURLINGTON, KAN., April 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me space enough in THE TRUTH SEEKER to ask my Materialistic friends a few questions. You say Spiritualism is a humbug and delusion. Being an Agnostic I neither affirm nor deny, for I do not know. Is not Christianity a greater fraud and a worse curse to the world than Spiritualism, which is doing a good work in evolving the public mind above the superstitious dogmas of Christianity. It is a mistake that they teach supernaturalism as taught by the Bible and old orthodoxy. They are not Bible believers, nor do they believe in the Christian God, Jesus Christ, the trinity, nor in their heaven or hell. They believe in a conscious future existence which I prefer (if there is any) to any that I hav read or heard of.

For these reasons, if it should prove to be a fraud, I shall not regret that I hav given them my support, and encouraged them in their efforts to help overthrow old orthodoxy, one of the greatest frauds ever entailed on the human family. Then I for one feel grateful to our brother and sister Spiritualists for the work they are doing, and let us all work together, Materialists and Agnostics, for the religion of Humanity as taught by Thomas Paine, which consists in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., April 5, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $7 for balance of "Truth Seeker Library." I hav just finished the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I find it full (and running over) of very interesting Liberal news, and it is a mystery to me how any man calling himself a Liberal can say, "Stop my paper." Now, Brother Mac, you and I hav met face to face in the presence of Brother Somerby and the rest of THE TRUTH SEEKER people, and you heard me express my sentiments on the rum question (having been a toper for years, and seen more snakes and blue devils than would patch L seven miles), but you don't hear me howling prohibition to you, and that you must print matter to suit my taste. No; I think the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a man of experience, and well knows how to serve up the best kind of food for the Liberal minds. I indorse every sentiment of Brother George Lynn, in his letter contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 4th, and hope to hav the pleasure of reading more from his able pen. I like the idea of Brother James Bigham, but, in the words of Brother Lynn, we get quite all we pay for, so am fully satisfied, and cannot say too much in praise of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is only one thing in it that makes me and "mother" feel sad, and that is when we read "News and Notes from the Field," and "Correspondence." It makes us feel as though we were imprisoned in this benighted, Bible-ridden, orthodox God manufactory, never to hear the cheering words of Brothers Watts, Reynolds, Putnam, Ingersoll, or any other apostle of Freethought. But, Mr. Editor, we console ourselvs as best we can by reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, Ironclad Age, and Brother Green's Magazine, and "The Truth Seeker Library," for all of which we subscribe. In conclusion, let me say, long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and every other Liberal paper, till the last vestige of mental slavery shall be buried in oblivion, and every three-headed god manufactory, and every den of cruelty and superstition and bigotry, are crumbled in the dust.

WILLIAM THORPE.

WENTWORTH, DAK., March 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Let me tell you of my new scheme of posting "sky-pilots." I hav taken a frame about 28x36, put in solid back, hung it with large, red tassels and cord, and placed it in my waiting room. I hav named it my "criminal bulletin board," and I put in nine crimes of the shepherds to one of other crimes. When I get the frame full I paste right over the first, and so on. Whew! but don't they scowl at me hard? But I am innocent of any harm, and if they say anything to me, I tell them I take them just as they come, and if preachers will commit nine crimes to the rest of us one, they must take it nine times as hard.

Everything quiet here now. The Christians (poor souls!) hav found out they cannot scare us, and so they let us alone. They hav now turned themselvs loose on the saloon-keepers.

One word more and I am done for this time. We hav a fine boy about eight weeks old. There were several wanted to name the boy, but no go. I told one and all Thomas Paine Horton sounded good enough for me, and he should be "Tom." Well, the flutter and flurry for awhile beggars description. It was the town talk, and I smiled and kept quiet. They were going to hav the "kid" die on my hand. He is going to be a renegade and drunkard, and goodness knows what, if Christian predictions come true. Poor, blind, ignorant, dried-up mummies!

W. L. HORTON.

CENTRAL CITY, DAK., March 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose you very rarely hear from this distant portion of Dakota, yet there are a few here who are very glad to hear from you, and welcome the good old TRUTH SEEKER as soon as it arrives. In this far-famed Black Hills region we are blessed—or otherwise, as the case may be—with rich mines, fertil valleys, churches, Bibles, and preachers, yet one thing we lack, and that is a railroad two hundred miles long to bind us more closely to the world at large. Still we hav all the gods can giv, with several improvements by man. Although the Liberal cause is not advancing in this part of the country as it should, there are a great many stanch Liberals here, who are too well satisfied to go right along on their own hook and let other people do the same, and only need a lively waking up by some able Liberal speaker. In fact, I don't think a better country exists for successful Liberal work than Dakota Territory. Preachers and priests representing all the orthodox denominations hav long since surmounted the difficulties, crossed the plains, and, finding their way to our midst, hav preyed on the pockets of as generous a people as ever lived.

Liberal lecturers cannot travel on half-fare, but otherwise they ought to be just as able to ride on stage-coaches as preachers are; and no wide-awake, talented Liberal speaker would be in any danger of being out of pocket by taking a trip through this part of the country.

The resident Methodist minister here, who is quite a pleasing and effectiv speaker as far as elocution goes, called on me this evening to see an "Infidel League" charter, as he had never seen one, and to tell me the best joke on D. M. Bennett. I told him that the members of a Liberal League were not necessarily Infidels, for if they had to be Infidels, or Methodists, it could not be called a Liberal League. "But," said he, "they always are Infidels who belong to them, or would tolerate their doctrin." I simply remarked that I considered that a very strong argument for Infidelity; for if people had to be Infidels to be willing to grant others the same privilege that they themselvs enjoy, I felt highly complimented by the remark.

The joke concerning Bennett was a story about his making a great speech at the Watkins Glenn Convention, stating that the churches were fast going to decay, and one Elder McCabe sending the meaningless telegram that all reading Liberals probably remember. I told him I rememberd the circumstances quite well, and also the answer to the boasting Methodist church-builders, but thought the event took place about a year and a half after Mr. Bennett's death. I hav not the back papers to refer to, but would like very much to know if I am right.

J. W. MCDONALD.

P.S.—My preacher friend is of the opinion that Bennett was a very wicked man for having written "Cupid's Yokes," and that his imprisonment was just, although he admitted he had never seen the book, but had read extracts from it in the religious papers. I didn't wish to embarrass him by telling him that Bennett was not the writer of that dreadful book that he had never seen, but asked him if he had ever read Sterne's works, and called his attention more specially to "Tristram Shandy," which, I considered, far exceeded "Cupid's Yokes" in coarseness and obscenity, although it was one of the standard works in English literature; but strange to say, although he is an Englishman, he had never heard of Sterne. So there was nothing left but to fall back on the Bible. J. W. MCD.

[The occurrence mentioned took place in August 1882, but had no especial connection with Mr. Bennett, Chaplain McCabe's boast that the Methodists were building more than one church a day being addressed to the president of the association, and was replied to by Mr. Wakeman. Mr. Bennett died some three months later. Mr. Wakeman's reply is worth reproducing here. Chaplain McCabe began his telegram by saying, "All hail the power of Jesus's name." The reply read:

"Let us hear less of Jesus's name and see more of his works. Build fewer churches, and pay your taxes on them like honest men. Build better churches, since Liberty, Science, and Humanity will need them one of these days, and won't want to pay too much for repairs."]

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed three dollars to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Last year I was tardy in my invitation for weekly visits from the ever-welcome TRUTH SEEKER. Your faithful tab reminds me that May 1st is a good time to renew and confirm friendship. Truth seekers, their name is legion. They are selling all their traditions and superstitions to obtain this "pearl of great price."

"One by one fall ancient errors,
Reared by might and propped by wrong,
And earth wonders when they perish
That they stood the test so long."

Well, our little craft of twelve years has become the monitor of the seas, and successfully challenges the well disciplined monarchs of the ocean, that hav held undisputed sway for centuries. The great Goliahs are trembling before the well-slung smooth stones from the brook of living truth. And the stars of hope in humanity's firmament are singing together a prophecy of a brighter future, when

"Truth shall sit on every hill,
And blessings flow from every rill."

Fraternally yours, E. MYRICK.

NOTE.—No investment will pay a better interest than three dollars in THE TRUTH SEEKER. My copy shows evidence of appreciativ readers. It is loaned, and sometimes lost—the paper, but not its truths.

MATERIALISM AND SPIRITUALISM IN A NUTSHELL COMPARED.

ITHACA, N. Y., April 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Nature is one in dual form expressed by man, who is the embodiment of all comprehension, both animal and intellectual, who has no capacity to go outside of himself. Now, then, what is Materialism in few words? Materialism proper embraces all the matter-of-fact included in material, animal, and intellectual life; guided by the laws of her dual oneness of comprehension. Physical life and death are the natural expression of the dual oneness of Nature's law, thus: conception, expansion, birth, growth, maturity, decay, and dissolution. Like all other forms of vegetable and animal matter, they retrograde back by revolution and chemical action to her original mold and fertilization, to the order of succeeding forms, in the evolution of time. Thus upon the axle of succession we appear eternally in our posterity. Thus, by the inevitable laws of nature our individuality is extinct, and here we hav the plain facts and no mystery.

What is Spiritualism? It is a condition of mystery not available by the laws of nature. Its votaries, by education and heredity, seek knowledge from forbidden fruit, to wit: They lay aside the plain laws of intelligence and reason, and dwell upon the lower plain of sensation, and selfish, beguiling mystery, and thus keep up the excitement of self-aggrandizement in an impossible spirit organization in some foreign territory.

LIBERTY, O., April 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find petition for State Secularization. I find nearly all Liberals in this section of country poor men; were they more wealthy, the Liberal cause would grow much faster. One poor mechanic who signed the petition is an outspoken Liberal living in Dayton, O., at west end, where the Methodist and United Brethren churches hav been holding protracted meetings. The Methodists held first, fifty nights in succession, and are continuing, and declare they will not stop short of one hundred nights. Both churches are determined to get every Liberal in church. This mechanic is a day-laborer, and has a family. He says some of the Liberals are joining the church, not for the sake of religion, but to get employment, as the churches are prejudiced against outsiders and will not employ them so long as they can employ church-members. He says sometimes he thinks of joining to get work, but then he hates to be a hypocrit. Another signer, and an outspoken Liberal of the same place, also a mechanic, is out of employment. He attends church occasionally on account of some of his friends. When approached in church he talks facts and common sense. They send church-members to his boarding place, thinking they might convert him—also set the sisters on him, to his great annoyance. He has been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, also tracts and J. E. Remsburg's "Bible Morals," and "False Claims," which I lent to him. I think for a truthful exposure of the Bible, "Bible Morals" has no equal. I also like "False Claims." I consider it excellent. I and a number of Liberals would like to hav Remsburg deliver "Bible Morals" and "False Claims" in Dayton, and bring them in print for sale after lectures. I hav talked to some of the Liberals of Dayton about it, and they are favorable, but say times are hard and money is scarce, and that Music Hall will cost forty dollars per night, so the expense is embarrassing to poor men. I formed my acquaintance with Mr. Remsburg at Ludlow Falls, Ohio, where he delivered his lecture, "Bible Morals," in a masterly manner. I hope our campaign lecturers will come to Dayton, O., and giv several lectures. I think they are much needed. Inclosed find $4.46, of which one dollar apply to the tent-fund, three dollars for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and forty-six cents as I shall order for tracts.

NOAH COLER.

WILL HE CONVERT J. E REMSBURG TO MORMONISM?

WANSHIP, UTAH, March 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of a letter from a three-mile distant neighbor who has just graduated at the Brigham Young academy. He says:

"I hav read a few of the so-called Freethinkers' publications, speeches by J. E. Remsburg, and hav before me his 'Bible Morals'—twenty crimes sanctioned by scripture. I do not understand the belief of the Freethinkers. Do they believe in a God? If not, giv me a description of the creation of the earth, man, animals, plants, etc., according to your belief, and your reasons for belief. Are they Infidels, Atheists, or do they believe in some God of whose history I am ignorant? I can conceive of no other way that the sun and planets were made, only by a skilled workman whom I call God. These wonders are too much for me to call chance.

"Historians tell us that in the different translations of the Bible many words and sentences hav been changed and passages even interpolated to suit the translator. Now, we Mormons accept that part as inspired that teaches honesty, virtue, and goodness. If I were not a Mormon I could not be an Atheist.

"I would like Mr. Remsburg to make a full, unbiased investigation of Mormonism; and if he is an Atheist I would like to know his plan of the creation."

The above are the main points of his letter, and if he reads "Bible Morals" he will surely discover that Mr. Remsburg is no friend of the Jew God.

I hope Mr. Remsburg will find time to note this and answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if in investigating Mormonism he should become converted and move to Zion (Utah) I shall try hard to go to church when he preaches. To read only one part of his "Bible Morals," that the scripture sanctions polygamy, would make him very popular here.

Fraternally yours, WM. REYNOLDS.

COTTONWOOD, IDAHO, Feb. 23, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the ANNUAL for this year. I would also like to know why Mr. Hill adds the year 1600 and substracts it too. How does "Antiquary" divide the year "0" into halves or other parts? The year one 1 B.C.—should it begin with December 31st or the first of January?

ARTHUR CHAPEL.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., April 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The editor and proprietor of our village paper says his letter-box, by which I suppose he means his columns, is open to all, but will not hold himself responsible for views advanced by others. Taking this as an invitation for all who wish to express their views, and not taking much stock in the teachings of the Bible, some six weeks ago I dropped the following statement and question in his letter-box for the Republican:

"Strenuous efforts are being made by Bible advocates to hav the existence of a monarch or supreme ruler of the universe engrafted in the Constitution of our republic—a belief on which the monarchies and aristocracies of our world are founded and from which they derive their existence and sustenance. In direct opposition to all monarchies and aristocracies, whether of this world or any other, stands the organic law on which our republic is founded and by which we exist as individuals—that the powers that govern are derived from those they govern; the higher, in all cases, a combination of and derived from the lower. As no republic can sustain itself based on belief in a monarchy, please allow me to ask where the evidence can be found that the author, or authors, of the Bible knew or believed that our world was a revolving sphere, as demonstrated by Galileo, instead of being flat and stationary."

As the editor of the Republican, the paper referred to, has not found it convenient to publish the foregoing, the question is an open one, and would seem of sufficient importance to be thoroughly ventilated, and under that impression I send it to THE TRUTH SEEKER for insertion.

J. TINNEY.

ROCHESTER, N. H., April 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to apply on my subscription. I was much interested in your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 14th in regard to "Do People Want a Free Paper?" When a man claims to be a Liberal, and orders his paper stopped simply because he sees an occasional article which he does not like, then I am inclined to think he has got Liberality only on the surface; it certainly cannot be very deep. Why, such a man could not find a newspaper in the whole country that would please him. I sometimes see an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I do not like myself, but taking it as a whole, I do like it better than any other that I hav ever taken. Could I therefore reasonably order it discontinued simply on account of the few items I do not like? I think not, but, however, I will say no more at present, but sometime in the future, if it be required, I shall be desirous of saying something more.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Reply of the Flowers.

Beautiful flowers!
From the frozen earth
What mighty powers
Hav called you forth
To gladden our sight
With your cheering light?

Did some wizard stand
By your mossy couch,
Wave his slender wand
With a magic touch,
And bid you unfold
Your petals of gold?

You are smiling so
From your lowly bed
That even the snow,
With a silent tread,
Is owning your sway
And melting away.

Dear little flowers!
Why are you so brave?
By what latent powers,
I earnestly crave,
Do you open your eyes
To the sunny skies?

All at once, slight twinkling,
A perfume most rare
Swung across the pure air—
Then a fairy-like tinkling;
I bent my ear low,
Quite near to the snow.

"We giv you our reasons,"
Said they with a nod;
"Our times and our seasons
To spring from the sod
Are governed by laws,
As effect follows cause:
From our long night of rest
In our cosy earth-nest
We were waked from our dreams
By the golden sunbeams.

"They warmed us and cheered us,
Thus far they hav reared us,
Clothing us in a suit
Of green, brown, and gold,
In shades manifold,
From stamen to root;
Our hearts they inwrought
With beautiful thought;
While we love the kind earth
From which we hav birth,
We all join as one
To worship the sun."

Then in delicate rhymes,
With softest of chimes,
They tossed on the air
In tinkling notes rare
A pean to Light,
And closed for the night.

MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

Baby's Visitors.

My baby sat on the floor.
His big blue eyes were full of wonder,
For he had never seen before
That baby in the mirror door—
What kept the two so near, asunder?

He leaned toward the golden head
The mirror border framed within;
Until twin cheeks, like roses red,
Lay side by side, then softly said,
"I can't get out, can 'oo come in?"

Selected.

Mother-Love.

Dear children, let us go together for a ramble out in the fields. Do you hear the birds—how they twitter and sing as they flit about and swing on the green boughs of the trees? How happy they are, and how much they seem to enjoy the great limbs of cherry blossoms, looking like veritable popcorn balls, so white and thick that there appears to be no room for leaves among them! And the plum-trees are still more beautiful, for you can see the points of some lovely green leaves dotted here and there among the white flowers. How lovely is the spring-time in our far northwest home!

Oh, do you see that old horsey out there in the pasture, with that frolicking colt prancing by her side? See her look at him as much as to say, "What a beautiful colt you are! None was ever quite so handsome. One of these days you will be the pride of the farm, as you are now the pride of your mother's heart." And the colty seems to answer by kicking up his heels, and running three or four times around her, which looks much as if he was trying to show off—do you not think so?

Hello! here is a large flock of sheep. Do you see that old mother sheep with the little lambie by her side? Let us listen and see if we can hear what she says. Hark! I think I hear her say, "There is nothing so sweet in all this green world as my own little lambie. See his eyes—how bright they are! and his wool—was there ever seen wool so white and soft and silky? I love my darling; he is my heart's delight." Ah! now they lie down side by side on the sunny hill-slope, and soon they will be sleeping peacefully.

When we get back to the yard we will see the old hen with her chicks. Oh, ho! here they are now—the old brown hen, see how proud she looks of her large family, sixteen or seventeen little fluffy, downy darlings, and with her tender "Cluck, cluck, cluck" she calls them to her and sings a low, sweet lullaby, whilst they sleep so snug and warm under her outspread wing, and we may almost hear her say, "In all the world there is nothing so sweet as these darling chicks of mine." Now we hav returned to the kitchen, and here we find the old gray cat with her three lovely kittens.

Listen! Can you not hear, as she sings and purrs, a whisper soft and low, and while she looks at you she seems to say, "Do you see my kits—how lovely they are? See this white one with the black spot on his shoulder—is he not a beauty?—and this black one, with the white ring around his neck and his little white paws; and my little gray pet, she looks just as I did when I was young; she is my heart's delight." And now see! they go together beneath the warm stove, where they will play until the kits are tired, when they will all go peacefully to sleep.

We come to the sitting-room and there
Lay snug in her cradle a baby fair,
A wee little darling, with eyes of blue,
With soft, silky hair of a golden hue.
Of all the sweet babies under the sun,
This baby of ours is the sweetest one.
I love my darling throughout the long day,
I love her just now and I love her alway,
By night when she sleeps,
And by morning's sunrise;
At noonday's bright gleam,
When her laughing blue eyes
Are fullest of gladness, I love her, I say.
Oh, never was baby so dear and so bright
As this my loved darling,
Her mother's delight.

And thus, my little friends, we hav wandered to the field, the yard, the kitchen, and the sitting-room, and in each place we hav seen the loving care of a mother for her young, and if we look all through the world, in every clime and nation, among every kind of living thing or creature, we shall find mother-love one of nature's laws, fixed and unchangeable. From the wildest and most ferocious beast to the most gentle and loving, it is always the same. The children's friend,

LAURA E. HALL.

What Some Bad Boys Did

There was a poor, inoffensiv old man who lived on a little farm of his own. He was quiet, retiring, and never meddled with anybody's business but his own. One day in harvest time he was at work with his threshing machine, and two or three good-sized boys were helping him. By and by these boys thought it would be good fun to play a trick upon the old man; so they made a cigaret, and filling it with powder and tobacco, gave it to him to smoke.

The old gentleman took the cigaret, thanked the boys, and commenced to smoke it. Of course, the powder exploded, and his throat and lungs were instantly filled with smoke, tobacco, powder, and terrible heat. From the effects of this dreadful joke he suffered many long weeks the greatest agony, and finally his sufferings terminated in death. The boys were sorry for their wicked conduct, but it was then too late to repair the injury.

This is related that you may never be guilty of such bad and cruel acts as that above described. Never insult the unfortunate or the fortunate; never do an injury to anyone. Stop always and think how you would like to hav a wrong done to you. Remember that you will always feel better to be good, true, and honorable than to be bad, false, and dishonest; and that which you would not like to hav done to yourself remember and never do to another. S. A. SEAVEY.

The History of Wheat.

As a staple article of food and commerce wheat has been known from the earliest ages. It is not known to exist in other than a cultivated state. It is supposed to hav originated in central Asia, but recent discoveries hav thrown some doubt on that point. M. Fabre, of France, a distinguished naturalist, made the discovery several years ago that the ægilops ovata, a grass near the region of the Mediterranean and of the west of Asia, becomes transformed by cultivation into wheat. The possibility of such a transformation has been confirmed by subsequent observations and experiments.

The granaries of Egypt and other centers of ancient civilization were often of immense size, and were conspicuous objects among the public edifices of the time. Grains of wheat hav been found in the wrappings of Egyptian mummies, which had retained their power of germination through the lapse of centuries.

Although the Greeks, and more particularly the Spartans, affected to despise agriculture as a degrading pursuit, they were obliged to devote considerable attention to wheat-raising as a means of livelihood. Hesiod, one of the earliest Greek poets, in his "Works and Days" makes frequent mention of wheat. Among the Romans wheat-raising, in common with other branches of agriculture, was prosecuted with vigor and success. Roman writers on agriculture giv particular directions in regard to the cultivation of wheat. It is mentioned by Virgil in his "Georgics."

Wheat was early introduced into Great Britain, but until very recent times its production was so limited that only the wealthier classes could afford to use it as food. Mention is made of the fact that in the eighth century the monks of the abbey of St. Edmund, in England, ate barley bread because the income of the abbey was not sufficient to admit of their using wheat. In England down to the close of the seventeenth century servants and other working people were obliged to content themselvs with bread made from the coarser grains. Eden in his "History of the Poor" (1797) says: "So small was the quantity of wheat used in the county of Cumberland that it was only a rich family that used a peck of wheat in the course of the year, and that was used at Christmas. The usual treat for a stranger was a thick oat-cake, called "haver bannock," and butter. An old laborer remarks that when he was a boy he was at Carlisle market with his father, and wishing to indulge himself with a penny loaf made of wheat flour, he searched for it for some time, but could not procure a piece of wheaten bread at any shop in town."

At the period of the Revolution in 1689 the quantity of wheat grown in England was estimated at about 14,000,000 bushels, or about three bushels to each of the population, which was then under five million. In 1880 the product of wheat in England and Scotland was estimated at 100,000,000 bushels.

In 1880 the area of wheat growing in the United States was 35,430,333 acres, and the yield was 459,483,137 bushels, or thirteen bushels to the acre. The value of the crop was estimated at $482,457,293. The increase in production between 1870 and 1880 was nearly sixty per cent.

Correspondence.

ALLIANCE, O., April 5, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My parents take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner, it has such good stories in it. Mamma says she will send for "Apples of Gold" for me soon. I am ten years old and I read in "Third Reader," study arithmetic, geography, spelling, and writing. I liv nearly two miles from school, and do not go much in the winter. I am going to save up money to send for your and dear little Susie's photographs for my album. ZELLA FITZPATRICK.

ZALESKI, O., April 5, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never been to school, but study at home. I study arithmetic, grammar, reading, and spelling. We hav a horse, a cow, and fifteen chickens. I am ten years old, and liv in town. I send two puzzles for your Children's Corner.

ALBERT JAMES.

IRWIN, IOWA, March 18, 108.

MISS WIXON: I send you some puzzles. They are my first, and I will not be surprised if you think they are not fit to publish. I think the stories in the Children's Corner are very nice. I hav three brothers and one sister at home, and they all like the Children's Corner as well as I do. I am thirteen, and the oldest of the children at home. I will not tire you with a long letter, for I suppose you get a great many that are more interesting. KATIE BAKER.

NEWARK, N. J., April 12, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I think I hav the answer to the enigma No. 4, of A. L. Sailor, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, April 11th, as follows: My 1, 8, 3, 6, 7, 9—cousin; my 2, 6, 7, 5—Asia; my 4, 5, 9—can. This is right, I think, with the exception of the one letter o in cousin, which I think is a mistake in the enigma. I hav sometimes found out some of the enigmas in the Children's Corner, and thought that I would write you about them, but something has kept me from doing it. I hav been in the house sick with the mumps for two weeks; I am getting better now. The first week of my sickness was during my school vacation. This week is the first week of the spring term, and I feel very much disappointed because I could not be present at the commencement of the term. My average, at the close of last term, was 96 1-4 per cent. My papa has been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven or eight years, and I like the Children's Corner very much. We hav a Liberal League in this city. We all go when we are well—papa, mamma, and I. Last Sunday Mr. Wakeman lectured. I was sick and missed a splendid lecture. I always like to hear Mr. Wakeman, also many of the others who come here. Some are rather dry. We hav sociables now in our hall every Saturday evening. We expect to open a small library next Sunday. I hope we shall get some nice books from time to time. Papa says we must hav a copy of the "Story Hour" in it. I hope it will be a success. Try and spare a few minutes to write me.

Your affectionate and Liberal friend,
CORA JEWELL MARSHALL.

[MY DEAR CHILDREN: I wish I had time to answer your dear letters separately. I love you all, and you will please accept my appreciation of your efforts, and believe me always your sincere friend, ED. C. C.]

Let There Be Light!

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

NEW AND SIGNIFICANT. BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIV.

FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

(Design patented Feb. 24, 1885.)

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

DESCRIPTION:

The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3 00, $3 50, $4 00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt. OTTO WETTSTEIN, (Jeweler), Rochelle, Ill.

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

"'Little Lessons' are grand. I hashed and rehashed the lesson on spiders this evening in the Sunday-school. I am running two Sunday-schools. The children are slow in learning the mystery of the God-head; in comprehending the Trinity; but their eyes brighten and they take kindly to discourses on snails, toads, spiders, and lizards, so I think I'll keep it up."—Bertie Stone.

LADIES' MAGNETIC JACKET AND CORSET COMBINED.

LADIES' MAGNETIC JACKET AND CORSET COMBINED.

Will Cure all Forms of Disease Witho Medicine.

CONSULTING ROOMS,

471 WEST MADISON ST., CHICAGO, IL

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

ONE may certainly with innocency use all the enjoyments of life and I hav been always of opinion that a virtuous life is best disposed to be the most pleasant, for certainly, amidst the troubles and vanities of this world, there are but two things that bring a real satisfaction with them, that is, virtue and knowledge.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

A MOST opportune discourse appears in the Popular Science Monthly for July, upon the possibility of human beings saving themselvs from drowning by simply treading the waves as animals do. The exercise of firm self-control in shutting off groundless, or perhaps one should say waterless, fears seems to be all that is wanting to take the miracle out of the well-thumbed New Testament story. Had the Noachic world understood this matter, the Old Testament ark also might hav lost its monopoly of live stock.—F. R. Index, July 7, 1881.

BUDDHA taught forgivness, humility, and all the nobler and manlier virtues. It is related of him that a foolish man once heard him, in preaching, defend the great principle of returning good for evil, and therefore came and abused him. Buddha was silent, pitying his sad folly. The man having finished his abuse, Buddha said: "Son, when a man forgets the rules of politeness, in making a present to another, the custom is to say, 'Keep your present.' Son, you hav railed at me; I decline to entertain your abuse and ask you to keep it—a source of misery to yourself. For, as sound belongs to the drum and shadow to the substance, so in the end misery will certainly overtake the evil-doer."—Washburn's Who are Christians?

FOR even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.—2 Thessal. iii, 10. I think everyone, according to what way providence has placed him in, is bound to labor for the public good, or else he has no right to eat.—Locke. My duty toward my neighbor is . . . to learn and labor truly to get mine own living.—Church of England Catechism.

I BELIEVE fully in the rights of individua's, but in the rights of all, not of a few. We want no system which will obliterate the natural features of our humanity, no system that will tax labor to support idleness, and no scheme to rob one man who is industrious and frugal to giv to another who is disorderly and vicious. I look for the establishment of a new social order and of a new religion for the world from the better living of men and women, and I hold that the quickest way and the surest way to make men morally better is to improve their worldly estate. It is an undeniable fact that there is most vice where there is most ignorance and poverty, and the religion for the working man is the religion which makes him able to liv better.—L. K. Washburn.

THE Ten Commandments, we are told, are divine, but it needed no revelation from God to know that murder, theft, and adultery are wrong. Egypt had laws against all crimes and vices before Moses was born. That empire was famous for the wisdom and justice of its government, which was wonderfully complex, before the Jews had an existence as a nation; even Moses, we are told, "was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." No revelation then was needed to enable Moses to say, "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not steal;" while the bad commandments and cruel, vindictiv spirit of portions of the Old Testament demonstrate that it emanated from a half-civilized people, and not from a wise all-knowing being.

THOSE that are good manners at the court are as ridiculous in the country as the behavior of the country is most mockable at the court.—Shakspere.

THE little knowledge I hav, I find I would not sell at any rate, nor part with for any other pleasure.—Locke.

WHOSOEVER has his mind fraught with many thoughts, his wits and understanding do clarify and break up, in the communicating and discoursing with another; he tosseth his thoughts more easily; he marshalleth them more orderly; he seeth how they look when they are turned into words; finally, he waxeth wiser than himself; and that more by an hour's discourse than by a day's meditation.—Bacon's Essays.

IT is necessary to the happiness of man, that he be mentally faithful to himself. Infidelity does not consist in believing or in disbelieving; it consists in professing to believe what a man does not believe.—Paine's Age of Reason.

PUT the name of God into the Constitution! notable absurdity. Why, Phillip II. of Spain did that and was not saved thereby from the misfortune of being about the most despicably inhuman king that ever sat on a throne; a tyrant and a bigot who received the noblest empire under the sun, Napoleon III., did it, and what became of him and his dominion? Did the name of God deliver him from his spiritual foes? Pope Pius IX. was eminent in this achievement. To what end? Either the divine spirit is in the breast of the people or it is not. If it is not, then how idle! If the people are saved at all, it must be by faith in a real God, not by profession of a nominal one.—O. B. Frothingham.

BY far the most common class of minds are those on which the three orders of faculties—animal, moral, and intellectual—are bestowed by nature, in nearly equal proportions. Men of this class may be habitually selfish, yet occasionally generous; frequently cunning, yet often open and direct; at times carried away by passion and prejudice, and on other occasions, manifesting sound judgment and honesty. —George Combe.

ONE man is continually led, by the complexion of his temper, to forebode evil to himself and to the world; while another, after a thousand disappointments, looks forward to the future with exultation and feels his confidence in providence unshaken. One principle cause of such differences is undoubtedly the natural constitution of the mind, in point of fortitude.—Dugald Stewart,

Odds and Ends.

THE fact that all the peach-blossoms hav been killed, and the fact that next summer we shall hav just as many peaches as ever, leads to only one inference, and that is, that peaches do not grow on peach-trees.

"DID you pass the hat?" the pastor of a Texas congregation asked his deacon, after the morning service. "Yes, I did," said the deacon; and then, looking into the vacant interior of a hat that anted nothing but lining, he added, gloomily, "So did everybody else."

A YOUNG woman, prim and slender, seated herself at one of the tables reserved for ladies in a Sixth avenue oyster saloon, and after glancing over the bill of fare said to the waiter: "You may bring me, er—a—a—Satanized crab, hot." The waiter tiptoed to the cook, and whispered: "One deviled crab, hot as Satan!"

"LOOK here, boy," said the pompous Deacon Trulygood to a newsboy whom he found dancing a jig on the pavement last Sunday, "Do you know whose day this is?" "I may be a little off," answered the arab, squinting impudently through one eye at his questioner, "but I guess you don't carry it around in your vest pocket."

THE MUGWUMP.

The mugwump roosts in the hollow log,
The sagwag sits in the tree;
Whenever I hear the hogwig sing,
My heart is sad in me.

Whenever the snagpop toots his too
To the wail of the mipwag hen,
And the migfunk chirps in the chilly night,
You bet I'm lonely then.

A NORWEGIAN sea captain relates having come across an iceberg in mid-ocean, "in the heart of which about three hundred living seals could be seen disporting themselvs in the water inside of the berg." There is nothing wonderful about that. Seals always spend the winter disporting in the interior of icebergs. That is one reason why sealskin sacks are so high in the winter. If the captain had been discovered floating across the ocean with three hundred icebergs disporting themselvs under his waistcoat, or if a seal had been found with three hundred Norwegian captains under its skin, then some interest might be occasioned by the discovery.

A GROUP of merry skaters at the rink went nightly round;
Like the grinding of a grist mill rose that dry, persistent sound;
And I nightly went to watch them from the gallery's lofty place,
For the poetry of motion seemed to thrill each form and face.

Some were full-grown men and women; some were youths and maidens fair;
Some were children of all sizes, penetrating everywhere.
All were stirred by sport and frolic, as if life were running o'er.
'Twas a pretty sight to witness on the hard and burnished floor.

One, arrayed in bright, gay costume, so bewitchingly did skate
That my heart, when she was coming, would most wildly palpitate.
Without doubt the village beauty was this young and rosy lass,
And she tore my heart to tatters every time I saw her pass.

She could step in any fashion, turn her feet each dangerous way,
Pose in figures quite coquetish, backward sweep in dangerous sway;
On the floor she fairly floated, seeming free from thought or care,
Fairy-like and half enchanted streamed the ribbons from her hair.

Sometimes in her gay gyrations upward beamed her pretty face,
Which was all aglow with roses from the ardor of her race;
Then I fancied she had seen me, for she paused and and skated slow;
But among so many others how could she my passion know?

To that town I came a stranger—No one knew me there, I think,
Looking every night in wonder at this siren of the rink;
And I marveled, when so many were in dual marches thrown,
That she got no fellow's offer, but kept skating on alone.

Are the young men all demented? thought I, as she whirled along;
For their coldness seemed surprising, doing human nature wrong;
And I vowed, if she would take me (though I knew not how to skate),
I would tumble off on rollers, and whirl with her, tete-a-tete.

So I rallied the director, who was owner of the rink,
And while proffering my credentials, "You are Mr. Smith, I think,"
Said I, in the blandest manner, but with diffidence I own:
"Would you name me the fair damsel who is skating all alone?"

Here I thought a shrewd discretion was becoming on my part;
It would never do to tell him she had skated through my heart!
"What! that young girl in gay costume?" said he, without stare or frown;
"She's our champion roller skater—she's a tailor's wife, in town!"

I hav never tried the rollers, and I never shall, I think;
I hav something else to liv for than a noisy skating rink.
People say that all who use them fall and flounder on the floor;
So, dismissing all delusions, I skipped straightway through the door.

THE MODERN BALAAM.

News of the Week.

GENERAL GRANT is doing quite well. He was sixty-three years old last Monday.

MORE than forty lives were lost in a fire at Vicksburgh, Va., one day last week.

I. W. ENGLAND, business manager of the New York Sun, died last Saturday, aged 53.

THERE are five Russian ships in this port, waiting to see whether it is safe to take cargoes.

THE United States troops hav been withdrawn from Panama, and the place is again in the hands of the rebels.

THE Assembly Committee on Cities has voted to report the Freedom of Worship bill for the consideration of the House.

REPORT says that a regiment of Irishmen will be raised in Massachussetts to go over to Russia and help the czar against the queen.

FLOODS in Kansas hav destroyed many lives and hundreds of cattle. Destructiv freshets and tornadoes are reported also from Texas.

UNUSUALLY warm weather for the season has prevailed in Vermont. At White River Junction last week the thermometer reached 92 in the shade.

THE American McAll Association is the name of a New York society of Presbyterian women whose object is to rescue France from Infidelity. Mrs. Garfield, widow of the late president, is a member. The Rev. Mr. McAll is the activ agent of the society, which has already expended more than $25,000 for the object in view. The results hav not yet been made public.

TYPHOID fever prevails to such an extent in Plymouth, Pa., that business has been suspended except at the drug stores and undertaking establishments.

WAR is threatened between France and Egypt. The trouble arises from the Egyptian government having seized a French newspaper published at Cairo, in Egypt.

DEACON WALKER, of a church in Warsaw, N. Y., is sued for $5,000, charged with slandering Miss Beardsley, a singer and recently confirmed member of the same church.

BUDDENSIEK, the builder of the cheap houses that fell down when half completed, killing a workman and seriously injuring others, has been put under $30,000 bonds to appear and be tried for manslaughter.

CAPT. THOMAS PHELAN, the complainant against Short, who attempted to assassinate him in O'Donovan Rossa's newspaper office, has returned East from Kansas City, and will soon appear against his assailant.

THE people of Dublin, Ireland, gave the Prince of Wales a reception last Monday. It is said to hav been a very tony affair, and the prince expressed himself as highly gratified at the way he had been received by the Irish people.

GENERAL MIDDLETON, in command of the Canadian troops, had an engagement with the rebels of the Northwest territory on the 24th ult. and was repulsed with severe loss. Riel's lieutenant, Gal riel Dumont, is reported killed; further than that the rebel loss is not known. General Middleton reports that the half-breeds are excellent marksman, as nearly all his men killed were found to hav been shot through the head or heart.

THE health officers of New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Haven held a conference in this city last week to devise measures for keeping the cholera out of the country. It was decided to allow no rags to be landed until disinfected by the superheated steam process.

THERE are conflicting reports about the aspect of Russia and England toward each other. It is said that Russia is willing to hav a commission examin the differences, and it is also said that Russia has recalled her embassador from London. The Russians were defeated by the Afghans last Monday, with a loss of 1,700 killed.

JOHN HENNE, a prominent farmer, living near Egg Harbor City, N. J., committed suicide the other day by blowing the entire top of his head off with a shot-gun. He had been just released from the State Insane Asylum, where he had been confined for over a year, his insanity having been produced by religious excitement.

SUNDAY'S Herald contained an announcement that the Rev. N. B. Thompson would speak on dancing at the morning service. This "dancing at the morning service" is one of the later innovations, but it would seem that the old way of putting off dancing until evening must still retain its attractivness for many good Christians.

ADVICES from China say that the Shanghai Mercury of March 21st last announces that the Chinese viceroy of the provinces of Yunnan and Kweehong had just issued a decree ordering the destruction of all Catholic convents and the killing of all Catholic converts and foreigners. The Mercury adds that as a result of this decree several of the condemned convents had been razed and several hundred Catholic converts and foreigners had already been assassinated.

A DOZEN miners of the Homestead mine, near Leadville, Col., were overwhelmed in their cabins by a snowslide last Saturday and all perished from suffocation. As a mute witness to the fact that "where man is powerless heaven cannot save," one of the dead men was found kneeling by his bedside with hands clasped in the attitude of prayer.

DANIEL S. JONES, trustee and elder of the Third Reformed church of Philadelphia, is being tried publicly by his consistory upon the charge of retaining in his possession $20,000 belonging to the church. The further charges are made that Mr. Jones retained the silver communion service, that he disposed of church money without authority, and refused to pay the pastor's salary.

THE 321st anniversary of the birth of Shakspere was celebrated with much ceremony and festival, April 23d, in Stratford-on-Avon. The town was brilliantly decorated. Hundreds of strangers thronged the place. The vicar of Stratford Church announced during the memorial service that the Shakspere window presented by American visitors to the poet's tomb is completed. The window is to be set immediately over Shakspere's grave. The committee which has the unveiling ceremonies in charge, the vicar said, is making efforts to hav the dedication address prepared and delivered by James Russell Lowell. The decorations represent the "Seven Ages of Man." The window is said by critics to be a marvel of art.

Has Christianity Benefited Woman?

From the North American Review for May.

The assertion that woman owes all the advantages of her present position to the Christian church has been repeated so often that it is accepted as an established truth by those who would be unwilling to admit that all the injustice and degradation she has suffered might be logically traced to the same source. A consideration of woman's position before Christianity, under Christianity, and at the present time, shows that she is not indebted to any form of religion for one step of progress, or one new liberty; on the contrary, it has been through the perversion of her religious sentiments that she has been so long held in a condition of slavery. All religions thus far hav taught the headship and superiority of man, the inferiority and subordination of woman. Whatever new dignity, honor, and self-respect the changing theologies may hav brought to man, they hav all alike brought to woman but another form of humiliation. History shows that the condition of woman has changed with different forms of civilization, and that she has enjoyed in some periods greater honor and dignity and more personal property rights than hav been accorded to her in the Christian era. History shows, too, that the moral degradation of woman is due more to theological superstitions than to all other influences together. It is not to any form of religion that we are to look for woman's advancement, but to material civilization, to commerce, science, art, invention, to the discovery of the art of printing, and the general dissemination of knowledge. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization," calls attention to the fact that when woman became valuable in a commercial sense, in proportion as she secured material elevation and wealth through her property rights, she began to be treated with a deference and respect that the Christian church never accorded. In ancient Egypt, at the most brilliant period of its history, woman sat upon the throne and directed the civilization of the country. In the marriage relation she was supreme in all things—a rule that, according to Wilkinson, was productiv of lasting fidelity. As priestess she performed the most holy offices of religion, and to her is traced the foundation of Egyptian literature, the sacred songs of Isis, said by Plato to be ten thousand years old. Colleges for women were founded there twelve hundred years before Christ, and the medical profession was in the hands of women. It is a sad commentary on the Christianity of England and America to find professors of medical colleges of the nineteenth century less liberal than those in the earliest civilizations. In 1876 four professors in the College of Surgeons in London resigned because three women were licensed for the practice of midwifery, and the whole Royal College of Physicians thanked them for it. In 1869, the professors in the University of Edinburgh refused to teach four highly respectable women that had matriculated, and the students, echoing the contempt of their teachers, mobbed them. Nor did the conduct of American students, when women were admitted to the clinics of the Pennsylania and New York hospitals, reflect greater credit on American manhood.

All pagandom recognized a female priesthood, believing that national safety depended on them. Sybils wrote the books of Fate, and oracles where women presided were consulted by many nations. The pages of Roman history are gilded with the honor shown to women, and the civil laws for wives and mothers were more liberal in some respects than those in Christian countries hav ever been. The rights of property that were willingly secured to women by ancient Roman law were wrung out of the English government by the persistent efforts of women themselvs only three years ago. Among the Germanic nations woman was treated with marked respect. Tacitus givs us many striking pictures of the equal privileges of the men and women, of their mutual love and confidence, and their lofty virtue; the dignity of the German bride, and the marriage ceremony, and the significance of the wedding presents. Their marriage bond was strict and severe, alike for men and women. Almost alone among barbaric nations, they preserved monogamic relations. "In all things," says Tacitus, they consulted their women, who, with strong, muscular bodies, possessed clear, vigorous minds; and though, as in all warlike tribes, they performed the agricultural labor, yet they preserved their health and beauty to a great age, because they were respected and honored by their men, who were chaste and temperate in all things, and they enjoyed the inspiration of liberty and love in their daily toil.

The German scholar Curtius says: "The nativ selfishness of man has been the great power against which moralists, philosophers, and teachers hav had to contend." What sooner dissipates this than a deep affection for a noble woman? No love is so all-absorbing, so enduring, or givs such satisfaction to this mortal life; no power can so exalt and quicken civilization. It was this that elevated the Germanic tribes, and infused the poetic sentiment into their earliest literature. It is only in countries where Germanic ideas hav taken root that we see marks of any elevation of woman superior to that of pagan antiquity; and as the condition of the Germanic woman in her deepest paganism was so striking as to challenge the attention of Tacitus and his contemporaries, it is highly unreasonable to claim it as an achievement of Christianity. In fact, the Christian doctrin of marriage, as propounded by Paul, does not dignify woman as does that which German soundness of heart established at an early day. F. W. Newman, brother of the cardinal, one of the leading authorities on ecclesiastical subjects, says:

"With Paul, the sole reason for marriage is that man may gratify instinct without sin. He teaches that, but for this object, it would be better not to marry. He wishes that all in this respect were as free as himself, and calls it a special gift from God. He does not encourage a man to desire a mutual soul-union intimately to share his griefs and joys, one in whom the confiding heart can repose, whose smile shall reward and soften toil, whose voice shall beguile sorrow. He does not seem aware that the fascinations of woman refine and chasten society; that virtuous attachment has in it an element of respect which abashes and purifies, and which shields the soul, even when marriage is deferred; nor yet, that the union of two persons who hav no previous affection can seldom yield the highest fruit of matrimony, but often leads to the severest temptations. How should he know all this? Courtship before marriage did not exist in the society open to him, hence he treats the propriety of giving away a maiden as one in which her conscience, her likes, and dislikes, are not concerned (1 Cor. vii, 37, 38). As a result of the Apostolic doctrins, in the second, third, and following centuries, very gross views concerning the relations of the sexes prevailed; and they hav been everywhere transmitted where men's morality is exclusivly formed from the New Testament, viz., in the Armenian, Syrian, and Greek churches, and in the Romish church, in exact proportion as Germanic and poetical influences hav been repressed; that is, in proportion as the hereditary Christian doctrin has been kept pure from modern innovations. The marriage service of the Church of England, which incorporates the Pauline doctrin, is felt by English brides and bridegrooms to contain what is so offensiv and degrading that many clergymen mercifully make lawful omissions. The old Roman matron was morally as high as in modern Italy; nor is there any ground for supposing that modern women hav advantage over the ancient in Spain and Portugal, where Germanic hav been counteracted by Moorish influences. The relativ position of the sexes in Homeric Greece exhibits nothing materially different from the present day. In Armenia and Syria perhaps Christianity has done the service of extinguishing polygamy; this is creditable, though nowise remarkable, as Judaism also in time unlearned polygamy, and made an unbidden improvement on Moses."

Rev. William Ellery Channing, in his essay on Milton's character and writings, says:

"There is no prohibition of polygamy in the New Testament. It is an indisputable fact that, although Christianity was first preached in Asia, which had been from the earliest ages the seat of polygamy, the apostles never denounced it as a crime, and never required their converts to put away all wives but one."

Hence, we cannot credit Christianity with woman's elevation from the degradation of polygamy, especially as it exists under our own government to-day, in the territory of Utah and elsewhere, and concubinage is recognized by statute law in some of the Southern states. The historian Hallam says, in his "History of Literature:"

"Love, with the ancient poets, is often tender, sometimes virtuous, but never accompanied by a sense of deference or inferiority. This elevation of the female sex through the voluntary submission of the stronger is a remarkable fact in the philosophical history of Europe. It originated partially in the Teutonic manners. Some hav said 'the reverence and adoration of the female sex which has descended to our own times is the offspring of the Christian dispensation' But until it can be shown that Christianity establishes any such principle, we must look a little farther down for its origin. . . . Without rejecting the Teutonic influence, we might ascribe more direct efficacy to the favor shown towards women in succession to lands, through inheritance or dower, by the later Roman law."

Gallantry, in the sense of a general homage to the fair, a respectful deference to woman, independent of personal attachment, first became a perceptible element of European manners in the south of France at the end of the tenth century. This spirit is not found in the ancient poetry of the Franks or Anglo-Saxons, but it is fully developed in the sentiments and usages of northern France. Gallantry toward women was practiced by the Goths before they were acquainted with Christianity. Catholicism has greatly diminished the political and priestly powers of women (see Comte, "Philosophie Positiv," Vol. V., pp. 221–223). It would seem, then, that the authorities are against the proposition that the moral elevation of womankind is due to Christianity, and tell us that it is due to altogether different causes, among which we find early Germanic influences, and the modern literature of Germany, containing pure and noble views of love; ancient customs, giving woman property rights, and favors shown to woman by later Roman law; French influence; gallantry; the springing up of home life in the dark ages. The brave words and deeds of reformers in every generation, proclaiming the principles of justice and equality for all humanity, must be recognized as one of the essential factors in the civilization in which woman has had a share. With regard to intellectual growth and elevation, we hav the same causes alike for man and woman. What either acquired was in opposition to the church, which sedulously tried to keep all learning within itself. Man, seeking after knowledge, was opposed by the church; woman, by both church and man. Educated men in our own day, who hav outgrown many of the popular theological superstitions, do not share with the women of their households the freedom they themselvs enjoy. Hence, it is not unusual to find the wives of clergymen far more bigoted than their husbands. Among the Greeks there was a class of women that possessed absolute freedom, surrounded by the wisest men of their day. They devoted themselvs to study and thought, which enabled them to add to their other charms an intense intellectual fascination, and to make themselvs the center of a literary society of matchless splendor. Aspasia was as famous for her genius as for her beauty. She is said to hav composed many of Pericles's most famous orations, and inspired his loftiest flights of eloquence. Socrates, too, owned his deep obligations to Diotema. In the society of this remarkable type of Grecian womanhood the most brilliant artists, poets, historians, and philosophers found their highest inspiration. True, the position of these women was questionable; but as they were the only class to whom learning and liberty were permitted, they illustrate the civilization of the period.

The question is pertinent, Does the same class in Christian civilization enjoy as high culture and equal governmental protection? Since English and American statesmen, by recent legislation, hav proved that they consider this phase of social life a necessity, why do not the church and the state throw some shield of protection over the class of whom Lecky, in his "History of Morals," speaks so tenderly? What has Christianity done for this type of womanhood? Hav eighteen centuries of its influence mitigated the miseries of this phase of life one iota? No; nor ever will, until the mother of the race is recognized as equal in every position in life, honored and dignified at every altar; not until another revision of the Protestant Bible shall strike from its pages all invidious distinctions based on sex. The masculin and feminin elements of humanity, in exact equilibrium, are as necessary to the order and harmony of the world of morals as are the centripetal and centrifugal forces exactly balanced in the world of matter. As long as the religion of a nation teaches the subordination of woman, of the moral and spiritual elements of humanity to physical force, a pure civilization is impossible. Just as slavery in the South, with its lessons of obedience, degraded every black man in the Northern states, so does an accepted system of prostitution, with its lessons of subjection and self-sacrifice, degrade the ideal womanhood everywhere.

In harmony with the pagan worship of an ideal womanhood of sibyls, oracles, and priestesses, women held prominent positions in the church for several centuries after Christ. We hav proof of this in the restrictions that at a later period were placed upon them by canon laws. The Council of Laodicea, three hundred and sixty-five years after Christ, forbade the ordination of women to the ministry, and prohibited them from entering the altar. The Council of Orleans, five hundred and eleven years after Christ, consisting of twenty-six bishops and priests, promulgated a canon that, on account of their frailty, women must be excluded from the deaconship. Nearly three hundred years later we find the Council of Paris complaining that women serve at the altar, and even giv to the people the body and blood of Jesus Christ. Through these canons we hav the negativ proof that for centuries women preached, baptized, administered the sacrament, and filled various offices of the church; and that ecclesiastics, through prohibitory canons, annulled these rights.

In the fifth century the church fully developed the doctrin of original sin, making woman its weak and guilty author. To St. Augustine, whose early life was licentious and degraded, we are indebted for this idea, which was infused into the canon law, and was the basis of all the persecutions woman endured for centuries, in the drift of Christian opinion from the extremes of polygamy to celibacy, from the virtues of chivalry to the cruelties of witchcraft, when the church taught its devotees to shun woman as a temptation and defilement. It was this persecution, this crushing out of the feminin element in humanity, more than all other influences combined, that plunged the world into the Dark Ages, shadowing the slowly rolling centuries till now with woman's agonies and death, paralyzing literature, science, commerce, education, changing the features of art, the sentiments of poetry, the ethics of philosophy, from the tender, the loving, the beautiful, the grand, to the stern, the dark, the terrible. Even the paintings representing Jesus were gradually changed from the gentle, watchful shepherd to the stern, unrelenting judge. Harrowing representations of the temptation, the crucifixion, the judgment-day, the Inferno, were intensified and elaborated by Dante and Milton. Painter and poet vied with each other in their gloomy portrayals, while crafty bishops coined these crude terrors into canons, and timid, dishonest judges allowed them to throw their dark shadows over the civil law.

The influence of the church on woman's civil position was equally calamitous. A curious old black-letter volume, published in London in 1632, entitled, "The Lawes and Resolutions of Woman's Rights," says, "The reason why women hav no controul in Parliament, why they make no laws, consent to none, abrogate none, is their Original Sin." This idea is the chief block in the way of woman's advancement at this hour. It was fully set forth by the canon law, with wearisome repetition, and when, in the fifteenth century, the sacred scriptures were collected and first printed, the spirit of these canons and all that logically grew out of them were engrafted on its pages, making woman an afterthought in the creation, the author of sin, in collusion with the devil, sex a crime, marriage a condition of slavery for woman and defilement for man, and maternity a curse to be attended with sorrow and suffering that neither time nor knowledge could ever mitigate, a just punishment for having effected the downfall of man. And all these monstrous ideas, emanating from the bewildered brains of men in the dark ages, under an exclusivly masculin religion, were declared to be the work of God, penned by writers specially inspired by his spirit.

Just at the period when the civil code began to recognize the equality and independence of the wife in the marriage relation, the church, to which woman had reason to look for protection, either blindly or perversely gave the whole force of its power against woman's equality in the family, and in fact against her influence altogether. In chapter v. of Maine's "Ancient Law" we hav a clear statement of the influence of canon law on the liberty of person and property that Roman women then enjoyed. Speaking of their freedom, he says:

"Christianity tended from the very first to narrow this remarkable liberty." "No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institution is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by middle Roman law." "The expositors of the canon law hav deeply injured civilization." "There are many vestiges of a struggle between the secular and ecclesiastical principles, but the canon law nearly everywhere prevailed. In some of the French provinces married women of a rank below nobility obtained all the powers of dealing with property which Roman jurisprudence had allowed, and this local law has been largely followed by the code Napoleon. The systems, however, which are least indulgent to married women are invariably those which hav followed the canon law exclusivly, or those which, from the lateness of their contact with European civilization, hav never had their archaisms weeded out."

By the dishonoring of womanhood on the ground of original sin, by the dishonoring of all relations with her as carnal and unclean, the whole sex touched a depth of moral degradation that it had never known before. Rescued in a measure from the miseries of polygamy, woman was plunged into the more degrading and unnatural condition of celibacy. Out of this grew the terrible persecutions of witchcraft, which raged for centuries, women being its chief victims (see Lecky's "History of Rationalism"). They were hunted down by the clergy, tortured, burnt, drowned, dragged into the courts, tried, and condemned for crimes that never existed but in the minds of religious devotees. The clergy sustained witchcraft as Bible doctrin far into the eighteenth century, until the spirit of rationalism laughed the whole thing to scorn, and gave mankind a more cheerful view of life. The Reformation brought no new hope to woman. The great head of the movement, while declaring the right of individual conscience and judgment above church authority, as if to warn woman that she had no share in this liberty, was wont to say, "No gown worse becomes a woman than that she should be wise." Here is the key-note to the Protestant pulpit for three centuries, and it grates harshly on our ears to-day. The Catholic church, in its holy sisterhoods, so honored and revered, and in its worship of the Virgin Mary, Mother of Jesus, has preserved some recognition of the feminin element in its religion; but from Protestantism it is wholly eliminated. Religions like the Jewish and Christian, which make God exclusivly male and man supreme, consign woman logically to the subordinate position assigned her in Mohammedanism. History has perpetuated this tradition, and her subjection has existed as an invariable element in Christian civilization. It could not be otherwise, with the Godhead represented as a trinity of males. The old masters in the galleries of art hav left us their ideals of the Trinity in three bearded male heads. No heavenly Mother is recognized in the Protestant world.

The present position of woman in the spirit of our creeds and codes is far behind the civilization of the age, and unworthy the representativ women of this day. And now, as ever, the strongest adverse influence to her elevation comes from the church, judging from its biblical expositions, the attitude of the clergy, and the insignificant status that woman holds in the various sectarian organizations. For nearly forty years there has been an organized movement in England and America to liberalize the laws in relation to woman, to secure a more profitable place in the world of work, to open the colleges for higher education, and the schools of medicin, law, and theology, and to giv woman an equal voice in the government and religion of the country. These demands, one by one, are slowly being conceded by the secular branch of the government, while the sectarian influence has been uniformly in the opposit direction. Appeals before legislativ assemblies, constitutional conventions, and the highest courts hav been respectfully heard and decided, while propositions for the consideration even of some honors to women in the church hav uniformly been received with sneers and denunciations by leading denominations, who quote scripture freely to maintain their position. Judges and statesmen hav made able arguments in their respectiv places for woman's civil and political rights; but where shall we look for sectarian leaders that, in their general assemblies, synods, or other ecclesiastical conventions, hav advocated a higher position for women in the church? The attitude of the clergy is the same as in bygone centuries, modified somewhat, on this as on all other questions, by advancing civilization. The Methodists hav a lay ministry, but they do not ordain women. Liberal clergymen in other sects hav been arraigned and tried by their general assemblies for allowing women to preach in their pulpits. In imitation of the high churches in England, we hav some in this country in which boys from twelve to fifteen supply the place of women in the choir, that the sacred altars may not be defiled by the inferior sex—an early Christian idea. The discourses of clergymen, when they enlarge on the condition of woman, read more like canons in the fifth century than sermons in the nineteenth, addressed to those who are their peers in religious thought and scientific attainment. The Rev. Morgan Dix's Lenten lectures last spring, and Bishop Littlejohn's last triennial sermon, are fair specimens. The latter recommends that all the liberal legislation of the past forty years for woman should be reversed, while the former is the chief obstacle in the way of woman's admission to Columbia College. And these fairly represent the sentiments of the vast majority, who never refer to the movement for woman's enfranchisment but with ridicule and contempt—sentiments that they insidiously infuse into all classes of women under their influence. None of the leading theological seminaries will admit women who are preparing for the ministry, and none of the leading denominations will ordain them when prepared. The Universalists, Unitarians, and Quakers are the only sects that ordain women. And yet women are the chief supporters of the church to-day. They make the surplices and gowns, get up the fairs and donation-parties, and are the untiring beggars for its benefit. They supply its enthusiasm, and are continually making large bequests to its treasury; and their reward is still the echo of the old canon law of woman's subjection, from pulpit to pulpit throughout Christendom. Though England and America are the two nations in which the Christian religion is dominant, and can boast the highest type of womanhood, and the greatest number in every department of art, science, and literature, yet even here women hav been compelled to clear their own way for every step in progress. Not one wrong has been righted until women themselvs made organized resistance against it. In the face of every form of opposition they are throwing off the disabilities of the old common law, which Lord Brougham said long ago "was in relation to women the opprobrium of the age and Christianity." And not until they make an organized resistance against the withering influence of the canon law will they rid themselvs of the moral disabilities growing out of the theologies of our times. When I was standing near the last resting-place of the Rev. Charles Kingsley not long ago, his warning words for woman, in a letter to John Stuart Mill, seemed like a voice from the clouds, saying with new inspiration and power, "This will never be a good world for woman until the last remnant of the canon law is civilized off the face of the earth."

"As when our nation was first founded its loudest and greatest word was liberty, a single term filling all the air, but as now that word is hidden and silent beneath the infinit results of that freedom—the term hidden by its results like the earth hidden by the flowers it produces—so the immense doctrins of our religion hav traveled out from their first estate and gladly permit us to labor in the world of duty and thought they hav created from the dust—a new Cornelia hiding herself in the glory of her sons."

This is a feather from the wing of David Swing, the eloquent, liberal, Christian pastor of one of the wealthiest churches in Chicago. How beautiful the mild illusion of serenity rising from the stomach to the brain after a truffled turkey with choice Burgundy!

Capitalism says with the French king, "Why should the people be hungry? I hav dined well." Christianity has blossomed and fruited for this man, and he addresses his gratulations with confident sympathy to his brothers and sisters elect of Plutus.

And liberty—see "the infinit results of this now silent word, which hide it as flowers hide the earth." See it in the freedom of a million tramps to wander in pursuit of happiness at 0 Farenheit; hear in it the ironclad oaths of submission abjuring the trades union conspiracies, inspired by pernicious greed of wages, which capitalist syndicates impose, in readmitting strikers to the privilege of earning fifty cents per diem. Trumpet these results of liberty to the United States army, marched to Oklahoma, defending its public lands against actual settlers for the use of the cattle kings. Note it in the uninfluenced freedom of the ballot; verify it in the equality of all industries and all classes under tariff protection; praise it in the universal providence for education; admire it in the poor, seated beside the rich in splendid churches, and enjoying together the "love feast" of the Christian sacrament. Yes, Anglo-American liberty wedded with its fashionable Christianity are a model pair of consorts.

EDGEWORTH.

Canadian Notes.

Albert Hall was filled on Sunday evening last to hear Ex.-Rev. J. H. Burnham set forth the reasons why he left the degrading superstition of Christianity and darkness of theology and priestcraft and came forth into the open light of day guided by observation, experience, and reflection. The crowded audience heartily cheered the lecturer as he described his pilgrimage from the vain imaginings of supernaturalism to the region of facts and realities.

Send ten cents to the TRUTH SEEKER office for a copy of a little book entitled "False Claims," by J. E. Remsburg. It is full of valuable information put together in a striking and agreeable manner. It is worth many times its price. It contains government statistics giving the crimes of the clergy and how the various sects of Christianity fill our jails, lunatic asylums, and penitentiaries. Send ten cents to the TRUTH SEEKER office and get a copy by return mail.

Taylor, in giving a catalog of the ridiculous and idiotic dogmas of Christianity, ending in celibacy proclaimed as the pre-eminently pure condition, says that fortunately these dogmas and mysteries hav become a dead letter. Idle dreams subtilized by metaphysics, the early Christian predictions remained unfulfilled; the sovereign judge did not come in the clouds; bodies, like the souls themselvs, failed to rise again, as the grave could witness; good and evil hav continued their rivalry on earth; slavery still flourishes; neighbors still hate or love each other according to their mutual dealing; people still follow their course according to the jealousies created by want, interest, climate, race, or language, and Christianity discovered at last that it has effected no change in nature; that the passions ruled the world; that man ate and worked to eat; loved and begot issue; accumulated wealth and knowledge for his personal aggrandizement; lived neither on ecstasy nor on martyrdom, but regulated his actions according to worldly considerations, heedless of the puffed-out emptiness of funereal hopes and fears. In a word, man at last began to think and ceased to dream except in his moments of relaxation. Then being intrusted with the direction of society, by the very ruin of civilization—a ruin brought about by itself—Christianity found it necessary to reckon with the realities. Its anti-social principles it was fain to modify; hence its intolerant and fanatical interference, its inordinate ambitions, its monopoly of all power and wealth. Hence, also, those perpetual contradictions between precept and practice; those hypocritical persecutions that preyed upon a humanity reduced to a state of childhood, and all the iniquities of that law of love—"save the mark!" Hence, lastly, that long and grievous chaos from which we hav still but half emerged. After the death of Jesus of Nazareth, for many years Christianity dragged slowly along, its followers few in number and despised in the popular estimation. But, by and by, as the centuries crept along, mankind sunk to the lower level of Christianity. We find that the Christians, despised by Tacitus and by the Antonines as well as by Lucian, or else summarily condemned as public enemies, which they were in reality no less than in theory, had turned both tolerance and martyrdom to equally good account. The emperors who in their anger against the Stoics were driven from time to time to proscribe the philosophers, the only real support of the state and of civilization, never understood the nature of the movement by which they were soon to be swept away. Ever since the second century they found themselvs taken at a disadvantage, by a power which had all the forces of the East at its back. Already formidable by their numbers, the Christians seized the weapons of their adversaries, pointing against Hellenic thought the very doctrins and arguments supplied to them by their education itself. The old world had swept away its landmarks. One great cause of the rise of the church was that the various teachings and philoscphies which opposed it required to be understood, were addressed to the intelligence. The Christian dogmas needed only to be believed, repeated parrot-like—"I believe." And here, as ever, the law of the least effort was destined to prevail, awakened and swept away by the very movement it hoped to resist. The philosophies of Plotmus, Iamblichus, Julian, Proclus, each and every one of them became merely one of the elements of the triumph of Christianity.

Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, in a late lecture on evolution, dwelt on "spontaneous generation" and the "unknowable." Seeing that there is no absolute knowledge—all knowledge being relativ—therefore, as far as we are concerned, there is no absolute at all, because we can never hav any knowledge of it. That being the case, do not some writers waste a deal of time in dwelling so much on this absolute and unknowable? Many claim a supernatural origin for diseases; they point triumphantly at hydrophobia and other virulent forms of disarrangement of the animal functions, which are only transmitted by direct contact with the original poison. "Now, Mr. Evolutionist," says the Christian believer in the creativ theory, "tell us the origin of these diseases?" The answer is that although we may not hav evidence of their spontaneous production in our own day, they must hav had their origin at some previous period in climatic and other conditions of environment operating on the organisms which first displayed the phenomena of the diseases in question. Just as in the question of the origin of animal life, while some affirm and some deny its spontaneous production, at the present time all evolutionists agree that it must hav arisen in that manner at some former period in the earth's history, for nature is all there is, and contains within herself the promis and potency of all that is, and performs all her operations of herself alone, without the meddling of the gods.

Toronto, April 24, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

The Liberal Club.

The year 1885 has had its spring opening within the last few days, and weather that cannot be surpassed has made happy the inhabitants of New York. Friday evening was especially salubrious. The night was filled with music. As a visitor at the 376th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club pursued his way toward 220 East Fifteenth street, he encountered two hand-organs, a perambulating piano, and a German band. The cares that infest the day had taken to the woods. At the hall a goodly number of cheerful people were assembled. The meeting promised to be an interesting one, as Mr. Albert Chavannes, of Adair Creek, Tenn., was to lecture on "Happiness and Its Relation to Conduct." The reporter secured a seat, and turned back his coat so that the light shone on his new Wettstein badge pin in such a manner that its beauties were not concealed.

The speaker of the evening was introduced to the audience by Mr. Wakeman with some appropriate and complimentary remarks.

Mr. Chavannes, who is an intellectual looking gentleman in the prime of life, came forward and was received with applause. When he began speaking it was observed that his speech was cumbered with a slight French accent that rather detracted from its effectivness. Mr. Chavannes said that from the reports of the meetings of the club which he had read, he judged they were of a somewhat exciting character. He proposed to introduce a slight variation. Happiness, he said, was the great object of life. Formerly we sought this by making ourselvs miserable in the name of an unknown God. But, growing wiser, we find that our duty lies in the direction of making ourselvs happy. No man is responsible for the happiness of another. If it were once granted that he is, there would be no end to the obligation, and each would find himself burdened with the welfare not only of his family and neighbors, but of his fellow-citizens, fellow-countrymen, and finally of the whole world. Our first care should be health. A person in the middle of life ought to be ashamed to be sick. If a man find himself unhealthy, except by reason of some contagion, or if he is unhappy, he may be sure he has done wrong. When two persons cannot go the same way and both be happy they should separate, and each endeavor to be happy by himself. The speaker would rather be alone and in harmony with himself down in Tennessee, than to beat the gong of popular discord in New York. In conclusion he would say that if any man was happier than he, he would sit at the feet of that man and learn of him.

This lecture, though hampered by the speaker's inability to surmount the difficulties of English pronunciation, was full of thought and would make good reading.

Mr. Huhn, protagonist among the critics, protested that we hav too much happiness. The people in the squalid tenements of Baxter street were happy when they should be in a state of revolt. Vanderbilt and Gould were probably happy, but they were not, properly speaking, human beings, but well-cared-for hogs. They had their heels in the eye of the prostrate workingman, and occasionally turned around to keep the man awake. To illustrate this idea Mr. Huhn revolved gracefully upon one heel.

Mr. Sutherland spoke of the necessity of preserving the health by proper sanitation. If the money put into useless churches were expended in the construction of sewers greater happiness would result.

Mr. Langerfelt said somebody should tell Mr. Chavannes where he stands. He had plenty of followers if he only knew it. The parks were full of them. They were tramps, who followed the line of the least resistance and sought only their own happiness. If we would hav civilization each should be willing to be a wheel or a crank, as the case might be, in the social machine.

Mr. Cohen held that health was not always essential to happiness. For instance, General Grant was probable happier sick than he would hav been in good health while his colleague Fish was being tried and sent to jail.

Mr. Chavannes replied briefly. He was afraid Mr. Langerfelt did not hav ability enough to comprehend the subject, and was, therefore, unable to discuss it intelligently. Mr. Chavannes thanked the audience for their kindness. Whenever he returned to New York he should be happy to meet them again. They would all hold a prominent place in his esteem.

After the regular proceedings were over, Professor Willey introduced Miss Millie Reynolds, of Chicago, who gave two recitations. The first was about the voices of the different church bells, and was marvelously rendered, Miss Reynolds imitating the clanging and reverberation of a bell with wonderful fidelity. The audience were delighted, and the young lady gave them another—the "Rock of Ages"—which illustrated in a beautiful way the general prevalence of superstition. Mr. Wakeman took up the same subject in a short speech, and showed that the abiding rock of ages was humanity, and that the real saviors are the men and women who suffer for us and redeem us every day.

A business meeting followed. The result was the election of T. B. Wakeman for president; Stephen Pearl Andrews, Dr. E B. Foote, Jr., and E. W. Chamberlain, first, second, and third vice-presidents respectivly; Prof. A. L. Rawson, corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald and George E. Macdonald, first and second recording secretaries; James Morris, treasurer; Edward King, librarian, with Mr. Sutherland as assistant; and Courtlandt Palmer, Isaac Rosenbourgh, and Theron C. Leland, trustees. The change of presidents came about through a suggestion that it would be proper to elect a number of distinguished men as honorary members, and that among them Mr. Parton, the former president, could be placed with equal honor both to himself and the club. A desire seemed manifest, also, to giv Mr. Wakeman some sort of recognition for his devoted services as chairman of the meetings, and the measure was carried unanimously. After passing a vote of thanks to Mr. Parton for his interest in the club, and for allowing his name to adorn its card as president, the meeting adjourned.

The lectures for May will be as follows: 1st, "Free Competition," by Henry W. Cherouny; 8th, "Socialism in America," by S. E. Shevitch, editor of the Volks Zeitung; 15th, "The New Education—Manual Training an Indispensable Department of It," by Courtlandt Palmer; 22d, "Wisdom Traps," by Hermon H. Shook; 29th, "Why are we Liberals?" by George Krahmer.

This will end the season, and the meetings will be adjourned until the first Friday in September. The audiences hav steadily improved in intelligence and character, and interest has never failed to increase. The club looks forward to a good old age, which the enlightenment it has shed upon the world at large will make green and cheerful.

Bacon as a Poet.

The judgment of Bacon's biographer, the late Mr James Spedding, in regard to the great chancellor's poetic faculty is certainly entitled to much weight, and the more because it was recorded before Mr. Spedding had heard of the claim that Bacon wrote the plays and poems of Shakspere. He says:

"Bacon had all the natural faculties which a poet wants: a fine ear for meter, a fine feeling for imaginativ effect in words, and a vein of poetic passion:

"'Thou carriest man away as with a tide,
Then down swim all his thoughts that mounted high,
Much like a mocking dream that will not bide,
But flows before the sight of waking eye;
Or as the grass that cannot term obtain,
To see the summer come about again.'"

The italics are by Mr. Spedding, who adds:

"The thought in the second line could not well be fitted with imagery, words, and rhythm more apt and imaginativ, and there is a tenderness of expression in the concluding couplet which comes manifestly out of a heart in sensitiv sympathy with nature, and fully capable of the poet's faith

"'that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.'

"Take again as a sample of versification the opening of the one hundred and fourth Psalm:

"'Father and King of powers both high and low,
Whose sounding praise all creatures serve to blow;
My voice shall with the rest strike up thy praise,
And carol of thy works and wondrous ways.
But who can blaze thy beauties, Lord, aright?
They turn the brittle beams of mortal sight.
Upon thy head thou wear'st a glorious crown,
All set with virtues, polished with renown.
Thence round about a silver veil doth fall
Of crystal light, mother of colors all.'

"The heroic couplet could hardly do its work better in the hands of Dryden.

"The truth is that Bacon was not without the 'fine frenzy' of the poet, but the world into which it transported him was one which, while it promised visions more glorious than any poet could imagin, promised them upon the express condition that fiction should be utterly prohibited and excluded. Had it taken the ordinary direction, I hav little doubt that it would hav carried him to a place among the greatest poets; but it was the study of his life to refrain his imagination and keep it within the modesty of truth; aspiring no higher than to be a faithful interpreter of nature, waiting for the day when the kingdom of man should come."

"Holt" sneers at the grammar in this line of one of Bacon's versified Psalms:

"Help, Lord! for godly men h av took their flight."

For a short answer to such shallow criticism take the following from Shakspere:

"Hast thou not spoke like thunder on my side?"
"Thou hast spoke too much already; get thee gone."

ICONOCLAST.

New Zealand Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Here I am in this far-off land in the South Seas, in the beautiful city of Auckland, where I arrived safe and sound, January 14th, by the steamship Zelandia, without any incident worthy of note, except to say that if any sea voyage is delightful, this twenty days' steam from 'Frisco to Auckland through these Pacific waters may be called such.

But to my mind the poet who said, "Life on the ocean wave and a home on the rolling deep," was a great crank. The wide waste of water lying between me and those I love, and communication reduced to once a month, givs me at times a sense of loneliness I never felt in America when absent from home.

The physical aspect of New Zealand is like that of California, only that it is always green, and no long periods of drouth, and in climate, scenery, shrubs, and flowers, I seem to be in my own dear California, except the humidity of the atmosphere, which, under the same degree of heat as California, is much more oppressiv than in our dry climate at home. But then I am not here for my health, but for work, and of the country and people I will write you more when I know more about them; and as I gaze at the Maoris, or nativ people, on the street I think of Peter Parley's Geography and the stories of Captain Cook and the Cannibal Islands of my boyhood days. But how changed! Like magic great cities hav sprung up, and the swarms from Britain's overcrowded hive hav filled the country with civilized life, and the Maoris, like the American Indians, are rapidly fading away. Boiled and roasted missionary is not permitted now, but should be, as they hav been only a curse to these wild and, but for the tattooing, fine-looking people.

Auckland is a beautiful city on more than seven hills, with a harbor and outlook quite similar to those of San Francisco, only on a smaller scale. Volcanic peaks, whose yawning craters long since ceased to pour out their fiery flood, are now clad in green to hide the scars and strife of long ago, and to stand on the top of Mount Eden, a favorit resort lying within the limits of the city, and view city, county, and harbor, is a rare treat, and yet no more beautiful than our own country, although beneath the Southern Cross. And, on the whole, I am not prepared to trade away any part of America for New Zealand.

Next Sunday is my seventeenth and last lecture in Auckland. From the first, we hav had a large opera house well filled with wonderfully appreciativ people, and hav made a host of friends to the cause of Freethought.

I go to Dunedin for a six weeks' engagement, and am to be in Sydney by the first of June.

My wife will join me here in May, for I find, in the language of sacred writ, "that it is not good for a man to be alone."

Friend Eugene, I received the few ANNUALS, but was sorry that the full order did not come to hand. Every Freethinker wanted one, and I could hav sold a large number here.

I saw a box of books from you, opened in Mr. Campbell's book-store the other day, among which was our good Sister Wixon's beautiful book. It made me feel quite at home to find our authors down here, and I think your book trade will increase rapidly in the colonies.

Our books cost much more here than English printed works, but they are much better in many ways. The cause of Freethought is on the move here and promising much. The religion is stupid and rotten to the core.

The press of the country is licking the dust from the heels of priest and king, both thieves and destructiv to mental liberty, and the preachers fairly groan to think that the law will not permit them to incarcerate me in a dungeon. Thank heaven (or the other place) their day is past never to come again. And as I am brought in contact with this old leaven of cussedness in government and religion, brought here from the Old World, I am more fully confirmed in my detestation of all despotisms which enslave the masses, mind and body, and I only wish I could liv twenty-five years more to help spike every gun, and also every son of a gun, engaged in promoting superstition of any kind among the people.

The hospitality and kindness of these English and Scotch people are refreshing compared with the hurry and bustle of American life. Every night I am invited out, and the entire family insist upon seeing you safe home to your quarters.

Temperance fanaticism and Salvation Army nonsense run riot here, and the way they drink beer and run horses is a caution to young sinners, and sporting seems to be a great card all through the colonies. A corrupt system of religion, together with an effete system of government, has left a cruel mark on the intellect and morals of these people, but the day-star of hope shines out in the tendency everywhere to break the chains of both church and state, and raise the standard of mental liberty.

Of the product and export of New Zealand I am not as yet fully informed, but think it is extremely light, and the apparent prosperity I see in this beautiful city of 35,000 inhabitants largely rests upon capital borrowed from England by the colonial as also by the municipal government. It seems to me a very doubtful system.

These few remarks must suffice for this time, and until I am better acquainted with the country at large.

My prospects are good, and I will keep the readers of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator posted as the battle proceeds. Will the Boston Investigator please copy this time, as my head and hands are so full just now? Yours, for all truth,

News and Notes from the Field.

LIBERAL, MO., DODGE CITY, KAN., AND THE WESTERN FRONTIER—GREAT SUCCESS AND ENTHUSIASM.

Liberal, Mo., is a pleasant spot indeed, with abundant promis of the future. Two or three railroads are now coming in there, and its growth is certain. Our good friend, F. L. Yale, gave us a breezy ride over its rolling prairies. From the gentle declivities about town we could look twenty miles off, and the landscape was surpassingly lovely in the brilliant spring day. This is a grand experiment, and shows the practical power of our philosophy. It is upon an assured basis, and, as time passes, will be more and more a beacon light of liberty. A village without superstition—that is a marvel indeed, even in this nineteenth century. But these marvels shall become common when science replaces theology.

Mr. Walser pointed out to us the commanding eminence whereon shall be built the Orphans' Home, and also the Home for the Aged. This, I think, is a most worthy undertaking. Those who hav bravely fought the battle of Liberalism, and who hav but little or nothing of this world's goods to depend upon when the snows of age are on their honored brows, should hav a home where they can hav harmonious surroundings, where they can be happy as the end of life approaches, and dwell in the temple of nature and rejoice in her kindliest smiles, and meet death with a courage born of the sublimities of science; where they can hav beautiful friendships, the inspiration of splendid thoughts, and the delight of congenial labors. It seems a blessed dream to me, when I hav passed this campaign work and won some chance to rest, to come to the bosom of these boundless prairies, and amid gentle farewells sink into the unconscious glory of the universe. Alas! how many of those who hav been most faithful workers hav come to an old age of poverty and deprivation, and their last hours are saddened by bitter disappointment! It is but right that the American Secular Union in its future prosperous career should provide not only fields of work for the strong and gifted, but also a home for those who hav finished the fight, and who need all the sympathy, the encouragement, and the honor that those who come after them can render. I sincerely hope that such a temple of noble affection will arise on the site chosen for it by our bold pioneer, and that the gratitude of Liberals will be expressed in a practical way to those whose youth has been consecrated to unselfish toil, and whose old age therefore should be free from drudgery, a peaceful stream flowing in sunny joy to that mysterious darkness made forever beautiful with the flowers of human hope and love.

Close by the eminence whereat this happy dream shall be fulfilled is another, reserved for the great American Secular University, which will be another glorious star in the scientific progress of humanity.

We had good meetings at Liberal, crowded houses, and most appreciativ listeners. Messrs. Walser, Yale, Thayer, of the National Hotel, Replogle, editor of the Liberal, and others did all they could to make our visit enjoyable, and we would hav liked to linger longer in this Infidel paradise, but duty hurried us on.

We had the good fortune to come in contact with the vigorous young editor of the Nonconformist, Mr. Vincent. He is alive with Western enterprise, and his paper is becoming a powerful organ of our cause. There is no doubt of success with such dauntless spirits at the front who hav the mental and physical strength to do the most excellent work.

I would say that Liberal is no place for one who expects to get along without work. Each must earn his own living, unless he already has a competence. Liberal is not wealthy, and they who come expecting to do nothing but dream will be woefully disappointed. The man who is willing to work will find in time a generous reward, but the loafer will soon know that his room is better than his company.

The following from the Liberal will show the pleasant nature of our reception by this industrious colony, and how harmoniously they join in the great national movement:

"THE SECULAR ORATORS, WATTS AND PUTNAM.

"These noted workers lectured at the U. M. L. Hall Tuesday and Wednesday nights to crowded houses. On Tuesday evening Mr. Putnam opened the evening's work with his lecture on 'The Demands of Humanity,' and spoke earnestly and convincingly for forty-five minutes, when he closed amidst a storm of applause from the audience. Mr. Walser then introduced Charles Watts, who occupied the remainder of the evening with his lecture on 'Secularism and Christianity.' He possesses great reasoning powers, a deep, strong voice, earnest manner, and concise, fluent expression, and is the most eloquent speaker that we hav had the pleasure of hearing.

"On Wednesday evening Mr. Putnam again delivered his lecture on 'The New Heaven and Earth,' first, which occupied about twenty-five minutes. Then Mr. Watts occupied the balance of the evening in delivering a most eloquent lecture on 'The Aims and Methods of Liberalism.' As we anticipated, these lectures were a rare treat, and by far the best that we hav ever heard on the subject.

"These gentlemen are doing the greatest work in secularizing the thinking portion of Protestantism that has ever been done before under the auspices of the League, and perhaps more than the sum total of what has been done before, except the efforts of Ingersoll. Mr. Watts has complete command of the subject, in addition to his great oratorical powers, while Mr. Putnam is a most persistent worker, and manager of the business department of their work. He is found constantly with pen in hand when not lecturing or taking necessary rest. They should be kept constantly in the field, until every church is turned into a temple of education and recreation, and not a priest or chaplain remains to slander the common sense of the people with his mythical delusions."

Still the voice was "Westward Ho!" We stopped a day at Fort Scott, and met some Liberal friends full of enthusiasm, and arrangements were made for lectures to be delivered Thursday and Friday evenings April 23d and 24th, and of these lectures and our good friends we shall report progress hereafter. We expect abundant success. From Fort Scott we sped on to Wichita, Kansas, a bright and lively town indeed, one of the most flourishing in western Kansas, destined to be a great railroad center, and also headquarters for Liberalism. Its most prominent and go-ahead business men are in our ranks. We shall lecture there on Wednesday evening April 22d, and I anticipate great results from this first Freethought meeting in Wichita.

After a long, long ride from Wichita away into the darkness of midnight over the vast and scarcely settled plains, we arrive at 2 o'clock in the morning at Dodge City, a frontier town, with the many and fresh phases of Western life, where human nature shows its worst and best, where there is an intensity of enterprise of which we know but little at the East. One of the fierce Western storms was prevailing when we arrived at the hotel, and we were glad of a few hours' rest. In the morning, however, the clouds swept away, the sun appeared, and the wind blew fresh. We found that Liberalism had a good "plant" in this place, and that its best men were in sympathy with our movement. Mr. Clarence Petty, Mr. Collar, and others, both men and women, are Liberals ready to work, and are animated by a constructiv and generous spirit.

The Opera House in the afternoon was fairly filled, and I spoke upon "The Demands of Humanity," and Mr. Watts closed with a few ringing sentences in regard to our practical work. In the evening the house was packed to overflowing, and Mr. Watts's lecture on "Secularism and Christianity" was received with continuous applause. It was a new thing to most of the listeners, and one gentleman, a prominent worker in the church, said it was one of the finest lectures he had ever heard. The fact is, it was a revelation to the minds of many, who had only thought of Liberalism as a negation. They knew not of its splendid constructiv capabilities, that it was to build a fairer temple of humanity than had ever yet been seen; and this view of our work showed at once the superiority of the philosophy of Secularism to the faith of Christianity. So intense was the interest created that, at the earnest solicitation of many present, it was decided to hold another meeting on Monday evening, and we remained over for that purpose. An auxiliary society was also formed, and there is every prospect of a successful organization. The fact is, the great West is ripe for our Liberal work. The tendencies here are altogether away from the church. There is too much energy for one to remain within the bonds of the old faith. But our Western friends want something to do. They want a practical way by which liberty and science can be made available for social development. The churches are wise enough to see that they must be social forces rather than dogmatic institutions, so they labor on this basis, and this is the ground of their partial success, because they are useful social instrumentalities. But the church is false at heart, and can never satisfy the demands of humanity. This Liberalism can do, because it has no supernatural being to serve. We base our work upon humanity itself. Human happiness and advancement are our supreme end, infinitly better than the church's; therefore we can satisfy and educate the social nature, for we can bring into play all that art can giv—music, poetry, the drama, the song, and dance, and whatever makes cheerful and benignant the work of to-day. The West needs this, and, being free from dogma, is ready to make science effectiv in fresh institutions. I look forward with great hope to the achievements of Liberalism in this growing country.

From here we go to Wichita and Fort Scott. We lecture at Kansas City April 25th, 26th, and 27th; at Chicago, May 3d; at Grand Rapids, May 10th; at Springport, Mich., May 12th and 13th; at Auburn, Ind., May 14th and 15th; at Louisville, May 24th; at Cleveland, May 31st; at Canton, June 7th; at Pittsburgh, June 21st, and Salamanca, June 28th. Other dates are not yet definitly settled, and some changes, as will be seen, hav been made.

Not only will Ingersoll be with us at the Freethought Convention at Albany, but also Elizabeth Cady Stanton, that noble and famous reformer, who will speak from her standpoint in regard to the most vital question of the day, the liberty and equality of woman. It will add greatly to the interest and importance of our Convention to hav this clear minded and eloquent advocate upon our platform. Let there be a vast congregation of Liberals to welcome this brave, sincere, gifted, and thoughtful woman. Fraternally yours,

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Scattering That Increaseth!

Respectfully inscribed to the Friends of the American Secular Union.

Just on the outskirts of a busy town,
As Evening drew her dusky mantle down,
A wandering minstrel, so the story goes,
Once sought a cottage for a night's repose,
Where dwelt—consistent with their humble state—
An aged couple, unto whom stern fate,
Through years of toil and hard experience driven,
Had scant allowance of life's comforts given;
And left them, burdened with increasing age,
Still with each want unequal strife to wage.
Though illy fitted to receive a guest,
They warmly greeted him and heard his quest,
And, moved impulsivly toward kindness's part,
Sat half-way halted between head and heart;
A moment hesitating, as they pondered o'er
The added tax upon their scanty store;
But feeling triumphed, and let kindness win,
And generous welcome bade the stranger in.

"Friends," said the minstrel, as, the supper through,
They sat in social converse, "it is true,
Almost invariably, that the wandering poor
Find warmest welcome at the poor man's door,
Who, freely furnishing his slender means
To aid another on life's journey, gleans
A slight addition to his stock of sense,
But seldom aught else as a recompense.
I would 'twere otherwise, and that reward
Came oftener to those who their means hav shared
In pay commensurate; and though my purse
For lack of lucre could not well be worse,
Yet hav I with me," and he touched his lyre,
"What sometimes gains me shelter, food, and fire,
And on the morrow, ere I take my leave,
You, for your open kindness, shall receive
Whate'er it brings me, be it more or less,
As some expression of my thankfulness."

The morrow came, and when the guest had shared
The simple meal that humble life prepared,
He took his harp, and as the morn advanced
Swept o'er the strings, when lo! they heard entranced
Such strains delightful, ravishing, and clear,
As ne'er before did listening mortals hear;
And soon, attracted to the minstrel's side,
The wondering villagers from every side
Stood round him charmed, and as the moments flew,
In rapture gathered, still their numbers grew.
Nor gave they heed to time or work deferred,
While, Orpheus-like, the minstrel's notes were heard.
Meanwhile beside him, as it was his wish,
The obedient host had placed an ample dish,
And in it, as the hours in joy went past,
Each grateful listener an offering cast,
Till, with the increase, when the morn had flown,
The shining coin a wondrous heap had grown!
The minstrel ceased, and pointing to it, then Bowed to his host: "'Tis yours," he said, and when
The astonished host, whose eyes were brimming o'er
With tears of gratitude at increased store,
Would vainly have protested against such pay,
For his poor service, he had gone his way.

Friends, there's a moral woven with my rhyme
Which we may well heed at the present time.
'Tis—and experience may attest it more—
Sometimes by scattering we increase our store!
And when of generous deeds we count the cost,
We find we've garnered more than we hav lost.
Among our numbers there are those from whom
A scanty purse indeed claims little room
For all its contents, and who hardly feel
That they can answer to the League's appeal
For means to help along this cherished plan,
Our glorious battle for the Rights of Man!
To such I earnestly would say: My friends,
The coming victory upon you depends.
This is your struggle with a tyrant power,
Whose bearing grows more insolent each hour,
And would, between the walls of church and state
United, crush the victims of its hate!
O you who, seeing, would avert the same,
Be not through apathy henceforth to blame;
But in each district new "Auxiliaries" start,
Resolving now to take an activ part.
Let not the cost of it, however dear,
Prevent, at least, one gathering this year;
Nor hesitate—for fear of tax upon
Your slender means, whence many calls have drawn—
To, with new energy, the good work begin
And call our leaders, Watts and Putnam, in,
And genial Reynolds, who, equipped with tent,
Will to the gathered multitude present
More and more fully, as the cause expands,
The righteous nature of the Nine Demands.
Only by effort can the prize be won,
And the grand labor by these heroes done
Will recompense you; for where'er they go
I promis—and I speak whereof I know—
That, like the old-time minstrel of my lay,
They'll leave you far more than they take away!—
Leave you the pleasure of a good deed done,
And higher hopes for life to build upon;
Leave you the vision wherewith men can see
Humanity's grand temple, yet to be;
A wealth of rare thought, and a broader view
Of the vast change the world is passing through;
Leave you the spirit that for freedom's weal
Givs brighter promise and inspires new zeal.
And seeds that, scattered in some friendly mind,
Which now, perhaps, is to the church inclined,
Will in the future, under Truth's warm ray,
Leaving false doctrins, grow towards perfect day;
And thus expanding, when the horizon clears,
Shall blossom and bear fruit in after years.

The Pope's Curses, and Those of God.

Some months since, I was horribly impressed on reading the pope's bull of excommunication against Spiritualists, and, although it seemed more especially aimed at those in the Spiritual ranks, it applies to unbelievers generally.

The curses and maledictions it contains are terrible, and the reader is inclined to wonder why such a spirit exists among Christians, and from whence comes their authority to promulgate anathemas that good people shudder to contemplate.

I remembered having read something very similar in a book that Christian people venerate, and went to searching the scriptures, as our religious teachers request us to do. I knew there were curses in that "blessed book" (perhaps it might not be out of place to say cursed book), but on looking up the matter I confess I was astonished, and came to the conclusion that the pope's bull is short and mild when compared with what is in the Bible, from which he evidently derived his authority for the curses he uttered.

From the third chapter of Genesis to the last one in Malachi, which ends with a curse, I find the Bible abounds with them; but God seems to hav concentrated his efforts in that line in the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy. It contains sixty-eight verses, and all but fourteen are devoted to expressing the most horrid imprecations that the English language can be made to utter. I wish every person to read and ponder that chapter of the "blessed book."

Fourteen verses of the chapter referred to contain the blessings that God will confer on his people if they "go not after other gods to serve them;" the remaining fifty-four verses are devoted to the curses that shall come upon them if they do not "observe all his commandments and his statutes." Such are the few blessings that this infinit God will confer on his people, and the many curses that they receive if they go after other gods; and yet we are told that he is more kind than any earthly parent.

What would be thought of the earthly parent who should thrust children unbidden into the world, without any power or volition on their part, knowing positivly beforehand that they would be disobedient to his commands; put upon them all the curses mentioned in this book; allow them to liv here a few short years, enduring all the suffering that such curses would bring, and then transfer them to an eternal future life where they "shall be tormented day and night forever and ever," and be compelled to tread "the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of almighty God?" If an earthly parent could hav the power and so do, with the foreknowledge to perceive such suffering to be the result of exercising his attributes, the word demon branded on his forehead would but faintly express the malignity of his character.

I aware that by some this may be thought blasphemous, but I respectfully claim and assert that it does not fully express the horror and loathing that good people should hav for such sentiments, come from where they may.

The important point for consideration, and the one that I hope every reader will thoughtfully ponder, is that, according to the Bible theory, God is infinit in power and foreknowledge, and therefore foresaw before exercising the first act of creativ power that a vast majority of mankind would go "after other gods," and as a consequence all those curses would be upon them in this life, and an eternity of misery in a future life. Is it possible that duty and justice call us to love and worship a creator who would conceive and consummate such a result of almighty power? Every sense of justice and kindness must cause reasonably thinking persons to discard such a belief. It will not do for our Bible friends to endeavor to evade the correctness of these conclusions. In further proof, I refer to Deut. xxxi, 16, 17, where God expressly declares unto Moses that "this people will rise up and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land whither they go," etc., and in the twentieth and twenty-first verses he reiterates that he knew beforehand the course they would pursue. Is it incumbent on mankind to love and worship such a God—one who declares that he before knew his creatures would not comply with his requirements, and still had all power to create them with just such dispositions, passions, and propensities as he chose? These are some of the teachings of a book we are taught to revere, and which its votaries seek to set up as a standard of moral rectitude and endeavor to force into our public schools as a text-book for our children.

And I here affirm that this "book of books" contains more that is vile, cruel, and obscene than any other book in general circulation, and were it not for the halo of respectability and ancient reverence that priestcraft has thrown around it, instead of our good people wishing to make it a moral guide and text-book for the young, it would not be allowed to circulate, and Mr. Comstock might find it a proper object for his most earnest efforts in suppressing immoral and obscene literature.

It may be claimed that all these objectionable features are found in the Old Testament, and were only for a people who were in a semi-barbarous state, but that Christ taught a new and better way. This will not do, for he repeatedly and emphatically affirms that he came not to destroy the old law. Many quotations and illustrations might be given in proof, but the intelligent reader well knows that the New is but a counterpart of the Old Testament. The same general principle pervades the whole, except that the New Testament teaches a future life, which the Old does not, and according to Christ's own words the great majority go to endless torment. For "strait is the gate and narrow the way that leads to life, and few there be that find it," while "broad is the road that leadeth to destruction and many there be that go in thereat." "And these shall go away into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

In regard to Bible curses, the consideration of which caused this article to be written, the New Testament abounds with them as well as the Old. One illustration may be given to show that in this Christ's teachings are as inconsistent and void of good moral application as those found in the Old Testament. After his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, he, with his disciples, went to Bethany to stay over-night. In the morning, being hungry and seeing a fig-tree afar off, on coming to it "he found nothing but leaves, for the time of figs was not yet." So he cursed it and it died. "Peter said, Behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is withered away." If he had caused it to bear fruit instead, so that their hunger might hav been appeased, it might hav seemed sensible, but to curse a tree because it did not bear fruit out of season is only on a par with many other foolish things that the book contains.

Whatever we find in the Bible, as well as in other books, that will make us wiser and better, we should remember, teach, and practice. But the claim that all which is found in the Bible is true, and proper to be taught and practiced, is so obviously improper and wrong that it seems passing strange how intelligent people can be induced to call it all correct and good. It is emphatically a book of many books, and contains so much that is contradictory, and liable to different construction, that intelligent, unscrupulous persons may sing from its pages any tune they choose, and find the notes therein. What is Right and What is Wrong?

In all the writing, editorial or otherwise, on the subject of morality, I am surprised that no one refers to the etymology of the term. It comes from the Latin mos—a manner, a custom, a habit; plural, mores—the fashions, customs, manners, or morals of any given time or country.

I was personally acquainted, many years ago, with a great big fat Presbyterian minister in the state of Maryland who tied a woman slave, for some fault or other, to the pillar of his porch, and beat her till he was exhausted. And it was on a Sunday morning, too, before going to church to preach the everlasting "gauspel." He did not lose caste among his church brethren and fellow-citizens, either South or North, for his barbarous conduct. It was the fashion, the custom, the morals of the time and country, to do what he did. Every slaveholder whipped his negro when he pleased, and as much as he pleased, because his negro was his property, the same as his horse; and power, when angry, either with or without cause, never yet refused to assert itself over its victim. But the customs, manners, morals of our people, superinduced by long generations of slaveholding, hav all changed since 1863, and their opposits are now in vogue. That clergyman's conduct would now be deemed outrageous.

Lord Campbell and the Duke of Marlborough, proved in the courts of justice to be two of the most infamous scoundrels in England, sit in the House of Lords and hobnob with others of like kidney, in company with those right reverend fathers in God, the bishops. The Prince of Wales, who is soon to be king of England, "by the grace of God," is notoriously a bad egg, running himself constantly in debt by his vices, and asking Parliament to pay the same out of the national treasury. Gambling, whoremongering, and their kindred practices are no bar to fellowship in "the best society" of England, as may be seen in the Durham divorce suit now attracting public attention. In Cromwell's time they would hav been considered sins of the first magnitude.

If we read history we will see that morals change character, virtues becoming vices, and vices becoming virtues, just as fashions in dress change—wide hoops being considered beautiful and comely this year, and narrow skirts the next. Hence the necessary distinction between good and bad morals. We are told by travelers that it is fashionable, and quite moral, among the Fejee Islanders, to eat barbecued missionaries. Such diet would not be considered either toothsome or wholesome in this country. Delmonico would shudder at the idea of offering missionary soup or steak to his guests.

Then, hav we no infallible standard of morals, suited to all ages and countries? Yes. If we could only get out from under the upas shadow of the church, which blights everything beneath it, we would see that whatever is injurious, either to ourselvs or others, is inherently and essentially wrong, malum in se, a crime against the life of the body and the soul; and on the contrary, whatever does not injure either ourselvs or others is right and proper to be done—the laws of the state, the church, and the customs of society to the contrary notwithstanding. The grandest of all the virtues is that of moderation in our enjoyments; for such is the chemistry of things that the most innocent and wholesome pleasures of the mind, the affections, and the body become rank poisons and a curse if carried to excess. This virtue makes a man a law unto himself, and when one is able to govern himself he becomes an out-and-out man. Otherwise he is only a simulacrum—the mere image of a man.

If anyone think I hav put it too strong in saying that injury inflicted on ourselvs or others is malum in se—an intrinsic sin that never can be forgiven—let me remind him that nature, our mother, so regards it. I once knew a beautiful and faultless woman who went to a funeral, and during the long, out-of-place religious services stood in an open doorway where there was a draught of cold, damp air. Within twenty-four hours afterward she took erysipelas, and after lauguishing in agony for some days died, and her beauty was so transformed into loathsome ugliness that her family would not allow her remains to be seen, but hurried them off to the grave as soon as possible. She had ignorantly and unconsciously injured herself by violating the inexorable law of prudence, and death was the penalty. Neither has nature, our mother, any pity on one who knowingly and wilfully inflicts injury on another and makes no atonement for the same. Such a one suffers the bull dog bite of remorse, and there is no word in the English language so terrible in its meaning as that. It means hell, and if it were eternal existence in such a world as this would be the direst curse. Then, must not acts so fearfully punished by nature be mala in se?

Career of a Noted Italian Freethinker.

On Friday, April 17th, A. Snider de Pellegrini died. For the past five months he had been under the care of Dr. O. Abruzzo, of 223 Center street, this city, at whose residence Mr. Pellegrini's death occurred. Although in his eighty-fourth year, Mr. Pellegrini had lost none of his mental powers. He was tall, with clear blue eyes, a square intellectual forehead, set off by a full head of iron-gray hair. His face was surrounded by a full gray beard. For some years he had suffered with bladder troubles, and on the last of his periodical trips to this country—he came here every summer to visit Saratoga Springs—he was unable to return. Dr. Abruzzo was his friend, and when he at last needed constant attendance he went to the doctor's house. For several days before his death, Professor Hudson and other physicians were associated with Dr. Abruzzo in the treatment, but Mr. Pellegrini's ailment was beyond medical skill. His career is thus sketched by the Sun of this city:

Mr. Pellegrini was born in Trieste in 1802, and when twelve years old was placed in the banking house of Joseph La Brosse. La Brosse was of noble family, and was driven from France during the revolution of 1879. He was not a man of much commercial enterprise, and the great success of his banking house was owing to the enterprise of his wife, who, though old, possessed rare business talent. Madam La Brosse took much interest in young Pellegrini, and he became her private secretary. In one of his numerous books, in alluding to her, Pellegrini says:

"She was a woman of rare ability, and many exiles came to Trieste and to the house. . . . They had money transactions with her banking house, many of which had to be conducted with secrecy, and I conducted them. It was thus that I became the friend of Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia, and met Gustave Wasa, of Sweden."

Pellegrini was eight years in the maison La Brosse. The husband and wife died, and Pellegrini started a banking house for himself, and engaged in enterprises that were gigantic for those times. When twenty-two years old he owned five large ships, and had an income of 80,000 francs a year. When the famin came in Trieste, in 1829, he gave liberally, and in order to keep the people employed he offered to giv a kreutzer for every two pounds of bones brought to him. They quickly accumulated, and filled four great storehouses. He shipped them to France, where they were used to refine sugar. His charitable act was rewarded by a large profit.

In 1841, while in Paris, Pellegrini was induced to engage in shipping merchandise and colonists to Texas. A penniless young Frenchman gained his confidence, and he put him in charge of the scheme, giving him thirty thousand francs. On April 1, 1842, after sending out a cargo of merchandise and emigrants, Pellegrini started for New York, intending to travel by land to Texas. In his diary he says:

"I found Texas a desert, without population or money, but beautiful in geographical parts and climate. I could only sell parts of the goods in exchange for lands and lots. . . . I remained there two years."

Before he left the young Frenchman arrived. Pellegrini left with him property worth $40,000 and went back to France. There he found that he had been swindled by him and that large amounts of money had been obtained on his credit. Pellegrini paid these debts. The young Frenchman also gained possession of the property in Texas. It was at this time that he engaged with Peabody in sending emigrants to this country. His diary says:

"In 1848 the revolutions in France compelled me to attend strictly to my business houses in London and in Civita Vecchia, Italy. In 1849 the revolution at Rome compelled me to reside in Civita Vecchia. There I saved the lives of many priests, and the life of Guiseppe Mazzini."

Another document left by Mr. Pellegrini givs an unpublished account of how he saved the life of Mazzini:

"I was in my house in Place San Francisco in Civita Vecchia in September, 1849, when someone knocked at my door. Three persons came in. They were Frederick Campanella, Lawyer Camponi, and another. Camponi said: 'Here is Mazzini. Save him. A price is placed upon his head, either dead or alive.' I had known Mazzini for many years, and recognized him. Campanella and Camponi left. Mazzini remained with me for three days. Some of the time he lay on my bed, and sometimes was concealed under it. I brought him food myself, as I could not trust anyone else to do it. On the third day a steamer from Sicily bound for Marseilles arrived. I sent Accursi (ex-Director of Police in Rome, expelled, but with passport of exile), to find out who was the captain of the steamer, and to pay for a passage on condition that no name was to be asked, and that the passenger was to be dressed as a fireman and to be kept at the furnaces.

"To get Mazzini from the house without exciting suspicion, I put a torn overcoat on him. I placed a rough-looking cap on his head and a great bundle under his arm. I ordered him to follow me as if he were a servant. Guards of police and custom house officers were on each side of us as we walked along. My own boat was at the water's edge. We climbed into it, and the men rowed us to one of my three vessels, which I had in the port loaded with coal. To allay suspicion, we went on board one of these, climbed down the other side, and thence were rowed to the steamer.

"An hour afterward the commissioners came on board the steamer to call the roll of passengers. As I was well known to them they accepted my invitation to go back to shore in my boat. The steamer started on her voyage, and Mazzini was saved."

His narrativ, which is written in Italian, goes on to say that Mazzini left the steamer before Marseilles was reached, and that Mazzini wrote to him from Switzerland. Mazzini's letters are attached to the document containing the account of the escape.

Among Pelligrini's works is a large volume printed in French, and entitled "Justice in Austria." It relates to the confiscation of his property, which, with interest up to 1860, when the book was printed, amounts to $2,179,675. The book refers to corroborativ documents, of which there are 2,645 in an iron trunk. Pellegrini's will orders them to be sent to a public library in Italy.

Mr. Pellegrini established the Snider Hospital, which accommodated 800 patients. It was the first public hospital in Trieste. He was once offered the Treasury portfolio of Italy by Cavour, and it is said that he could hav once had the Treasury portfolio of France.

He was a Freethinker, and wrote a number of works on Infidelity in English, French, and Italian. Among them are "The Mortality of the Soul, and the Immortality of Its Elements," "The Mysteries of Creation," and "Man, and the Cause of his Existence."

Compared with the wealth that he once possessed Pellegrini died in comparativly poor circumstances. He leaves 4,000 acres of land in Texas, some personal property, and a collection of paintings that he valued at $50,000. The pictures were once exhibited for the benefit of the Peabody Home. One of them Pellegrini asserted was a Titian. It is called "Leda and the Swan." He refused $15,000 for it, having paid for it nearly that amount. "The Good Fairy," by Picou, another of the paintings, cost $6,000, and the "Troubadour," by Picou, is also very valuable. These three paintings the will directs shall be sent to a nephew in Austria.

The will also directs that three works in manuscript left by Mr. Pellegrini shall be edited and published by Dr. Abruzzo. They are: "A Letter to the Emperor of Austria;" a "Letter to the Citizens of Trieste;" and a "Treatise on the Human Moral Fluid."

Another Break in Our Ranks.

Died, April 15, 285, at the age of nearly sixty-eight years, Mrs. Thurston, wife of M. P. Thurston, of Colon township, St. Joseph county, Mich. Her maiden name was Lovina Washburn, and she was born in Clintonville, Onondaga county, N. Y. She was married in 1836, and lived from that time till her death on the same farm where she and her husband began the battle of life together. She was a woman of rare tenderness of heart, evenness of temper, and honesty of purpose. In adding to the sum of human happiness, in doing something daily for her family and friends, she found her chief delight, and she never wearied of her task. Her death is nothing less than a calamity to her family, and a deeply-felt loss to the community. Though not carried away suddenly, her last illness was of short duration, and she suffered but little pain. Her mind being wholly free from superstition, she met death without a tremor of fear, and the neighboring Christians hav learned how an Infidel can die. Six sons of the deceased were present at the funeral, and they acted as pall-bearers. I was called upon to perform the sad duty of delivering the funeral discourse, and the occasion was made more depressing by the cold, continuous rain that fell nearly all day. Many relativs, friends, and Liberals were kept at home by the storm.

To the deceased and her husband twelve children were born, eight of whom are still living, all Freethinkers except one, a daughter. All are respected, industrious, and intelligent citizens, and this fact shows the utter falsity of the claim that some sort of religion is necessary to insure rectitude of conduct. Mr. Green gave a short sketch of this remarkable family in the last number of his Magazine.

N. G. WATKINS.

Bigotry in Masonry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I noticed in this week's TRUTH SEEKER an article in reference to my expulsion from a Masonic lodge, quoted from the New York Sun, and also a request to your Toronto correspondent to throw further light upon the affair; as the correspondent refered to is, at present, seriously ill, and as the article quoted from the Sun is somewhat misleading, I thought, perhaps, a statement from myself on the matter would be in order.

The story, as told in the Sun, has a foundation of truth, but the writer has evidently drawn upon his imagination for the particulars.

It is quite true that I hav been expelled from my lodge, but not on a charge of "Atheism." I was charged with being an Agnostic, a Secularist, and Freethinker, and I admitted at once that I was either, or all three, and defended myself on the ground of the charge being unconstitutional.

It is further stated that "I did not know that the members of the committee were watching me, and that, although a strong Agnostic, I had never openly declared my views." Neither of these statements is correct. On the contrary, I hav been an open and activ member of the Toronto Secular Society for over four years (ask Mr. Watts about this). I hav never made a secret of my views on religious matters, nor hav I made any parade of them in the lodge, or in the company of Masons.

The charge was worked up against me by the placing of spies upon my movements in public. I was quite cognizant of the fact that I was being watched by men who, although sworn brothers, hav done their best (or rather, worst) to injure me, but I hav not allowed that fact to interfere with my pleasure in listening to the lectures of Mr. Watts, Mr. Putnam, Mr. Reynolds, our friend (who is here at present) Mr. Burnham, and others.

For the other statements, as given in Sun, I may say that I hav not threatened to bring an action against the lodge. I hav never mentioned the name of Mr. Bradlaugh in connection with the affair (in fact, I am rather in the dark as to what Mr. Bradlaugh's views really are), and the officers of the lodge did not contend that their action in expelling me was in accord with the rite or constitution of the order; on the contrary, I depended almost entirely upon the constitution for my defense.

So much for the Sun's account of the matter. The "true inwardness" of the case is this: Three years ago I was a candidate for one of the electiv offices of the lodge. At this time I was too popular in the lodge to be defeated by anything like fair means, and my opponents, hearing that I was connected with the Secular Society, organized a sort of smelling committee for the purpose of watching my movements, and working up something by which they could defeat me in the election, and by circulating reports of my being an Atheist, Infidel, Agnostic, etc., and thereby arousing the religious bigotry of the more ignorant of the members, they succeeded in defeating me by a very small majority.

The following year, by the same means, they brought about a similar result. Last year I was again a candidate for office, being determined to win if possible in spite of them, and they again used the same weapons, with so much vigor and undisguised malice that I brought a charge against one of them for unmasonic conduct, and, although he was compelled to acknowledge the offense, the lodge, by a majority vote, decided that he was innocent, which means practically that, according to their belief, I will be damned to all eternity, and that any member who don't think as I do has the right to damn me here till further notice.

As soon as the trial was over, the innocent brother brought the charge against me as stated above, the result of which is that I am indefinitly suspended from the rights and privileges of Freemasonry. I might also state that, taking my case as a precedent, a lodge in Drayton, Ont., has brought a charge of the same nature against no less than seven of its members, and there are rumors of more to follow.

The cry has gone abroad that the craft is honeycombed with Infidelity, and it must be driven out root and branch. They hav locked their doors against the intellect of the world, and are determined to drive out what little brains they hav among them.

Bacon before Shakspere.

Your correspondent "Holt" speaks of the edition of 1623, meaning the Shakspere Folio, as differing much from former editions. He seems not to know that that was the first collection of the Shakspere plays. Only about half of them had ever before been printed. The Folio contained seventeen new plays, some of which had never been acted.

"Holt" seeks to disparage Bacon as a writer. In my judgment Bacon's Essays are better and far more profitable reading than any play of Shakspere's, and if in the voluminous writings of Bacon there is much that is dull, I affirm that the greater part of the plays are likewise dull to modern readers. The fact is that Shakspere was scarcely known to the literary world for 150 years after his death. It was the pit only that appreciated his plays, until at last the German scholars began to discover his extraordinary merits as a poet, which are now perhaps unduly magnified by his worshipers. W. H. How the Liquor Business Might be Managed.

It is more than thirty years since we commenced trying to suppress the liquor business by prohibitory laws, and still we seem no nearer success than we did then. It is true, we hav, in numerous states, passed prohibitory laws; but it is also true that these laws do not prohibit. Sensible people should now be willing to admit that neither the evils of intemperance, nor any other evils, can be cured by depriving people of their individual liberties. It is not less, but more liberty that we need.

For the consideration of your numerous readers throughout the length and breadth of this land, I wish to outline a method of dealing with this question.

The government—state or national, but the latter would be preferable—should embark in the business. It should manufacture pure liquors in quantities as large as may be required. We should hav a liquor department at Washington, just as we now hav a postal; and we should hav branches in all our business centers as we now hav post-offices. Respectable men should be appointed by government on salaries to manage these institutions. They should be furnished with certain rules regulating the sale of the liquors; among these they should be forbidden to sell to habitual drunkards, or even to one who has been known to hav been drunk. The name of each purchaser, with the amount of liquor sold to him, should be kept in a book, and a limit might be placed upon the amount. They should be forbidden to sell to anyone who bought and sold again. This would compel all to buy direct from the government.

We should supply the liquor to the people at the cost of manufacture and sale, or as near that as possible. This would drive out all competition, and make it impossible for private individuals to make anything in the business. It is not necessery for me to go further into detail.

Some will object to the above on the ground that private individuals would still sell to drunkards, and to those to whom the government would not sell, and thus perpetuate the business; but if the government would supply a moderate quantity to people on low terms, it would spoil the business for others to a great extent. Then, if we would establish large workhouses in each state, and send all those there who got drunk and disorderly, on long terms of from one to five or ten years at a time, we could make the liquor business still less profitable. Persons sent to the workhouse should be given employment and paid salaries as much as they could earn. This should be saved up for them at the end of their term, or paid toward the support of their wives and children. This plan would prevent drunkards from having large families, one of the most important features.

The average Christian will object to this plan because we would not get any revenue out of the business. But I cannot see that we hav any right to raise revenue out of it. The raising of our revenue out of intoxicating liquors is, in my opinion, as great a stain on our national banner as was slavery.

I do not pretend that the evils of intemperance could be entirely abolished in this way, but believe they could be reduced to a minimum.

A SPECIAL to the Dallas Texas Herald says that a few weeks ago Rev. Mr. Wisner, a Methodist preacher, moved from Houston and located at Garrett to preach for the church at that place. Two weeks later a deputy sheriff appeared on the scene and arrested the Rev. Mr. Wisner on a charge of theft and took him back to Houston to answer. Mr. Wisner claims that he is innocent and that he can establish the fact.

WE giv this week a symbolical representation of the modern Balaam's ass and the nineteenth century angel. Particular attention is called to the tired expression on the ass's face. This expression indicates that Balaam has got to go. We hav some more illustrations in preparation, and shall bring them out from time to time as circumstances will allow. Pictures are expensiv, and we are forced to go slow. But we are going sure.

For the Labor Reformers.

Recent inquiries among about one hundred churches of this city of all denominations develops the fact that in the lower portions of this city the working people make up "all," or "nearly all," of the church congregations.

Such being the case, it is not a matter for wonder that labor reform makes slow progress among the very people who should be most ready to receive new social ideas. Christianity teaches that the laborer should be content in the station in life in which it has pleased God to place him; Catholicism (the religion of a large proportion of workingmen) asserts that some are born to rule and others to be ruled; Protestantism would only lift the worker by a parental charity that is an insult to manhood, teaching him that this life is only a probationary vale of tears through which he must swim to reach the golden gate. God rules and it is wicked to revolt against his decrees. Suffer and be strong; the reward will come in heaven.

When workingmen support such doctrins, it is not surprising that the cause of labor lags. The first thing to be done is to get this other-worldism out of the pates of the poor victims of ecclesiastical greed, and get into them the idea that nothing is right that does not help to happiness. The master spirits of the labor movement should see to this.

Christianity at Harvard.

The question of prayers at Harvard is agitating the religious part of the community. It was proposed to abolish morning prayers in that institution, but the overseers hav exercised their authority to retain the custom, on the ground that prayer is a good thing for colleges, and its abolition would injure Harvard in the estimation of Christians. This reason smacks too largely of worldliness to suit the religious press, and the doubt exists among them that religion is materially advanced by the decision. One paper complains that these morning prayers and the motto, Christo et Ecclesiæ, on the college seal, are the only officially Christian things that cling to the university. Attendance on divine service, it says, on Sunday in the chapel is no longer exacted. There are no regular Sunday services in the chapel. Attendance at some church on Sunday is no longer required, and the policy of the administration seems to be to bring the recognition of religion down to the lowest point, and, without actually proceeding against it, or restricting its freedom, to giv it no distinct recognition, but to leave it wholly to be, both with the students and the instructors, a matter of personal preference and voluntariness, so that the only creed of the university is the individual opinion of its professors, and the only obligation they respect is to teach what they believe.

Naturally, Christians do not like this system of freedom. They never do like freedom, except that freedom which allows them to worship as they please and force others to worship with them. That is what freedom means to Christians, and they stoutly resist any broadening of their definition.

The orthodox party maintains that if Christianity be not dogmatically taught in colleges, "fatal skepticism, or some kindred phase of Secularism," will inevitably obtain. "It is not so much the teaching of Protestant doctrins in the public schools that the Catholic church objects to," said Mgr. Capel in one of his lectures, "but the general tendency manifest to make the schools secular." This appears to be precisely the fear of the orthodox Protestant press. Though one denomination may hate another with holy zeal, it still hates Secular ideas infinitly more.

The course of the Harvard faculty is, however, no cause for alarm. The stranger thing would be a refusal on their part to recognize the trend of the age, which is unmistakably toward secularization. The college that refuses to acknowledge this would soon be distanced in the keen competition for students. The decision of Harvard's overseers amounts to little beside the conduct of the faculty. Freedom to worship or not worship is bound to obtain, for it is the true American principle.

What it May Come To.

Before the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER it is likely that our legislature will hav disposed of the Freedom of Worship bill for this session. But, in any event, the bill will be up at the next. If it is defeated, the Catholics will undoubtedly introduce it again; if it passes, there is likely to be a triangular fight over its repeal, and not only over that, but over the practical unity of church and state which exists in New York in defiance of the Constitutional prohibition of any preference in religion. Several Protestant forces hav given notice that if this Freedom of Worship bill passes they will unite to overhaul the laws relating to subsidies to sectarian institutions, and it is quite probable the Freethinkers will also be heard in that event. The Catholics we hav always with us, fighting for the possession of the government.

At a Protestant meeting, held a week or two ago, to protest against the passage of the Freedom of Worship bill, it was divulged that during the past year various church institutions had received from the public treasury sums as follows:

Unsectarian (but Christian), - - -	$220,125
Hebrew, - - - - -	92,539
Protestant sectarian, - - - -	358,743
Catholic, - - - - -	940,190
Total, - - - -	$1,611,597

If the Catholics now receive over one-half of the state aid of "charities," and if Rome finds herself strong enough to pass the pending bill, it will not be long ere she demands and receives more. In view of this, we ask the Protestants whether they will not do well to join with the Freethinkers in so amending our Constitution that hereafter no religious institution of any sort whatever will be enabled to make recruits at the expense of the general community. The Catholics hav as much right to their million dollars as the Hebrews to their ninety thousand, and a clearing out of the whole lot is the only safe and sure way to check a greed that has devoured empires in its time, and still retains an appetite keen enough to swallow a republic as large as the United States.

The Apostasy of a Christian Freelover.

Nearly ten years ago Martha Strickland, of St. Johns, Mich., and Leo Miller, then of New York, entered into illegal marital relations. That is, they married themselvs. Mr. Miller had at the time a living legal wife, and this form of marriage was the only one possible to him. Through all these years the couple hav lived together.

In the Sun of this city of April 24th, Mr. Miller has a letter dissolving this union, and indorsing the institution of marriage as divine. He says:

"Years of reflection and experience hav brought with them the conviction that the step we took was ill-advised and wrong; that it would hav been wiser and nobler to hav sacrificed our own personal happiness, and what we deemed to be our natural rights, than to hav made this revolutionary assault upon the marriage institution. Marriage is of divine origin, an outgrowth of the higher moral sentiments, not of the lower propensities. In the early animal life of the race, before the moral and spiritual nature had attained any very considerable degree of development, we know that polygamy, polyandry, and general promiscuousness characterize the relations of the sexes. But with the evolution of the higher nature comes the voice of the divine, revealing the ultimate intentions of the creator respecting the proper social relations of man and woman. The whole tendency of civilization, marked especially by the sentiments, aspirations, and longings of the noblest and purest specimens of the race, point conclusivly to the fact that monogamy—the union for life of one man and one woman—constitutes the only true marriage ordained by nature and by nature's God for noble, rational beings; and it is undeniably the right and duty of the earthly legislator to transcribe this higher marriage law to his statute books and enjoin its observance. Just and discriminating provisions should be made to release parties from the marriage bonds where, from any cause, they defeat the ends of marriage, and work evil rather than good, misery rather than happiness; but to strike down all law would lead to universal social anarchy. While the race has made great advancement from its primitiv state, average human nature is still crude and disorderly, and needs direction and restraint. The few might be a law unto themselvs, and observe all the requirements and proprieties of true marriage, but the masses, left wholly to their own undisciplined impulses, would run riot in social excesses. But the law can make no discrimination in favor of the few, all must observe its requirements, and if it be found in any way imperfect and oppressiv, we should seek to reform it, not abolish it."

When Luther wrote against the practice of celibacy for the clergy, the churchmen generally held that his inspiring motiv was a desire to marry. We would not say that Mr. Miller's objections to legal marriage were founded on his dislike of divorce proceedings, and his desire to marry another woman; but there are those uncharitable enough to intimate that he has now construed his wish to be divorced into respect for the marriage laws. We fancy, too, that those reformers who all but canonized him and Miss Strickland for what they termed their fight for a principle will be disappointed at their present course, and inclined to say that it is but another instance of how seldom principle permanently stands against personal greed, ambition, or even inclination.

Anyhow, we are glad Mr. Miller is a Christian.

Information for a Contemporary.

The Independent says:

"Missionaries in far-off countries, like Burmah, say that a great deal of Infidel literature is being distributed among the nativs, especially among teachers. Bundles of documents, including Ingersoll's lectures, in the nativ tongues, are sent into towns and villages for free circulation. It would be interesting to know what man or society is so anxious to spread unbelief as to giv money for this purpose. In this country, Infidel lectures are a source of profit, and shallow-minded youth are their patrons, and we find little that is unselfish in Infidelity."

For the enlightenment of the Independent we vouchsafe the information that the Infidels engaged in this work are those of the United States and England, the translations are done by scholars of India, and the money is furnished principally by wealthy Freethinkers of that country. There are also several Freethought papers in Asia, of small pretensions as yet, but edited and published by self-sacrificing men who do not wish to see their countrymen deluded by missionaries. When Mr. Bennett traveled through India, he, with the aid of an interpreter, spoke to thousands of the nativs, and his speeches were printed in the languages of the different countries. Japan especially is saturated with Infidelity. THE TRUTH SEEKER has upon its subscription book the names of many Freethinkers, officers and dignitaries of India, and one address is prefixed, "His Highness." The writings of Ingersoll, Remsburg, Babcock, Mrs. Besant, Bradlaugh, Aveling, Foote, and others hav been translated into several Asiatic languages. The good work is going on brisker and brisker every month, Freethought spreading much faster, we were informed recently, than Christianity. If the church imagins she has "heathendom" all to herself, she is greatly mistaken. The motiv actuating those concerned in this work is the desire for good of humanity. Christianity has been such a blight and curse upon those parts of the world in which it has had full sway, that it is desired to save those peoples upon which it is not yet fastened from ever becoming slaves to its priests. There are thousands of people willing to giv of their substance to aid in this. If they are "shallow-minded youths," an extensiv acquaintance with them has left us utterly oblivious of the fact.

The Charges Against Madam Blavatsky.

The Philosophic Inquirer of Madras, India, announces that the report of the special committee appointed by the ninth annual convention of the Theosophical Society to investigate the charges against Madam Blavatsky made by the Christian College Magazine has been published, and that it completely exonerates the madam.

The Christian College Magazine founded its assertions that Madam Blavatsky is a fraud upon the statements of a Madam Coulomb, who, with her husband, was employed by the conductors of the Theos- tphist. The nature of the charges, as also one point of the evidence strongly relied upon to clear her, appears in the following extract from one of Madam Coulomb's letters to Madam Blavatsky:

"I may hav said something in my rage, but I swear on all that is sacred for me that I never said fraud, secret passages, traps, nor that my husband had helped you in any way. If my mouth has uttered these words, I pray to the almighty to shower on my head the worst maledictions in nature."

Many of Madam Blavatsky's friends urged the Theosophical Society to proceed legally against the Magazine, but this report givs various reasons why this would be inexpedient, the chief of which is the great difficulty in getting justice done to spirits, or the "Mahatmas." The trial of Slade is cited, in which, "though the judge saw a genuin phenomenon of slate-writing in the open court under test conditions, and though eminent professors and scientists gave evidence as to the possibility of such phenomena, the court would not be convinced." The fear that this obduracy of the bench would be a precedent for the Indian judge prevented the Theosophical Society from appealing to the law, though "there are witnesses who hav come forward to prove the existence of Mahatmas as living men." These are "two leading gentlemen who came from Bengal as delegates of the last Anniversary, that declare they hav seen one of the Adepts in his physical body." Therefore, says the Philosophic Inquirer, "those who can read between the lines will see that the Theosophical Society will not condescend to answer any more of such gratuitously stupid attacks."

The Theosophical Society has done well in not going to law for the justification of Madam Blavatsky. A committee from the ranks of the society was much more likely to effect the same thing.

Editorial Notes.

THE question now paramount in Chicago is, Did the janitor of the hall hav a poker in his hand at that dynamite meeting?

MGR. CAPEL turned up at the Spiritualist convention in New Orleans and wanted to answer the mediums. Permission was refused.

E. C. WALKER has severed his editorial and publishing connection with Lucifer. Mr. Harman continues to disseminate the principles of freedom.

OUR English readers in this country will be glad to learn that the Camberwell branch of the National Secular Society has opened a hall upon ground owned by the society. The hall is a solid and handsome structure, seating between six and seven hundred.

THE Rev. N. B. Thompson, of this city, says that dancing is not a sin, because "David danced before the ark with all his might." Dancing is all right, but if the reverend gentleman is going to take David as a pattern, there will probably be some police interference. Times hav changed since David danced before the ark.

GENERAL GRANT, at the present writing, is reported to be in a fair way to recover his former health. A noticeable feature in his case is the fact that he has not been made the object of the public prayer performance which was followed by such disastrous results in the case of Garfield. Indeed, with the fate of the latter before them, it is doubtful whether anyone suggesting a day of public prayer for Grant would not be promptly suppressed by a rising vote of the populace.

IN Puck of April 22d there is an admirable cartoon illustrating the designs of the Catholics. The picture is supplemented by these words:

"The attempt to pass the so-called 'Freedom of Worship' bill is clearly one of the crimes committed in the name of Liberty. It is an attempt likely to fail of its own weakness. The fact that Americans love freedom does not imply that they will accept every sham that tries to masquerade in the guise of freedom. Demagogs hav a great power in every republic; the wisest of peoples may be hoodwinked and led astray; but there are a few things which this American people, after more than a century of education in independence, can see clearly for themselvs. As Americans, we hav nothing to do with the contest between the Roman church on the one hand and Protestism, Judaism, and Freethought on the other. So far as the citizen is concerned, it is simply a question of a combat in which the best man ought to win. If all the world decides to be of Roman Catholic faith, well and good. No government has the right—the moral right—to throw a single obstacle in the way of any man who, following the dictates of his conscience, chooses to accept that or any other religion. But if the converted or perverted citizen, having become a Roman Catholic, tries to force others to become Roman Catholics, or attempts to turn the temporal power of the state over to the Roman Catholic church—then it is time for the state to assert its authority. And the American knows that much, in spite of the demagogs. Unfortunately, there is no denying it: the Roman Catholic—at least, the Roman Catholic of the old school—has an unholy desire to combine the spiritual power of his church and the temporal power of his state. This was well enough in Italy in the Middle Ages; but it will not do in American republic of the nineteenth century. This has been said over and over again. The truth is well worn, but it can never be worn so thin as to be anything but a truth. It sounds anachronistic to talk, here in 1885, of the Roman church attempting to meddle with the government of the United States; but it is simply a plain, clear, every-day fact that the Roman church holds tools enough left over from the medieval period to make just such an attempt, and that they are making it in the 'Freedom of Worship' bill. This is only a local skirmish; but Washington is the objectiv point of the strategists of Romanism."

THE "Very Rev. Canon" Hegarty has been trying to damage Mr. Parnell in the estimation of the Irish people by reporting that Mr. Parnell visited Mr. Bradlaugh when he was confined in the Clock Tower. A paper partly owned by Mr. Parnell denies that Mr. Parnell visited Mr. Bradlaugh in the Clock Tower, or anywhere else. Upon this Mr. Bradlaugh says in the National Reformer: "Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P., uninvited by me, visited me in my bedroom at the Queen's Hotel, Glasgow, about the same date that J. G. Biggar, M.P., uninvited by me, took the chair at one of my lectures at Glasgow, and publicly announced that he did so "as a skeptic." Mr. Parnell again visited me at a Freethought lecture delivered by me at the Hall of Science, and, after the lecture, came up to a private room in the building to speak to me. This was about the time I met in public debate the 'honorable' member who now calls himself F. H. O'Donnell, M.P., and who then, as a Roman Catholic, publicly advocated Socialism, which I opposed. I do not personally attach any kind of importance to Mr. Parnell's visit to me in the Clock Tower, although he said then he came as a friend, because I know that Mr. Parnell was brought by Mr. O'Kelly, M.P., who probably looked on me as interesting copy for the New York Herald."

EVIDENTLY the Sun is not a believer in prayer. The surprising improvement in the health of General Grant has called from the pulpit the regular amount of bosh about the interference of God. "It is God who has done it in answer to the earnest prayers of his people," says the Rev. Dr. Talmage; "it is prayer that has done it." And the Rev. Dr. Newman expresses the same opinion; while at a meeting of Baptist ministers on Monday General Grant's restoration was referred to as miraculous. To this silly talk the Sun sneeringly says: "But suppose that all the praying was done on a mistaken assumption; that God was asked to save General Grant from a danger which did not exist; that the physicians were wrong in their diagnosis of his disease; that his trouble was not cancer, but something which was curable and really never endangered his life, provided it was properly treated? The prayers which hav ascended for him were occasioned by reports sent out from his sick chamber by his physicians, and they would not hav gone up if the people had generally understood that he was suffering from a disease which did not imperil his life, but from which he might recover in the ordinary course of things. It seems probable now that there was no real justification for alarm at any time, that the physicians merely advertised their own mistaken diagnosis, and that therefore the case of General Grant proves nothing in regard to prayer either one way or the other. It has afforded no chance for the prayer test. If he gets well, it will be because he was bound to recover from a curable disease as soon as the physicians recognized it for what it was. But perhaps it may be said that their eyes were opened in answer to prayer."

WHEN the missionary collection is taken up in our churches the congregations are regaled with heartrending and purse-opening accounts of the hardships of those brave men and women who penetrate heathendom to spread the glad tidings of great joy by carrying to the benighted pagans the blessed gospel whereby men only can be saved. An Indian government official, in a letter to Mrs. Besant, explains the real state of those self-sacrificing missionaries The fellow is an American Methodist. "Of this man's income," says Mrs. Besant's correspondent, "I shall try and giv you as near an account as possible, though it will fall short of what it actually is. He gets a salary equivalent to £300 per year of English money, his wife one of £96, and he has three children, for each of whom he is allowed £30. Thus you will see his income amounts, in cash only, to £486. Besides this he is found a house, and this is without exception the most commodious in the station, and has a large kitchen garden and fruit orchard attached. He is supplied with servants and a horse and phaeton. When he goes out in the winter months, ostensibly to preach to the poor benighted heathen in the surrounding districts, but really to hav one constant picnic, for camp-life in the winter in India is nothing else, his considerate employers giv him, in addition to his salary, one shilling per mile as traveling allowance, besides finding for him all the carriage he may require for his camp equipages. This is a station with about, at most, a population of twenty Europeans, and has a grand edifice in the shape of a church. This, by some oversight, has never been consecrated, and I hav heard it said, and that with every assurance of the truth of the statement, that were it not for this church being, as it is, unconsecrated, the Wesleyan Methodist would not be allowed to preach therein, as at present he does every Sunday. Bigotry could not go very much farther. Collections are taken up every Sunday evening, but I will leave you to make a tolerably correct guess of how they are disposed of when I tell you that the services in the evening are held at four in the afternoon, because the church cannot afford lights to hold them later. It is needless to tell you that this hour, in our Indian climate, is almost without exception the most unpleasant of all the twenty-four. The Wesleyan to whom I refer was originally a cowboy, in Texas, and then was called to the ministry. He has made a good investment, though the two former, as being more useful, were the more respectable callings of the three." Does Dr. Buckley know this man?

Lectures and Meetings.

THE fifteenth annual convention of the American Labor Reform League meets in Labor Lyceum Rooms, 295 Bowery, New York, Sunday and Monday, May 10th and 11th—three sessions each day. R. W. Hume, J. K. Ingalls, Wm. Rowe, Dr. C. S. Weeks, S. Mira Hall, Lewis Masquerier, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

W. F. JAMIESON is now resting at his home in Lake City, Minn., for a couple of weeks, having turned over his Republic to his son, who will conduct it hereafter as a county newspaper, in Delavan, Minn. Mr. Jamieson will accept calls to lecture all summer at grove meetings, and for courses of lectures address him at Lake City, Minn.

The Bruno Statue.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following letter and authorization will be read with interest by all Liberals. I am sorry to be compelled to add that none of the papers referred to therein hav been received by me, and they hav probably been lost. Therefore I cannot as yet giv the desired information as to the cost and style of the proposed statue. As soon as the papers come to hand the substance of them will be laid before your readers. No contributions hav been received since the last acknowledgment. They should be sent to me as the authorized agent. Yours truly,

New York, April 24, 285. T. B. WAKEMAN.

ROME, March 30, 1885.

HONORABLE SIR: I write you in the name of the Central Committee of the University which has for its object the raising of a monument at Rome to our great predecessor and compatriot, Giordano Bruno. To you, a champion of Freethought, we do not need to recommend our cause, as we see by the copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER forwarded us by Mr. Bradlaugh how much trouble you hav already taken for this end.

I write to inform you what we hav already done and what we propose to do towards this object. But first a little history. Perhaps you already know that in 1876 the students of this same University of Rome took the initiativ and opened up a subscription to raise this monument. A collection was started which brought together the sum or about the sum of 7,500 francs, and which at present, with the interest, represents 8,500 francs.

Of course, with such a small amount it was impossible to raise a suitable statue. In the mean time the committee, discouraged by its non-success, desisted, and all hope of succeeding was lost until a few months since, when we took up the idea of our predecessors, and in a general assembly of our University, the present committee was elected, in whose name I write, and of which I hav the honor of being a member.

In the first place, as Mr. Bradlaugh may hav informed you, we sought to join to our humble efforts the suffrage of the most eminent savants and philosophers of Europe. We hav offered to these noted Liberals (among whose names we take the liberty of putting yours), and they hav accepted the proposition, to form an International Committee of Honor which will render more solemn and important this tardy reparation to Bruno. In the manifesto which we hav published, and several copies of which we send you, you will find that we hav been able to unite under the name of Bruno the most celebrated names of Europe. The names of Hon. Elizur Wright and Colonel Ingersoll were suggested to us by Mr. Bradlaugh, who has always favored us with his advice and assistance.

We hav been able to establish in all the provinces and cities of Italy local committees charged with collecting the subscriptions, distributing the manifestos, holding conferences, etc. North America we left with Mr. Bradlaugh, and we are very glad indeed that it is you who hav graciously taken upon yourself this propaganda in the United States, and the forwarding to us of your compatriots' contributions. As perhaps you already know, or as you can read in our manifesto, the sums collected should be given in charge of the "Banca Generale," under the head of M. le Prof. Comin, B. E. Maineri, Librarian in the Ministry of Public Works.

In honor of Bruno we hav also published a "First Number," which contains some of the writings and autographs of the most noted philosophers and historians of Italy and other countries. These copies are sold at one franc apiece for the benefit of the monument. If you think they can be sold in America, you hav only to demand the quantity you wish; but we doubt this, as the Italian language is but little known in your country. You will find on the third page of the cover a translation of your article of January 1st on Bruno. In reference to this we congratulate you on your happy idea of dating from 1600, a new era, and we sincerely hope that you will be imitated in Europe.

On the front page of our "First Number" you will find a sketch of the monument, which the celebrated sculptor, Mr. Ettore Ferrari, deputy of the Italian Parliament, offered us gratis. Nevertheless, if the money's received will permit, we shall open up a competition as to the plans proposed.

We also send you subscription papers, which you can use as you think best. Mr. Bradlaugh tells us that you hav collected among your compatriots a considerable sum. We would like you to send this to the "Banca Generale," addressed to Mr. Maineri, as we hav directed, for we wish the monument to Bruno to be finished by the 17th of February of next year, and to do this the necessary work should be begun without delay.

We hope to hear soon from you in reply (address, Via della Lupa, No. 8, Rome).

We hav already surmounted many difficulties, and with constancy and patience we hope to succeed. It is for you, it is for all advocates of Freethought, to help us. With many thanks for all you hav already done for us, accept our assurances of esteem and regard.

DR. MARCELLO CAMPODONICO,
Student of Philosophy, for the Central Committee.

G. AMICI, Secretary,
Student-at-law.

AUTHORIZATION.

The Central Committee of the University of Rome, for the purpose of erecting the monument to Giordano Bruno in the Piazza Campo de Fiori, hav appointed and authorized T. B. Wakeman, residing in New York (No. 93 Nassau street), to receive contributions for the said monument to Giordano Bruno, and to remit them in the mode and manner he may deem best. { Official Seal. }

Dated at Rome the 2d of April, 1885.

G. AMICI, Secretary. By order of the Directive Council. V. RISO.

Letters from Friends.

PARAWAN, March 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Various motivs prompt this letter, the chief of which is the wish to forward the interests of truth, the second, to get you to do me a favor.

It is never too late to vindicate a truth or correct an error. As THE TRUTH SEEKER is the grandest representativ of truth we hav it will be as ready to correct an error as to expose a pious fraud. At least, I take this for granted. In your issue of December 8, 1883, you copy an article on Mormon polygamy from the Sunday Mercury. You say that Mormon women are buried with a black cloth over their face, and this it not true. By copying the article you become accessory to propagating a Christian lie.

This error may hav been corrected for all I know, as I do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and just chanced to meet with this old copy yesterday, and as a lover of truth, I hasten to kindly correct such an utter falsehood.

A Christian preacher came to Utah a few years ago, stayed two weeks, so I am told, and returning East, told this among other falsehoods, about the Mormons. Mormonism is bad enough and nasty enough without lying about it. True, the Mormons practice polygamy, but the Bible teaches it. It is ill-becoming the Christian fanatics East to worship the vulgar old book, and demand Congress to pass laws to imprison a man for practicing its nasty teachings. Cleveland kissed his mother's old Bible, aud with the next breath declared its teachings must be repressed. Consistency would hav made him say the old Bible must be repressed.

Mormon women are not compelled to go into polygamy, but most of them do so for the same reason nuns immure themselves in a convent—for glory hereafter. The Catholic convent system—established that priests may gratify their lust—is an evil ten thousand times worse than polygamy. Polygamy is a wart on the nose of the Goddess of Liberty, but the nunneries are a deep-seated cancer on her fair breast.

I know if a woman does not like to liv in polygamy she can leave it. Can the poor nun leave the convent? The women of Utah hav the franchise of the ballot. That is a right they are denied in New York. But it is for the love of Jesus and to, as they think, please that old bachelor God, that the women of this territory defy the law, and liv in a hell on earth for the sake of glory hereafter. All the women look upon it as a great trial, and none like it, but the amorous old elders knock them over the head with, "The greater the cross the greater the crown," and whip them into the traces with, "I will hav a tried people," and, "This is the Lord's way of trying you women;" and the foolish fair ones don't know any better than to submit for Christ's sake.

What I tell you is truth, without lies or prejudice. Though I was born and raised in the Mormon church I wear the Truth Seeker badge for a scarf-pin, and am the only man in this whole Southern country, that I know of, that has one at all. I would take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am traveling all the time. I wish it well, and may it long continue its good work.

H. H. ELDRIDGE.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., March 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It is a pity that so many professing to be Liberals are possessed of a spirit of ostracism on account of difference of opinion. It does seem to me that all those who hav arrived at the status of Liberalism ought to know that we can not all agree in every particular, from the fact that we can not hav the same surroundings and evidences; but alas! it is hard to be emancipated from our early prejudices, which hav been instilled by superstitious training. When I was a member of the church, there was nothing troubled my mind more than to see turmoil and strife among the Christians. Since I hav emerged from the slavery of Christianity to the higher plane of Liberalism I hoped to be identified among a class who would not lower themselvs to such inhumane practice, but I am somewhat disappointed. I hope in time they will learn better. Mind you, I like discussion that is proper; but we should never condescend to giv way to our passions so as to let anger control us in such a manner as not to discuss questions of importance with our fellow-men and women of all shades of belief with kind words. Oh, no, Brother Materialist and Spiritualist, if you will consult our best interest you will plainly discover that we cannot well afford to be engaged in this childish business. We hav thrown off the fetichism of Christianity, and let us now be men and women who hav a work more noble to perform than wrangling over the subject whether death ends all, as T. Winter and Elmina think, or that spirits communicate and testify that there is a future. It is all very nice to exchange thoughts on these subjects, but what I contend for is for us to tolerate the opinions of those who differ with us. Abuse is not calculated to convince anyone of error. Worst of all the pitiful, weak brothers among us are those who get mad at the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for giving space to those who wish to ventilate their peculiar views on Spiritualism, or Materialism, or Temperance, or Communism, as the case may be. One grand trait of the editor, among many others, is to giv everyone a fair hearing. If this is not Liberalism, I know not its meaning; and for this kind principle some write, "Stop my paper!" What a pity! If I had not found out there was no use in prayer, and ceased the practice, I would pray for those weak Liberals. But they need something besides prayer; that will never save them. Nothing short of evolution will reach their case. But even the evil—if it is one—is seeming to terminate in good results. Just see what Brother Kelso did—sent four subscribers for one who said, "Stop my paper!" I will venture one assertion—I think our friend Kelso has a large and useful soul while he is alive and among us. Whether he is able to retain it after death, deponent saith not.

Inclosed you will find $3.60, for which apply $3 to subscription, 25 cents for the ANNUAL, 25 cents for "Bible Morals," and 10 cents for "False Claims." I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER over eleven years, and do not wish to be without it.

Wishing you prosperity and happiness, and a rapid progress of Liberalism, I subscribe myself,

Yours fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

ORANGE, CAL., March 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is all that is claimed for it, and its new feature that of introducing portraits, adds much to its value. Through the pen thousands of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator hav become acquainted with the character and individuality of prominent Liberals in all parts of the country, but their facial features, in many cases, are not familiar to the eye, for person or picture hav never been seen. I think all are more or less apt to create pictures in the imagination of persons whose writings hav made a lasting impression, and these imaginary pictures, like ideas formed of an unseen city or country, are not always correct, if ever; but they exist until the real supplants the imaginary.

In your choice collection I see the portraits of quite a number I hav had the pleasure of seeing and hearing on the rostrum, and if those I havn't seen are as accurately represented there is little room for criticism. Well may the Freethinkers of this country feel proud of their leaders, for a nobler band of humanity's friends were never grouped together by portraits. What radical thought, what sound logic, clear reason, and common sense hav gone forth to the world from the brains of these individuals represented by the artist in the ANNUAL! How many hav been led up out of the depths of ignorance, fear, and superstition by their untiring efforts, and what an impetus Freethought has gained in this country from their continued perseverance! All hail, bold men and brave women! This world is better than you found it, and you hav not lived in vain, as future generations will testify, though condemned and opposed by the intolerant and bigoted of this.

The reading contents of the ANNUAL is excellent, and to George Macdonald must be given credit for one of the ablest and most finished contributions contained therein. Should young men with his ability continue to rise from the Freethought ranks we need not fear for the advance guard as the old and tried pass from the scene of action. Messrs. Seaver and Wright apparently retain their pristine vigor, and what they say is earnest and sensible, as usual. Each and every article is interesting, and no better investment for a like sum can be made than the purchase of a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

C. SEVERANCE.

THE CHICAGO GHOST.

CHICAGO, April 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Unfortunately I did not see THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 28th until to-day; I ought to hav seen it before, or not at all. I do not know what can be said to people who resort to deliberate falsehood to exonerate themselvs, since readers hav no means of knowing who speaks the truth, but at least I shall protest, in duty to myself and twelve other good members, and many other people who believe in free speech and the truth. I shall count the "misstatements" and deny them, then I hav done with the Liberal League of Chicago forever; they may hav it all their own sweet way hereafter.

To use plain and exact English, there are, in the "official" letter, just twenty-two lies, and in Mr. Stevens's letter, five. I will not take space to refer to each one, but will notice the most glarin g.

The debates were not constantly on dynamite, the papers did not so report, the League was not called "Dynamite Hall." It is an uncalled-for insult to say "dynamiters monopolized the hall, night after night, without contributing so much as a nickel." No lecture, whether theological or otherwise, had called out a collection of more than five dollars for a long time, and the subject cut no figure in the amount raised. The debates were never "disgraceful;" the nearest they came to it was when that paragon of learning, Mr. Vickers, in a lecture, called members of the audience "monkeys" and "jackasses," and said all Spiritualists were either "knaves or fools." Naturally this was resented.

This is the first time I hav learned with certainty there was a meeting Thursday evening. They hav hardly had the audacity to own before that there was a meeting, for it was a secret one, only those being invited who were known to favor their side. At that meeting, I presume, the whole scheme was planned.

A real majority of bona fide members did want Spies to lecture, and there were many more than ten to hear him lecture. There was nothing underhanded in securing him, or in having the hall opened, as it had always been open on every Sunday evening for three years, and there had been no majority or rightful authority from any quarter to close it.

The charges against Mr. Stevens were signed by twelve members in good standing. It is a gratuitous insult, as well as falsehood, to say that half were not in good standing, as they were all old members who had stood by the League from its commencement, and tided it over its neediest time with their hard-earned money. Nothing could be more like black ingratitude than to say "several of the ten had no right to vote, as they had not paid their dues in two years." Not one of the twelve but had more than quadrupled their "dues" during their membership with their contributions. The books were "crooked," or fixed to suit the crowd, because they took new members on that Thursday evening, and at other times during the week, and I don't know that they even paid twenty-five cents. They refused to accept fifteen members whom they knew would vote with us, and who had joined at the usual invitation given out every Sunday evening and in the usual manner. Either Mr. Freeman is a very incompetent secretary, or dues were deliberately scratched, for credit was not found on the books where the money was known and proved to hav been paid.

I hav never spoken bitterly of Ingersoll, or half as much against him as Mr. Stevens has. I admire him in a great many things, and not in other respects. Mr. Simpson did not go to different societies and get members by paying twenty-five cents.

I was not in favor of holding the "board of directors" meeting. I scarcely understood what they were getting at, till they were passing "resolutions," one after another, that had been all arranged beforehand. Mr. Furey is first vice-president, and was not notified of the meeting. I ask Mr. William Johnson to face me and say he did not hav an iron poker in his hand. He held it raised over Mr. Simpson's head not three feet from my own.

Mr. Stevens well understands how the press misrepresents everything said by a Radical, and yet he resorts to the trick of sending a newspaper clipping to prove my sentiments. Why does he not tell what he has heard me say, or someone else who knows me?

There are but very few old members now. The audience, when I looked in one evening, was an entirely new one. They may laugh, but they well know that debates drag now since the old, well-known members left, and that what I say is true. Mr. Hinkley did not say what he is accused of; and Mr. Simpson is recognized by abler men than Stevens as a very intelligent, well-informed speaker. My tears are dried, for I am done weeping over the degeneracy of the Chicago League.

LIZZIE M. SWANK.

MAN'S NATURAL RIGHTS ARE THE GUARANTEE OF HIS SOCIAL HAPPINESS.

CAMPTON, March 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Man's natural rights are founded on his natural wants. All hav an equal right to life, liberty, knowledge, happiness; happiness rests on knowledge, knowledge on liberty, liberty on life; life contemplates, liberty investigates, knowledge decides that man is nativ to earth, air, and water; and in this he claims no more than the humblest shrub. He constructs a garment to protect himself from cold, a shed to shield from storms; he plants, cultivates, and grows a hill of corn; he contemplates these and concludes that he is sole owner of his own productions; he sees no natural relation between them and any other being; here he rests in happiness. Man is also a social being; has a nativ right to associate with his kind, for the happiness of all; society has a right to formulate laws for the good of all; but looking back over society as it is, how inharmonious has it become! Selfishness and greed hav ruled the world; natural rights are violated, until earth is a pandemonium. The few hav absorbed the wealth, and the many are disinherited.

Man evidently began association in the childhood of the race; his experience and knowledge were limited, but his imagination seems to hav been prolific; he imagined all phenomena ruled by unseen personalities. That is the lingering discord in the world to-day. The race is advancing toward manhood, and has learned by experience that nature is the only apparent ruler. Our social savants hav taught from "way back" that nature and social man stand at crosss-words, parleying for compromise; they teach man must surrender some of his natural rights for the public good, without which we can hav no society. I totally repudiate this idea, and brand it as a libel on nature, a slander against humanity; and challenge scientists to produce one necessary social law that conflicts with nativ rights. Nature will never surrender; she never is in conflict with herself; and what are we but a part of nature? She will conquer all errors with men for her soldiers. We know that if we obey nature she doubly rewards us, we obtain harmony with her and with ourselvs; but violations of her laws produce discord; discord produces disease, and misery, and death. Man's province, like the humblest plant, is to seek the harmony of his environment; his highest happiness to attain it; this is nature's law for all that livs; she spreads for our admiring gaze one vast system of harmonious differentiation, and bids us imitate in our new structure of government for our social life. Let us take nature as architect and guide; let us build our government, from foundation to dome, of nativ timber, and embellish it with nature's harmonious differentiations of order and beauty, and we shall hav a home of this world which is fitting for its growing life.

"And then we'll raise on Liberty's broad base
A structure of wise government; and show
In our new world a glorious spectacle
Of social order. Freemen, equals all,
By reason swayed, self-governed, self-improved;
And the electric chain of public good
Twined round the private happiness of each."

J. S. THOMSON.

WANSHIP, UTAH, Feb. 10 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The shape of things in Utah to-day makes polygamy an interesting question. A son of the late Brigham (Alfales) and a son of a leading bishop, Rawlings, and quite a number of other leading young men, hav organized under the name of Democratic Club, to oppose the Mormon leaders, by lecturing the people to renounce polygamy and such strict obedience to the priesthood. The government officials seem determined to prosecute polygamists. "Prophet Taylor," several of the "twelve apostles," our women, children, and all Mormons, when under oath to prosecute polygamy, will lie outrageously, or "don't know." So we cannot successfully prosecute them, but hav got several hundred indicted for unlawful cohabitation. So great numbers of our leading men hav run the country, or are hid so the officers cannot find them (our bishop here among them). You'd think the people would see that there was no deity protecting them when their leaders had to hide like felons; but, no, it makes them all the more zealous, and it is said that hundreds are entering polygamous relations just to show their zeal, and hav to sneak to their wives' rooms after dark. It is my conviction that the majority of the people here are really in earnest, and think the absurd things they claim are true. But the leaders, who are well educated men, must know they are humbugs and frauds, and, as they hav immense wealth, they rely upon some political intrigue to help them out. The leader can handle this entire community as easily as I can turn my hand over. They will implicitly obey any command he givs, either to fight, run, lie, steal, or vote any ticket he givs them, and swear they did so of their own choice. They are the best organized people on earth. Nearly, or quite, all hold some office, which, attended to well, leads to promotion, and one village matched against another to see who can learn the most history of Prophet Joseph, and other absurd church creeds, some history and Bible interwoven so as to season it, and for one to dispute it they think you are bereft of sense. They are taught to believe that all but Mormons sustain prostitution, hence the superiority of polygamy, and the rough men and lewd women that follow our mining camps are positiv proof, so a girl would rather be a fifth or tenth wife of a "virtuous" man than—as they call non-Mormons—a gentile.

WM. REYNOLDS.

ITHACA, MICH., April 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been thinking of writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, but hav been waiting to get some money to renew my subscription, and try to get some new subscribers. I hav succeeded in getting two new subscribers and one renewal. I think I shall be able to send you two or three more subscribers before long. I hav read the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 28th, from B. A. Peet, on finance, on the streets of Ithaca, which was indorsed by many, and several promised to subscribe for the paper as soon as they could get the money. Many of these people had never heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER before. Mr. Peet is a fine business man, a great thinker, and true reformer. We hav good material here for a Liberal League if we could hav Messrs. Watts, Putnam, or Reynolds to come and wake them up and organize. We need some good speaker from abroad to awaken the latent energies of the Liberally inclined. Then, I think, we hav home talent sufficient to keep up a good organization.

Well, I would like to tell my experience in protracted meetings this winter. Rev. John D. Potter, of Boston, Mass., was sent for by the clergy of this place to help convert the heathen. I went to hear him. He preached in the Opera Hall, as the churches were not large enough to accommodate the great crowd that came to hear the great revivalist. He made a great spread; he had all the children seated right in front of the rostrum, the Sunday-school teachers next. Then he told wonderful stories about Jesus and the devil, and all about heaven and hell, and just what kind of people would inhabit each place. He made some awful faces when he pictured out the torments of hell, but he would suddenly brighten up and he would try to show how beautiful the saints would look in heaven when they saw their wicked neighbors writhing in hell. He said all Sabbath-breakers would go to hell; he said he knew this was so, for the Bible declared it. He said the Bible was the infallible word of an infallible God, and God would do all he had promised to do. After meeting was out, while the hall was nearly full, I had a talk with him. He overheard one of the ministers asking me questions and heard my answers, so he thought he would try his hand in. He asked me if I ever made a profession of religion. I told him I had, and had been a Methodist a good many years. He then asked me if I now believed the Bible to be God's word, and took it for my moral guide. I told him I did not. He then said I never knew God. I then asked him if he knew God. He said he did. I asked him how he looked, and asked him to show him to me, so I would know him. He then said he would giv me $100 if I would go before a college of ministers and prove I ever had any religion. I told him I would giv him $100 if he would prove that Sunday or the first day of the week was the Sabbath that God sanctified and blessed, and I would giv him $100 if he would prove the Bible was the infallible word of God.

He said I had better go out into the streets and let a mule talk to me. I told him I did not like to blackguard a minister, but if that was his best argument, I would pay him in his own coin. I told him I did not hav to go into the streets to get a mule to talk to me, as I had found a mule in the hall. I told him I would admit I could find out as much about God from a mule as I could from him. At this one of the sisters screeched out, "Let us pray for that man." I told them, "All right; let the ministers come down off the rostrum and form a prayer-circle, and I will remain in the midst and pay respectful attention to your prayers, and await the result; that if the Bible was what Mr. Potter claimed for it, and God would do what he had promised in Matt. xviii, 19, they could convert me in five minutes;" but they refused to pray and requested me to vacate the hall. There were four ministers present, but they hadn't faith enough to try the experiment. I told them I would vacate when the rest did. Brother Potter came to me and said he was going to pray for me to become a Christian, and he wanted me to pray for him to become an Infidel. I told him I had some hopes of a priest when he called on Infidels to pray for him. I told him when he wanted to convert an unbeliever, or an Infidel, not to try to do it by blackguardism. There is much more I would like to write, but I am making this letter too long already. One thing I must say. I love THE TRUTH SEEKER for its Liberal spirit. I fully indorse Brother George Lynn's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 4th. I shall never stop my paper because its columns are open to Christians, Materialists, and Spiritualists alike. When I get so far gone that I am not willing to grant to others the same rights and privileges that I ask for myself, I will join Brother Potter's church and become an intolerant. Thanking you for sending my paper so long after my subscription had expired, I remain,

Yours for universal mental liberty, ISAAC GABRION.

MARIPOSA, CAL., March 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $7.25, $3 to renew my subscription for one year, 1886, the balance for books, as elsewhere directed.

I want to say to you I am well pleased with the action of the last Liberal Congress in every way. The Nine Demands of Liberalism are enough for Liberalism to be cumbered with at one time, and the change of name is, I think, a good thing for the cause, and then the officers rank as high as any like number of men in this country in everything that makes men honored by all good people. Our cause will surely prosper under the leadership of such men, and the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER to back them. It seems to me the Liberals of this country should form an independent political party before the next presidential election, and show our strength. I would like to liv to see this country governed strictly by the old Jeffersonian principle once more.

Yours for the cause, S. L. HOGAN.

PROHIBITION RUN MAD.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., March 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR AND TRUTH SEEKERS: I wish to intrude upon your valuable space once more to tell you and the TRUTH SEEKER family the good (or maybe bad) news. The Prohibitionists hav succeeded in passing a new temperance bill through both houses of our legislature, and with the aid of another they are about to pass will probably be able to enforce the Prohibitory law in Kansas. Then, according to their promis, we will get rid of all the evil that has been annoying our good people so long — as a majority of our voters were sober saints before the law was enacted, and, of course, all the women besides. Now that they hav removed all temptation to commit crimes from the rest, it is not reasonable to suppose they will soon be able to banish all vice and crime by law, and legislate us all right into heaven in spite of old Splitfoot. Then the song,

"There's a land that is fairer than this, will be sung and played out, for we will hav it right here. This will certainly be glorious news to Sister Lou Leath Snyder, of Mt. Summit, Ind., to whom I wish to say a few words in reply to hers in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 28th. But first let me say once for all that I am not in sympathy with the rum traffic or saloon, at least, not as they are conducted, and would be heartily glad to know that every saloon had closed up (both front and back doors), and the bartenders gone to some better business. I am not a "poor, miserable, drunken sot," nor do I find Anti-Prohibitionists drunkards as a rule, while, as a rule, men that sign the temperance pledge are (or claim to be) reformed drunkards. The idea that all who are opposed to the Prohibitory law are also opposed to temperance, and are in favor of the saloon and drunkards, is absurd and untrue. I, as much as anybody, wish to get rid of the rum traffic. What I am opposed to is the way they (the Prohibitionists) are working at it, as they hav so far only made it worse. The more they stir the hateful thing the worse it will stink. Their remedy is impracticable, and will never succeed while man's nature is what it is at present. Lovers of liberty will not be coerced. It is not always the best way to cure a sore thumb to cut it off, as it would only make a bad matter worse. I believe our temperance law to be intemperate in the extreme.
And by faith we can see it afar"

Mrs. Snyder says, "He [I] seems to ignore the fact that intoxicants contain within themselvs the very cause of intemperance." No, not the fact, but the assertion, I do. Intoxicants are not the cause of intemperance, but the means by which it is indulged. The real cause lies far back of drink. The desire for liquor erected the distillery, and will always continue to do so—if not legally, then illegally. "He who opposes Prohibition is apt to show by his conduct that his appetite is stronger than his principle." Wrong again; it is they that hav little moral principle or will-power, that want law and depend on it to keep them right, that so often go wrong in spite of law and fall a "victim to the snares set at every corner by the rumseller," and, as I hav said before, the more we try to prop such men up by law, the weaker they get.

"Would Mr. Hutcheson's manhood be gratified by having a privilege spared him because he can use and not abuse it?" Yes, ma'am; and I wish to say for my neighbors that two-thirds of them are not "drunken sots," and going "to utter degradation." No, two-thirds, yes, nine-tenths, of them are sober men (moderate drinkers), and do not want their liberties taken from them because the tenth one abuses his. Thanks for the timely warning. I shall still depend on myself to keep sober, and not on law, and thereby hope to steer clear.

The personal fling at my manhood is excused. I will say in conclusion that I am opposed to the Prohibitory law because I consider it an intermeddling with liberty to no effect, save to aggravate and make a bad matter worse.

The drinking too much whisky is but one phase of intemperance, and education, not law, will make men sober and better. It is impossible to prohibit all that has evil in it, as nothing is either all good or all evil. Money is a great temptation to do evil, but I hardly think we could do as well without it. Horses, too, tempt thieves to steal them; shall we prohibit the raising and use of them on that account? No, if we persist in prohibiting all that has evil in it, we may as well petition the Great I Am to blot this little sin-stricken earth out of the universe—and we would be as apt to succeed.

H. H. HUTCHESON.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, March 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: As others hav given their views of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, I must say a little in its praise, as I hav received it all right, and how you got up such a handsome pamphlet for the small sum of twenty-five cents it puzzles me to know, with the intelligent likenesses of so many brave men and women that are come to the front in the Freethought ranks, speaking their minds clear and free against all theological humbug. Yes, I admire the likenesses of them all, and I defy all the holy critters of Christendom to produce a better lot of intelligent, good-looking people in all their outfit, with Jesus Christ into the bargain.

Well, Mr. Editor, I must tell you I admire the letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 7th from Mr. Charles F. Blackburn, of Salt Lake City. It has the true and proper ring with it, and what he has said is true and correct. Old Taylor, the great Mormon mogul, is hiding and skulking in various places now to evade the law, and other Mormon lights are lighting out by the underground route, as Uncle Sam's deputy marshals are making times somewhat lively for the old debauching, lecherous, and adulterous brutes, and I hope the officers of this mighty nation will shortly wipe the nasty, treasonable concern out of existence, for this beastly animal outfit is a sore curse to this delightful territory, and a standing reproach to the nation, for there is not a polygamous cuss in the whole territory but what is a traitor to the government, and their everyday acts show it. But, then, you see, the infernal old Jew book sanctions all this beastly rascality and murder as well. Well, Mr. Editor, my neighbor came to me the other day and asked me to write a few lines to you to see if you could in any way use your influence with Col R. G. Ingersoll, and see if he would use his influence with the heads of the nation to wipe out this abominable practice of polygamy in this territory. And if you or Colonel Ingersoll should wish to hav that pretended revelation on polygamy, we can procure it and send it to you.

I will say there will be thousands of women here that will rejoice and be thankful for Mr. Cleveland and his cabinet to giv orders to wipe out this beastly animal concern, for many poor women are bound in fetters that are far worse than iron. In fact, they are fast bound in mental slavery, and many hav been put in the grave with a broken heart. And I hope Mr. Blackburn will write again in THE TRUTH SEEKER, also Mr. Andrew Cahoos, as he has been in this territory many years, and, of course, he knows a thing or two of the horrid past

WM. WILLIAMS.

POTTSVILLE, PA., March 8, 1885

MR. EDITOR: Will you please send to my address the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, advertised in your paper. I hav inclosed the required amount.

I hav received four numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am too well pleased to wish to drop it when my three months shall expire.

I see there hav been Liberal lectures delivered in Altoona, Frackville, and in other sections about here. Can we not hav a few in Pottsville as well? There are not many Liberals residing here, but we might add to the number if something of that kind were started. We hav the usual amount of intelligence here that is found in all towns where religion and superstition predominate. Please giv the matter a thought and oblige Yours, MRS. M. S. CLOWES.

MURRAY, IDAHO, March 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $12.50, which you will apply as directed. I will do what I can to get more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and to help the Campaign Fund. I think if a good lecturer would come here about June or July we could organize a Liberal club and get many more subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would not cost much if they were coming along the North Temple Railroad to stop at Thompson Falls and come in the mines and deliver two or three lectures. Besides, I think that they could get more than their expenses from the Liberals, as there are a good many here. I would do what I could to help them out. If any lecturer will write me in May—about the first of the month—I will answer and see what I can do for them. Your friend, A. ERVIN.

JORDAN, MINN., March 23, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not most deliciously refreshing to think that in this enlightened age of the world men can be found claiming to be not only sane, but to be possessed of superior intelligence, and yet they never seem to tire of carping and prating about something they call "blasphemy?" Now, is it not a self-evident fact that before there can be any blasphemy there must be something to blaspheme? And the question naturally arises, What is that something? I maintain that the whole fabric of the Christian religion is founded and rests on five mere superstitions: (1) that there is a God; (2) that there is a devil; (3) that there is a heaven; (4) that there is a hell; and (5) that man has a soul. And I further maintain that all the metaphysical speculations, and all the theological creeds and dogmas, and all the fanciful theories in regard to the creation, the fall of man, total depravity, the atonement, immortality, and the resurrection of the body, are all based, root and branch, on those five superstitions.

Now, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction, I unhesitatingly assert that there is not a man in existence who knows anything whatever in regard to any one of these five suppositions. And I further assert that there is not a man in existence, to-day, who can giv us a clear and intelligible explanation, or description, or even a sensible idea, of what God is. This being the case, I demand to know how it was ascertained that God is a trinity, or that God had a son, or that God has said and done thus and so, or that there is any God at all. Will some of those babbling, sanctimonious persons be good enough to answer these very proper and and pertinent questions?

Now, it does seem to me that a little impartial investigation and a little calm and dispassionate reflection, ought to be sufficient to convince any intelligent person of the fact that all the theological absurdities, and all the fanciful and superstitious notions and theories in regard to gods, ghosts, devils, saints, angels, and miracles are nothing more than mere creatures of the human imagination, and the inventions of a crafty and unscrupulous priesthood for their own benefit and advantage, which enable them to liv in princely ease and luxury on the credulity and at the expense of their simpleton dupes.

Now, in view of the foregoing facts, what an outrage against common sense it is that anyone should be imprisoned and punished on such a shallow pretense as blasphemy! I look upon the simple idea of blasphemy as being one of the most detestable and outrageous absurdities of which the human mind can conceive, and I hope that the time is not very far distant when if a judge can be found who would condescend to pander to the minions of superstition, and thereby degrade the dignity of his office, by pronouncing sentence to inflict actual punishment for a supposed insult to an imaginary deity, he will find, Othello-like, his occupation gone. Yours, for truth and THE TRUTH SEEKER, THOMAS KNOTT.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

There's Danger.

Write it on the liquor store,
Write it on the prison door,
Write it on the gin shop fine,
Write—aye, write this truthful line:
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Write it on the work-house gate,
Write it on the schoolboy's slate,
Write it in the copy-book,
That the young may on it look;
"Where there's drink there's danger."

Write it on the church-yard mound,
Where the drink-slain dead are found;
Write it on the gallows high,
Write it for all passers-by:
"Where there's drink there's danger."

Write it underneath your feet,
Up and down the busy street;
Write it for the great and small,
In the mansion, cot, and hall:
"Where there's drink there's danger."

Write it on the ships which sail,
Borne along by storm and gale,
Write it in large letters plain,
O'er our land and past the main:
"Where there's drink there's danger."

The Lark's Midnight Melody.

'Twas not a nightingale singing
Awaking me out of my sleep,
Though far I had been in my dreaming
The dreams no mortals may keep;
The dreams that reveal but the shadow,
The night-side of noon and its flow'rs,
But the lark with songs of the morning
Came lighting that midnight of ours.

The clock was scarcely done chiming
The lone solemn bell striking one,
When from her low nest on the prairie,
And ere the faint dawn was begun,
Rehearsing again and repeating,
Her songs enchanting the air;
Such heart with rapture o'erflowing
Might hasten the morning so fair.

When the gray, the pink, and the golden
Were blent in the gates of the morn;
And many sweet songsters were coming
O'er fields newly plowed for the corn,
O'er the young wheat glad in its freshness,
And prairie land dewy and sweet,
The lark's speckled treasures were hiding
In the blue flowing grass at our feet.

O sweet mother-bird in your nesting!
What wonder your music has filled
Every hour the sunlight has woven,
And the ebon of midnight has thrilled?
I shall listen to-night for your singing
That heralds the beauty of morn,
In the elm-tree close to my window,
And in the long rows of the corn.

My baby was moaning and restless,
And my heart seemed broken with pain;
And I welcomed the gush of your warble
That fell as the sun on the rain.
Sweet messenger, ever to heed thee,
Thy lesson is better than gold;
No mother should harbor a sorrow
Whose own arms her nestlings enfold.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Grandmother's Drawer.

In the home of my childhood, in what was called the "spare room," stood the high, old-fashioned bureau, or chest of drawers, which belonged to my grandmother.

Often had I pulled with all my might at the brass handles, trying in vain to open them, that I might explore the secrets I believed they contained; but they were securely locked, and the key in the bottom of grandmother's capacious pocket.

One day, on going into the room for something, I found grandmother sitting in a chair by the bureau, with one of the drawers open before her, and her lap filled with its mysterious contents.

My curiosity was only increased by the careful manner in which she was handling them, and she gave a little start as I asked her if I might come and see her pretty things.

"Yes, dear," she said with a sigh, "come and sit down on this low stool, and I will show them to you."

Had I been seated at the feet of the genie of Aladdin's lamp, I should not hav expected to hav seen more wonderful revelations.

First, she took up from the bundle in her lap a dingy-looking piece of paper, and, slowly unfolding it, showed me a lock of hair, and from its fineness I knew it was that of a child.

"This," said she, "is little Nettie's hair. She was two years and ten days old when she died. She was next older than your mother, and the brightest and best child I ever knew; and when the doctor told me she could not liv I wept bitterly, when she looked up, and, seeing my tears, she said, 'Don't cry, mamma, I will be well in the morning.'

"Just as the sun was rising, flooding the world with light, she died, while I heard a peculiar ringing in my ears that sounded like beautiful music. She is still my little girl, for time does not change her to me as it has the others that hav lived and grown up."

After kissing the golden curl, while a tear fell upon it from her cheek, she gently replaced it in the little box, and then took up another paper, with the word "present" on the outside. When opened, it had only a few lines in verse that ran thus:

"O my Annette, my charming Annette,
Your face is as fair, and your diction as pretty,
As any fair lady that livs in the city."

I saw it was signed by a man's name that was not grandfather's, and I asked, half indignantly, "Did anyone ever love you but grandpa?"

She looked at me, while a blush suffused her faded cheek, as modest as ever tinged a young maiden's face, and replied: "That was given me by Colonel Walters when we were school-children together; we liked each other, for he would always take my part if any of the boys would try to impose upon me; and, in later years, I could hav married him, but he went West and died there many years ago."

"Ought you not to hav married him?" I ventured to ask. "I thought we ought to marry the first one that loves us."

"That is not so, child; true love is a union of hearts and minds, at first but a beautiful flower, that takes years to perfect."

"What is this, grandma?" I asked, taking up a piece of changeable silk.

"That's a piece of my wedding-dress, and," she added, with a look of honest pride, "it was said at the time that we were the best looking couple ever married in Trinity church. Your grandfather's hair was black as a coal, and I wore mine in ringlets, and looked almost as young as you do now," but I saw a beauty in her face that had been put there since by the loving smiles of many years.

She next unrolled a piece of book-muslin, containing a lock of light brown hair, that I recognized as being my aunt's, who had died when I was quite a child, and was first brought face to face with death's dread mystery. I remembered her as a pale young woman, to whom I used to carry wild flowers from the woods and fields, and was repaid with her sweet smile and gentle thanks as she would take them in her white hand and inhale their fragrance, her life going out as fast as theirs.

After looking at these mementoes for a short time, speaking to herself in a low tone, she replaced them all in the drawer again, then turning to me, she said: "You may keep the key now, and when I am gone, remember the lesson of Grandmother's Drawer."

2.—AN ARMY PROBLEM.

Well, here's a sort of soft-shelled nut,
'Gainst which the rodents all may butt;
I'll keep the kernel 'till they try,
And send it to you by and by.
Twenty-five miles an army corps
Across the country stretches o'er.
The general, who bears the brunt
Of all its cares, is at the front,
Camping at night. When morning comes,
They move with bugles, fifes, and drums,
En masse, just fifteen miles away,
And camp again at close of day;
While down the line, observing all,
To where the army's foot shall fall,
The general rides in grand review;
Precisely to the moment true,
Returns in time to join the head,
When they with him incline to bed.
Twenty-five miles long the corps abides;
Tell me how far the general rides.

Correspondence.

CLEARWATER, NEB, April 12, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav wanted to thank you for the trouble you must hav had with my story of "Aunt Patty and the Wolves," and for its neat appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I now send you a little poem, which was suggested by hearing a lark singing in the night, which our Nebraska larks often do. I do not remember that I ever heard them sing in Illinois or Iowa in the night time. There are other birds in this state that sing after nightfall, but I don't know what species they are.

Can you excuse my ink, which has so nearly failed along with the paper, and my only gold pen, too, at the same time? Truly "misfortunes never come single."

If it will not sound like egotism, allow me to congratulate you on the beautiful stories and poems in the Children's Corner. Can't we hav one soon telling about the beautiful scenery around Fall River?

Sometime, perhaps, I shall try to tell the children how our dog Ponto came to hav such a queer crown; but I wish you could hav the facts, and tell it in your own charming manner.

With much love and respect, I am
Yours truly, MARY B. FINCH.

LAURA, O., April 18, 1886

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see there is no letter in the Children's Corner this week, so I thought I would write one. I am a little girl eleven years old—the oldest child and the baby. I go to school. I learned "Guilty or Not Guilty," and spoke it on the last day of school. I hav the "Story Hour." I like to read it very much. I go to Sunday-school to learn to sing. Mr. Remsburg lectured at our place and at the Ludlow Falls last summer. He stayed all night with us. I did not know much about the lectures, but I enjoyed going to the grove; and mamma says she hopes Mr. Reynolds will pitch his tent there about two weeks next summer, and I hope he will, too; for I know papa and mamma will go every day if they like him as much as they do Mr. Remsburg. CLARA A. BRANDON.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER TO MISS WIXON.
April 12, 1885.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I am well pleased with "Story Hour," it is so natural and child-like in its tone and simplicity. No trail of the serpent on its fair pages, or reference to a bloody cross or angry deity, to fill the minds of children with fear and dread. How much better than most literature for the young! With love, L. HUTCHINSON.

PETROLIA, CAL., March 29, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner, and I think it is very nice. I will be thirteen years old the 26th of April, and weigh ninety-eight pounds. Our school begins the 6th of April, with Miss Nancy Stephenson for teacher. I hav read "Apples of Gold," and I think it is a very nice book. I hav read every Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours sincerely, ANNA M. DUDLEY.

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition.

The Missing Link —IN— MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul.

ALL in a LIFETIME.

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

New Reading.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES. Translated from the French. A new edition with sixty-seven engravings. Complete in one volume. New York: Peter Eckler. Price, cloth, $2; half calf or half morocco, $4. Sold at this office.

When our old friend Eckler does anything, he does it well. This reprint of Voltaire's Romances is as handsome a volume as ever comes from the press.

Of the stories it need only be said, they are Voltaire's. Old readers will be glad to get them in their present beautiful shape; new readers hav in the book a wide and deep mine of pleasure opened to them. "They are a timely offering to the present generation of readers, and will prove doubly refreshing after the surfeit of modern novels. Their quaintness, piquancy, and simplicity are altogether delightful. They hav, beside, great power and purpose, their keen satire and trenchant wit cutting deep into the foibles of society and follies of religious rites and superstition. Lovers of intellectual liberty, haters of cant and hypocrisy, and defenders of the weak, innocent, and oppressed, will read and reread these romances with unaffected delight." So says Mr. Eckler, and we agree with him. Something that Mr. Eckler is too modest to say we must say for him. That is, to mention the great value to the present generation of Freethinkers of the short preface he has written for the tales, and of the Notes. The printing of three authenticated portraits of Voltaire as he appeared at different ages is also a meritorious work. The tales given are: The White Bull; a Satirical Romance; Zadig, or Fate; The Sage and the Atheist; The Princess of Babylon; The Man of Forty Crowns; The Huron, or; the Pupil of Nature; Micromegas; The Study of Nature; and three shorter pieces, A Conversation with a Chinese, Plato's Dream, A Pleasure in Having No Pleasure, and an Adventure in India. Persons skilled in reading between the lines will find in these tales more sarcasm and ridicule of venerable absurdities than any other writer has ever been able to crowd into stories several times as voluminous. It was only his ability to veil his real intentions and sentiments that enabled Voltaire to reach the age he did. His education among the Jesuits was very valuable to him, and it was the free use of their methods that saved his life. He could even hoodwink the pope (Benedict XIV.), and a writer who could placate such a church official while unrestrainedly combating his religion had in him elements of greatness certainly unparalleled by any other writer of that century. Voltaire was a sincere Theist, and claimed to be religious, but through all his polemical writing there runs a cynicism excessivly irritating to a Christian. Catholicism was his particular foe, but it is doubtful if he had in his heart any respect whatever for any division of the religious system of which Catholicism was in his time the chief sinner. His blood boiled, says Macaulay, at the sight of cruelty and injustice, and in an age of religious persecution, judicial torture, and arbitrary imprisonment, he made manful war, with every faculty he possessed, on what he considered as abuses; and on many signal occasions placed himself gallantly between the powerful and the oppressed.

Bearing these things in mind—Voltaire's real opinions—the times in which he lived—the means he was compelled to use to get before the public—the constant danger to liberty and life to which he was exposed—these Romances hav a peculiar and powerful fascination for the Freethinkers of to-day, and they hav reason to thank Mr. Eckler for bringing them out in such an admirable manner.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? AND OTHER AGNOSTIC POEMS. By Samuel P. Putnam. 20 pp. Price, 10 cents. Published and for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Ever since Mr. Putnam left the pulpit he has been writing occasional poems of great merit. They are all conspicuous for the poetic ardor they express and full of "that high light whereby the world is saved." For the purposes of the present collection he has gathered a dozen of these together and printed them in a neat pamphlet, with the title-piece first. This is followed by the "Golden Age," which happy time he places in the future, and limns its beauties with a glowing pen. The "Ideal and the Real" next claim his attention, and he finds that the ideal, made the subject of daily endeavor, may become in time the real. A touching tribute is paid to the memory of Campbell Wilson in a poem in blank verse under the title of "Not Dead but Living." "Fruition" is dedicated to Mrs. L. M. Nicholson, of Vincennes, Ind., who lived, worked, and died in the Liberal faith. Tennyson's poem on "Despair" is offset by a better one on "Hope." Then we hav a tribute to "Thomas Paine;" and, seeing sermons in stones, inspiration in the groves, and good in everything, the author givs us in noble measure his impressions of "Nature's Gospel" received "in the woods near Seymour." In an "Address to the Deity" we find Mr. Putnam's position on the God problem set forth in strong numbers. After having searched in vain for sign of heavenly throne or king, or city not built by hands, he returns to Nature and holds communion with her visible forms. He says:

"Before the wondrous Universe I bow;
Before its awful glooms and glories vast;
Before its regal sweep of beauteous law;
Above, beyond, no mortal mind can reach—
There is no more—for these are infinit."

So this little book makes a valuable collection of Freethought poems. It will do anyone good to read it.

The Secular hymn "Giv us Light," at the end of the book, sometimes recited by Mr Charles Watts at the conclusion of his lectures, should not be overlooked. If one must pray, he would hardly find a more suitable prayer than this.

TOKOLOGY. A Book for Every Woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M.D. Sanitary Publishing Co., 159 LaSalle st., Chicago, Ill. 350 pp., 24 colored plates. Full morocco, $2.50; cloth, $2.00

For a number of years, thoughtful and scientific minds hav seen that parturition may be painless. The author of "Tokology" sets out to explain how this may be done. Dr. Stockholm is a woman of great force and intelligence, of Quaker origin, a practicing physician for many years, and believes that much, if not all, the suffering and danger attending childbirth may be prevented by scientific knowledge. "Tokology" is very free from technical terms so often found in many books on health, and the delicate subjects upon which Dr. Stockholm treats are handled in a plain, chaste, and original manner, making it of great value in every family. Tokology has also a special value to every person in giving the cause, prevention, and cure of constipation, dyspepsia, headache, etc., with directions for thermal and other baths at home. That this book was needed and is duly appreciated is proved by the urgent demand for it in the West, where the author is well and favorably known. It has reached in a few months its twenty-third edition, and received from prominent physicians of both sexes and from thinkers and philanthropists the most flattering encomiums.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. By M. Babcock. The Truth Seeker Company: New York, 33 Clinton Place. Price 10 cents.

The subjects discussed in this finely-printed pamphlet are, besides the title above given, Satan and Hades, Some Reasons why I am Not a Christian, Divinity of the Bible, Theological Logic, Preachers are Not Honest, Preachers sometimes Differ, Infant Damnation, Prayer, The Cloak of Charity, The Clergy were Afraid, No Fear of Being Damned, But What are We to Do? But Why Should I Be Damned? Why Not Pray for the Damned? Conclusion.

Those who hav read Mr. Babcock's previous pamphlets will want this one. It is crowded with facts and arguments against the Christian church, and should be circulated freely, for as a missionary document it will rank with Ingersoll's "Orthodoxy" and Remsburg's "False Claims."

ESSAYS ON DEATHS AND FUNERALS. Part II.—After Death What? By Joseph Henry, of Salinas, Kan. Price 25 cents. Sold at this office.

Part I. of this pamphlet has been before the public for several months. Of Part II., just out, Mrs. Slenker has written the following for publication:

"I hav just received this carefully prepared work from the author, Joseph Henry, of Salina, Kan., and hav read it with great interest. It certainly proves, from reason and common sense, that no one need fear to die from the dread of what will come after death. It also givs strong Materialistic proof that the soul being only the mind, and mind being only the effect of brain power, we shall only be ourselvs so long as we hav a living mind and brain in our living body, and therefore death is the final end of each identity. He says: 'No dead body, whether it be plant or animal, can be restored to its natural functions; therefore, to think that a defunct body should appear to us in the form of a spirit is absurd. . . . The communications from the spirit-land are an insult to the intelligence of our age. . . . It is when people are sick, dying, and dead that the priest and the fanatic try to work their will upon them and their grieving friends. See how they are trying to get some recognition from poor, suffering Grant. A man who would hav nothing to do with prayers and powwows while he was well and strong now finds himself yielding to a power he has no strength to resist, and when he is gone we hav only to look for a continuation of the mummery all through his funeral and burial. It will not stop even there, but we shall hav communications from him in the Spiritual papers, even as we hav from D. M. Bennett, couched in language that would disgrace a schoolboy. The world owes a debt of gratitude to its pioneers in reform. Joseph Henry has faithfully and earnestly worked for years and years to educate the people into a higher realm concerning deaths and funerals. I hope he will be encouraged and appreciated now, while he is still with us. He is an old man now, and he has published these two essays through the strictest of economies, depriving himself of the comforts of life that he might giv to humanity this legacy of his brain."

INGGLISH AS SHE IZ SPELT. Compiled by Fritz Federheld. G. W. Carleton & Co., New York. Price 25 cents. Sold at this office.

With the press copies of this book the publishers send the following notice:

"Ever since the time of Chaucer, English spelling has been the anxiety of writers, the butt of wits, and the care of reformers. The little book which bears the above ludicrous title is a collection of verses, anecdotes, and extracts, illustrating the oddities of the current and former styles of spelling. It contains letters from 'fourth class' postmasters and others, in which are the wildest of guesses at the customary spelling, and a list of spellings of place-names taken from letters which passed through the Boston post-office. The uncertainty as to what ough spells is the theme of several poems, one by J. R. Planche on the pronunciation of the name Houghton being especially witty. A series of extracts is given, showing the condition of English spelling at intervals of about fifty years, from Chaucer to Samuel Johnson, with other items of historical interest. There are also ingenious letters by Professor Gregory and President Barnard, presentiug some spellings, justifiable on the principle that if k-n-o-w spells know, k-g-o-w should spell go. Those erratic spellers, Artemus Ward, Josh Billings, and Petroleum V. Nasby, are represented by passages dealing in a humorous way with spelling and other literary matters. The columns of Puck and other comic papers hav been laid under contribution, and a wide variety of selections has been secured. without including any of those labored and pointless jokes which are so painfully familiar. The book is a thoroughly amusing one, and the reader who cannot laugh over it would need to be tickled with a club."

To which we may add that this book is a first-rate document in favor of spelling reform, as showing the steady growth toward simplicity of the English language, and the absurdity of still clinging to orthographic pedantries fully as ridiculous as many long since given up.

IMMORTALITY INHERENT IN NATURE. By Warren Sumner Barlow, author of The Voices; Orthodox Hash; If, Then, and When. With a steel-plate engraving of the author. Cloth, beveled edges, price 60 cents. Sold at this office.

Mr. Barlow is a pleasant versifier, and all his poems read well. He is a Spiritualist, and, we should judge by this book, also a Theist. There is a superabundance of Theistic—not to say Christian—expressions in this work, a superabundance that palls upon the Agnostic or Atheistic reader. The first poem, "God is All in All," begins,

"Eternal Father—Life divine, Thou boundless Evermore," and ends,

"We feel thou art the central source
Of Being, Life, and Thought."

Another poem, "Design versus Chance," is a total misapprehension of the versus, for no opponent of the design theory holds, admits, or thinks that the universe is governed by chance any more than it is by "Jehovah's Fatherhood." As an argument for God and immortality Mr. Barlow's book is of no great value. As an assumption of these, we hav no quarrel with it, if the fact that it is an assumption be admitted. As poetry from his standpoint, it is superior to many more pretentious works.

CHRIST AND CHRISTIANITY. An Essay. London: 32 Fleet street. Price threepence.

A Christian document of 34 octavo pages. It is not orthodox, but is as unreasonable in many parts as though it were. There are, however, a few good paragraphs in it denying the accepted theories of the atonement and the resurrection, and asserting the uselessness of miracles.

ROMER, KING OF NORWAY, and Other Dramas. By Adair Welcker. Cloth, $1.50. Sold by the author at Sacramento, Cal.

"These works," the author says, "are placed in book form in order that the people of a future age may hav the opportunity to open their mouths with wonder at the utterances of a very ordinary dead man, and that commentators in that day may hav a method of making a living. By a strange unanimity of opinion," he adds, "they hav been pronounced to be made of the same material as the writings of the greatest of dramatists. The humble hope of the writer is that they hav been put into such a shape that they will take part against wrong and wage war for the right." As we hav not had time to read the book, we hav taken the foregoing "review," from the preface of the work itself.

SCIENCE VERSUS THEOLOGY. By J. J. McCabe. Price 10 cents. Sold at this office.

This lecture, delivered before the Ingersoll Secular Society of Boston, is a review of many of the absurd statements of the Christian Bible and theology. The lecture is bright, oftentimes witty, sometimes eloquent, and the pamphlet is a good one to disseminate in the interest of Freethought.

Mr. Devyr is an Irish literary gentleman well known in Brooklyn. He is a reformer, and claims that "Our Natural Rights" is the first consecutiv treatis on land reform ever published, having been first brought out in Belfast, Ireland, forty-six years ago. His contention is that absolute ownership of land must ever bring "criminal luxury on the one side, and gnawing famin on the other." Mr. Devyr's arguments to show this are drawn from Irish history.

In this pamphlet Mr. Devyr has bound his poem on the "Deserted Village," and a review of his "Odd Book of the Nineteenth Century," from the Irish World. Two pictures are also included, which might be called the "parting of the ways." One is to a factory in front of which a man stands holding a banner lettered "80 cents a day or fall back," with the poorhouse and prison close at hand. The other is a landscape dotted with houses and forty acre farms, in the road leading to which is another gentleman with a banner saying, "$3 a day or fall back." There are no poorhouses or prisons seen in this picture.

FOR GROPING THRALLS, A SHIELD. A Supplement to "Freedom's Factor, Hail." Published by the United Irishman, 12 Chambers street, this city.

A thin pamphlet of twenty-four 12mo pages, bristling with small capitals, exclamation points, and italics, the animus of which is developed in the following stanzas:

"Behold slaves thonged to rail and wheel—
To steam and wire bowed—
To swell their Millions, who can feel
No thought akin the crowd!—
Behold fruition checked—held down
By "tenures"—not by God,
True Lord in Fee; but of some clown
Last born upon the sod

"Dread dangers menace Truth's estate!
YET GOD HATH RAISED A SHIELD
FOR GROPING THRALLS—A FACTOR GREAT—
When hunger may hav reeled
Man's craving stomach for so long,
The angry wail shall burst:
IN DYNAMITE OUR HOPE!—THE SONG
LOUD CHORUS: CLASS BE CURSED!

"A Thrall may wear it in his vest!
As Thralls WILL shortly wear—
To cast athwort the powers encrest
By wrongs Truth will not bear!—
SAVE BASTARD CLIQUES HEED THE APPROACH OF THAT RED HOUR SHALL BLIGHT, ON TREMBLING SOIL, THEIR RASH ENCROACH!
THAT HOUR, SWEET DYNAMITE!

THE JURNAL OV AMERICAN ORTHOEPY. Fonic Speling, Eufonic Wurds, Fitness ov Wurds.

A practical illustration of reformed spelling by means of new typographical characters. It is published by C. W. Larison, Ringos, N. J. Its motto is, "The environz ov a Pepul mold thar Langwag." Those interested should send for a copy, as we hav not the type to illustrate this particular reform.

C. A. Watts's Agnostic for April is at hand. The contents are: "The Confession of Agnosticism, Faith and Manuers," Herbert Spencer's Philosophy, An Exposition," "The Evangel of Panontism," "George Eliot's Life," "Enigma," "The Popular Religious Faith," "Man, Whence and Whither?" "Sacred Times," "A.D. 2500, Antipodean Agnosticism," "Agnosticism Briefly Reviewed," "Agnosticism and Education." The price of the Agnostic is 15 cents.

The Present Day is the name of the monthly journal edited by George Jacob Holyoake, and published by the "Crown Publishing Co.," 267 Strand, W. C., London. Its object is to discuss the principles and methods of movements. The contents of the April number are, "Common Misconceptions of Luxury," "Patriotism by Charity," "Bye-Way Topics," "The Indian Candidate at Greenwich," "The Canadian Secular Union," "A Secular Anniversary in Leicester," "The Neutral Deity," "South Place Pulpit," "The Birthplace of Burns," and "Pretended Shaksperes." Of the Liberal movement in this country Mr. Holyoake says he thinks "it very fortunate that the Secular forces of America can be united under the presidency of Colonel Ingersoll, who is as genial as brilliant, and whose judgments are always tolerant." The price of the Present Day is twopence, English money.

G. W. Foote's Progress for April has articles as follows: The Ogre, Seen Thrice, A London Study, Christian Schools, Easy as A B C, Is Shelley a Great Poet, Church Property, The Sun, Man's Manufacture of Organic Substances, The Future of Marriage, and a continuation of G. W. Foote's Prisoner for Blasphemy. Progress is a straighout Freethought magazine. Published at 28 Stonecutter street, London. Price about 10 cents, American money.

Spirit Voices is a monthly magazine, $1.50 per year, published by the National "Developing Circle" at 121 West Concord street, Boston, Mass. George A. Fuller is editor, Mrs. G. Davenport Adams assistant editor, Dr. James A. Bliss, business manager. Spirit Voices holds that "enlightened mediumship is the salvation of humanity." The magazine is conducted with ability, printed neatly, and will interest those anxious to become mediums, or who can accept the statements of others in place of personal investigation of Spiritual phenomena.

"German Simplified," No, 6, is just out, leading the student deeper into the mystery of Sprachen sie deutsch. Price 10 cents.

The Liberal Age is the name of a new paper intended to be issued every Saturday at 315 North 10th st., Philadelphia, by Wright & Rhodes, in the interest of Spiritualism, Science, Philosophy, Temperance, and Health. The prospectus sets forth that "the Liberal Age is a first-class family newspaper, containing eight pages of interesting matter, embracing a lecture by Mr. J. Clegg Wright each week; pungent editorials; literary and temperance departments specially edited; original essays upon Spiritual, philosophical, and scientific subjects; Spirit Message department; and contributions by talented writers." Mr. Rhodes has heretofore been prominent in Spiritual circles as a clairvoyant and magnetic healer, and agent for Spiritual publications. Mr. J. Clegg Wright is an English gentleman who has decided to make this country his home. The price of the paper is $1.50 per year. New Yorkers wishing a copy can obtain one at this office.

Mrs. Charlotte Bendall, of Billings Bridge, Can., writes to Mrs. Slenker: "'John's Way' is splendid. I am trying to imitate him as nearly as I can with my children." Imitation is said to be the sincerest praise, and Mrs. Slenker should therefore feel proud of the influence of her little book. Of "The Darwins" the same lady writes: "'The Darwins' is grand. I like it very much, as it treats upon subjects that are so important to everyone."

For the convenience of editors who hav not time to prepare notices the North American Review sends the following, to which we can say Amen:

"It is a curious fact that one of the most famous poems in our language appeared originally in a magazine that seldom touches poetry at all, and the same periodical, after an interval of sixty-six years, now brings out another poem very similar in theme. Bryant's 'Thanatopsis' was first printed in the North American Review for September, 1817. The May number of the Review, just out, has a poem by Robert Buchanan on 'The New Buddha.' The critics found fault with Mr. Bryant's poem on the ground that it was un-Christian; it remains to be seen what they will say of Mr. Buchanan's. The question, 'Has Christianity Benefited Woman?' is ably discussed in this number by Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Bishop J. L. Spalding. President J. L. Pickard writes on 'Why Crime is Increasing,' and David Dudley Field on 'Industrial Co-operation,' while Prof. Andrew F. West, of Princeton, contributes an article of great clearness and strength on 'What is Academic Freedom?' James Payn, the English novelist, discusses 'Success in Fiction,' and T. F. Thiselton-Dyer, 'Superstition in English Life.' The new department of Comments keeps well up to the standard with which it started."

In a recent number of the Shelbyville, Ill., Labor Advocate, Arthur C. Everett editor, we find this notice of THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"With the first issue of this paper went out a proclamation that it was published in the interest of labor against monopolies both of church and state. And I wish to call the attention of the readers of this paper to the advertisment, in another column, of THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York city, a fearless advocate of Freethought and the National Liberal League, which, as such, not only shows that there is such a thing as church monopoly, but that superstition, in its varied forms, primordially is the protoplasm from which was evolved' the present unequal situation of the human family, and that to Freethought are we indebted for any advancement we hav made. Read it and begin to liv."

Among the books received by the Tennessee Sociologist is THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Of this publication Mr. Chavannes says:

"Like its predecessor, it is a handsome book of about 120 pages, well filled with sound reading by the leading Liberals of our time. To us the most attractiv feature is the portraits of thirty-seven of the most prominent American Freethinkers. Send for the book, and enjoy seeing the likeness of the men and women whose acquaintance, till now, you hav only made through their writings."

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

TALK not of this or that subject being too sacred for investigation! Is it too much to assert that there is but one object beneath the skies that is sacred, and that is Man? Surely there is no government, no institution, no order, rite, day, place, building, creed, or book, so sacred as he who was before every government, institution, order, rite, day, place, building, creed, and book, and by whom all these things are to be regarded as nothing higher or better than means to an end, and that end his own elevation and happiness; and he is to discard each and all of them, when they fail to do him service or to minister to his necessities.—W. L. Garrison.

WHAT a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinit in faculty! in form and moving, how express and admirable! in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god! the beauty of this world—the paragon of animals!—Shakspere.

DO ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life.—1 Corinthians vi, 2, 3.

IF a man is very good we do not look to see him go to a Christian church on Sunday, but he may take some sick neighbor out for a ride. We cannot estimate the religion of men by holding them up by their belief or their disbelief of the Christian dogmas. I prefer to hav men say of me when I am gone, "He helped to make the world a brighter and better place for men to liv in," than to hav it said, "He called the Bible the best book in the world and believed Jesus to be divine."—L. K. Washburn.

AND Samuel said, Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.—1 Samuel xv, 22.

THOUGH your ancestors hav left you in a condition above the ordinary rank, yet it's yourself alone that can advance yourself; for it's not either your going upon two legs, or living in a great house, or possessing many acres, that gives you advantage over beasts or over other men, but the being either wiser or better. I speak not this to make you careless of your estate; for, though riches be not virtue, it's a great instrument of it, wherein lies a great part of the usefulness and comfort of life. In the right management of this lies a great part of prudence; and about money is the great mistake of men, whilst they are either too covetous or too careless of it. If you throw it away idly, you lose your great support and best friend. If you hug it too closely, you lose it and yourself too.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

IT is only by the exercise of reason that man can discover God. Take away that reason and he would be incapable of understanding anything; and in this case it would be just as consistent to read even the book called the Bible to a horse as to a man. How, then, is it that these people pretend to reject reason?—Paine's Age of Reason. They who oppung [i. e., call in question and oppose] the force and certainty of reason as a chimera, must argue against reason, either with reason or without reason. In the latter way they do nothing; and in the former, they betray their own cause and establish that which they labor to dethrone. To prove that there is no such thing as right reason, by any good argument, is indeed impossible; because that must be to show there is such a thing, by the manner of proving that there is not—Wollaston's Religion of Nature.

BENEVOLENT intention and beneficial tendency must combine to constitute the moral goodness of an action.—Sharpe's Letters and Essays. If a brother or a sister be naked and destitute of daily food and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye giv them not those things that are needful to the body; what doth it profit!—James ii, 15, 16.

WE cannot serve God in the manner we serve those who cannot do without such service; and, therefore, the only idea we can hav of serving God, is that of contributing to the happiness of the living creation that God has made. This cannot be done by retiring ourselvs from the society of the world and spending a recluse life in selfish devotion.—Paine's Age of Reason.

THERE is such a recommendation by nature of one man to another, that one man ought never to appear unfriendly to another for the simple reason that he is a man.—Cicero.

AND, as a hare whom hounds and horse pursue
Pants to the place from whence at first he flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last.
—Goldsmith's Deserted Village.

WE still pray for a fine harvest; but we really consult the barometer, and believe more in the prophecies of meteorologists than in an answer to our prayers; Te Deums for victories excite more ridicule than sympathy; and we encounter the cholera by improved systems of drainage without attributing much value to fasting and processions.—Leslie Stephen.

WHEN man grows wiser than his creed allows,
And nobler than the church he has outgrown;
When that which was his old familiar house
No longer is a home, but all alone,
Alone with God, he dares to lift the stone
From off the skylight between heaven and him—
Then shines a grander day, then fade the specters dim.
—The Church, by O. P. Cranch.

A SUPERHUMAN creed may pretend to tell man his relation to the infinit, and to prepare him for eternal bliss; but what is wanted here is something to tell him his relations to the finite where he now is, and how he is to do his work honorably in this transitory but very ungentle and very difficult bodily life on earth.—Frederic Harrison.

IT is vain to say that questions of religion and politics are above the understanding of the poorer classes; politics and religion are not above their understanding, and they will think and talk about them.—Dr. Arnold.

Odds and Ends.

IF fish is good for the brain Jonah ought to hav developed ability.

THERE is nothing that so takes the starch out of a young man who has been wedded about a year as to hav to go to a store where there is a girl clerk with whom he used to keep company and inquire for a packet of those large safety pins.

"Do they hav house-cleaning days in heaven, ma?" a little Somerville girl inquired the other day. "Why, certainly not, dear; what put that into your head?" "Because the angels sweep, don't they?" "What gave you such a notion as that?" "Pa did. He said you were a spectacle in a Mother Hubbard that would make the angels sweep."

MRS. SLIMDIET: "You seem to know everything about horses. Won't you explain to me how you tell a horse's age?" Thin boarder: "Certainly; by the teeth." "Oh, yes; I had heard of that, but I had forgotten it. Can the ages of all animals be known in the same way?" "Yes: I can tell a chicken's age by the teeth." "A chicken has no teeth." "No, but I hav."

THEY were parting on the door-step. Her head was resting on his shoulder and he was looking down into her upturned eyes, etc., ad nauseam. A bulldog swung slowly around the corner and bit great chunks out of his legs. He never noticed the ravages of the animal until he was half-way home, so absorbed was he in the crowding chaos of his blissful dreams. This givs one a faint idea of how deep-seated and abiding his passion for the girl must necessarily hav been.

BROWN (to minister): "Mr. R., Smith and I were talking about the possibility of cholera this summer, and I bet him $300 that we wouldn't hav it. Do you think I am likely to win the"—— Minister (horrified): "My dear sir, I am shocked at the idea of you and Mr. Smith making a bet. It is sinful, and bad in every"—— Brown: "The one who wins is to put a stained glass memorial window in the church, and"—— Minister: "You bet that the cholera won't come?" Brown: "Yes, sir." Minister: "Well, I think you will win, Brother Brown."

A YEAR or two ago a certain neighborhood in Dakota got crazy over futures in wheat, and even the clergyman was carried away for the time being and took a hand in. The craze came to a climax, however, before any great amount of money had changed hands. The clergyman returned from a three days' trip to Fargo to find one-half his congregation holding a prayer-meeting for rain and the other half praying equally as hard for the drouth to continue. "Brothers and sisters," said the good man in his next sermon, "all who love the Lord will let go of wheat with me and turn to silver stock. It is giving the devil too much of a show here when we are divided upon prayers and the weather too."

THE POETS'S LOT.

When the editor's a prey to indigestion, indigestion,
And his liver isn't working worth a cent, worth a cent,
When he givs a gruff reply to every question, every question,
And in grumbling o'er his woes his time is spent, time is spent—

Then the poet makes some verses, and he writes 'em, and he writes 'em,
And he brings them to the office when they're done, when they're done,
And the editor he takes a club and smites 'im, club and smites 'im—
Oh, the poet's lot is not a happy one, happy one,
Oh, the poet's life is not a happy one!

SHE came into the sanctum of the Minnesota Bazoo selling letter files and patent bill holders. She was pretty and sweet, and somewhat talkativ. "My life is hard," she said, "but I hav a jolly lot of fun. When I was at St. Paul I stopped at the Science Hotel. My husband is a traveling man and was in town at the same time. I happened to meet a Bible agent, who was determined I should go to work for him—got mashed a little, I think. Anyway, he followed me about until I got rather tired of it. He wanted to call and see me at the hotel, and I let him come. Now, my husband stands six feet two and is built like John L. Sullivan, and when that little Bible peddler got into our room the sweet, sunny smile died out of his face, and when my husband took him on his knee and told him sweet little stories about good little children that had gone to heaven and had their pictures preserved in Sunday-school books, I thought he would die. My husband told him he was real glad he found such a nice little fellow, and was so glad he liked me, and that when we got rich we would adopt him—but I must go. No, I don't flirt; but it is impossible to keep some conceited puppies from making fools of themselvs," and gathering up her samples she went away.

HE slept, and dreamed that the kangaroo
Had given a fancy ball;
The elephant came with the festiv gnu,
The mouse with the ostrich tall.
A funny giraffe, that did nothing but laugh,
Dropped in with a centipede;
And a cricket and flea, that had just been to tea,
Waltzed round with remarkable speed.

A wasp and a bumblebee had a chat
Just over his little nose;
And a boa constrictor, upon the mat,
Dressed up in his Sunday clothes.
A crow and raccoon, in a fire balloon,
Paused over his bed to sing;
And a neat armadillo crept up on his pillow
To dance the Highland Fling.

Then all, ere they left, made a graceful bow,
And out in the moonlight sped;
Except a ponderous brindle cow,
Which stopped to stand on its head.
The little boy woke, and grinned at the joke,
Sprang out of bed with a lilt—
"I will dream it over," said he, "if they cover
Me up with a crazy-quilt."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 19. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, May 9, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

"WHAT must we do to be saved?" asked the Sunday-school teacher of her new pupil. "Git lost," was the very suggestiv but incorrect reply.

IT is believed there is great rejoicing in heaven. Ike Buzzard, one of the celebrated family, who is in prison at Lancaster, Pa., professed conversion at a prison service Sunday afternoon and made a speech from his cell.

A ZEALOUS Christian woman in Lowell has left her husband's bed and board because he will not be converted. She has reached the "perfect state," and is so outraged that her husband, otherwise an exemplary man, will not come to her way of thinking that she will no longer liv with him.

WILLIAM WASHBURN, in John Swinton's Paper, says that "the Young Men's Christian Association is one of the most attractiv features of New England village life. By simply paying a dollar a year you are entitled to the privilege for a whole year of making as many contributions to the society as you wish."

A TEXAS paper remarks: "The names of Jesus and Christ sound very sacred to English-speaking people, but among the Spanish both are very common names—given and surnames. At Laredo the other day Jesus H. Christ was registered at one of the hotels. We remember noting a few years ago that a Mexican named Jesus Christ had been hung for horse-stealing."

IT is reported that Miss Effie Irons, of Salem church, near Jarvis, O, who had been bedridden for three years, began praying recently, and kept up her supplications for relief for fourteen hours, when she suddenly arose from her bed, cured, and attended a revival meeting the same night. If it takes fourteen hours to make the Lord hear, no wonder so many prayers fail.

A COLORED preacher in the outskirts of Columbia, S. C., notified his congregation on a recent Sunday that he would not preach until he had $5.00 The hat was passed round, and when returns were made $3.50 was in the pot, whereupon the preacher said he must hav $1.50 more before he would preach. The hat was passed around the second time, and the $5 00 made up, when the congregation was treated to one of the pastor's happiest efforts.

A NOTORIOUS scamp, much affected in a revival, went to Henry Ward Beecher's father and said to him, in the religious parlance of the time: "I realize that I am the chief of sinners." "Glad to hear it," replied the dominie; "your neighbors hav long realized it." "I feel," persisted the whining penitent, "that I am willing to be damned for the glory of God." "Well," responded the hard-hearted preacher, "I don't know anybody around here that would hav the slightest objection."

THE Salvation Army finds a powerful and avowed rival at Portland, Me., in the shape of the "Gideon's Band," which the Rev. Mr. Pearson has organized as an attraction of his mission. The instruments of the band are plainly of scriptural origin and throw the bass drum and tambourine quite into the shade. The twelve men are armed with toy squawking trumpets, an equal number of women shake in the air pitchers containing loose beans, while the Rev. Pearson leads the chorus with a policeman's rattle. The din occasioned by the opposition orchestra when in full blast near by one another is said to be distracting.

THE Christian Advocate says: "The Catholic Review charges the Methodists who oppose the Freedom of Worship bill with 'boundless cheek.' This may truly be called an 'elegant extract.' For Roman Catholics, who in every city hav stood with open hands to receive money from the public treasury, who hav massed their votes and delivered them to those who would favor their plans, and who hav tried to break up the public school system, to accuse those who endeavor to frustrate their Jesuitical schemes, of 'boundless cheek,' proves that they know by experience what the qualities are which the refined figure they hav employed suggests. They are doing all they can to bring on a bitter sectarian war in this country. They hav been let alone in their grasping and undermining policy until they hav come to think they can do anything. Perhaps they hav thrown off the mask too soon."

A GEORGIA paper relates the following as having happened at a church in Alabama: In the Sabbath-school the teacher asked who was the first man. A little boy answered, "Adam." "Who was the first woman?" "Mrs. Adam." After Sunday-school was over they began to prepare for sacrament. Their bread and wine was laid upon the table, and there was a man present by the name of Bill Brown—they call him "Brother" for short. The preacher gave out a song, and said: "Sing, Brother Brown, common meter." Brother Brown, who was hard of hearing, thought the minister said "Brother Brown, come and eat," and rose up and said, "I ain't very hungry;" and had it not been for the interference of the deacon, would hav stopped the sacrament.

THE Christian Intelligencer says: "The Romanists in this vicinity receive from the state and city treasuries for charitable and reformativ institutions in round numbers $940,000 yearly, and other similar institutions under the care of Christian and Jewish societies, such as may be called sectarian charities, receive about $350,000, and non-sectarian institutions $220,000. These are about the proportions in which state and civic aid is given. But such a statement is only a part of the story. The fact is that Romanists giv very moderately to the institutions they control—do not giv, we believe, half as much as they draw from the public treasuries. Yet the papal church here is endeavoring to force through the legislature a bill that will compel everyone of these institutions to supply facilities for the performance of the popish mass—in other words, to make each one a papistical institution."

"RUSSELL (Hampden Co.) is considerably worked up over the result of an order issued by the selectmen acting as a board of health. George Washington Williams is a dudish old man living at the poorhouse, who has taken great pride in his flowing locks. For sanitary reasons the selectmen ordered Constable Chapman to shear him. When the job was done Williams had the constable arrested for assault, and Justice Fuller of Westfield has fined him $2 and costs."——"Several arrests hav been made in Waltham for unlawful work on the Lord's Day. Two men were arrested for painting the inside of a provision store, one for engaging in athletic sports, and two for moving scenery from the station to the Music Hall." The above items are cut from the Spy of last week, a local paper published in Worcester, Mass. The best comment to be made is the statement of the following fact: The past winter a man in this city advertised for the purchase of a farm in Massachusetts, and in less than two months he received two hundred and sixty-three invitations to come and buy.

THE lower house of the Prussian Landtag rejected, April 23d, by a vote of 182 to 128, the proposal of Dr. Windthorst, the Ultramontane leader, to repeal the law stopping the temporalities of the Catholic clergy. The proposal was opposed by Herr von Gossler, minister of ecclesiastical affairs. The latter said that since 1884 nothing had occurred at Posen to induce the Prussian government to abandon the negativ attitude which it had hitherto observed toward the clergy. The only way to effect the repeal of the law was by the Vatican making a fresh appointment to the vacant archbishopric of Posen. This, he said, was almost a fait accompli, but Polish and other influences prevented its fulfilment. It was necessary for the archbishop of Posen to feel himself a Prussian prelate, and a Prussian subject, to confine himself to church matters, and avoid the rocks upon which his predecessor had been wrecked. As long as the title of primate of Poland, applied to the archbishop of Posen by the Vatican, had real meaning, it would be the duty of the Prussian government to see that the claim implied should not be conceded. A motion to exempt from punishment priests who say mass and administer the sacraments without authority was rejected by a vote of 169 to 127.

RICHARD A. PROCTOR, the astronomer, says of those who practice tight-lacing: "No one can reasonably hope that those women who are foolish enough to compress their waists by tight-lacing (I am not here speaking merely of corset wearing) will ever be persuaded to change their ways, or their waists, if they can help it. A woman of this sort will not giv up tight-lacing until she has given up all idea of attracting the attention of men, and few women of this sort giv up their idea until long after they hav passed the time when it can make the least difference whether their waists look large or small. So far as I can judge, the only real advantage which this world is likely to derive from tight-lacing resides in the circumstance that tight-lacing is killing; even when it fails to kill the woman, it tends to kill her offspring. And as the woman who laces tightly is of neeessity foolish, and her offspring is likely to inherit her folly, there is a cause here steadily at work to remove the more foolish sort, and so to relativly increase the wisdom of the world. There is always a germ of comfort even in things evil—they tend by their very evilness to cause their own elimination."

"WHILE I speak of the loveliness of peace I do not propose to protest against war," said Professor Adler last Sunday. "Visions of battlefields red with the harvest of the slain, of burning cities and ruined commerce, are all too horrible to be even thought of on this bright May morning, with its soft blue skies and gentle breath of flowering nature. But the very fact that war is still possible between nations that hold to the Christian religion is a crushing argument against Christianity as a final religion. Whatever it has done to purify private life, Christianity has not purified public life nor provided a power with which to grapple the ethics of nations. It teaches people to look upon the state and its affairs with disdain. The church has never duly recognized that the state has moral functions to perform independent of religion, and these functions in one sense may be far more high and sacred than those of the church. Christianity has not proposed any saving principle to rescue the state from moral chaos and exalt it into moral order. It has allowed intrigue and falsehood and hypocrisy and injustice to go on in the national life. The end is war. We shall hav to wait for a new ethical view of the world to supplant Christianity before war will be abolished, and it may take centuries to become rooted."

THE Mormon authorities hav forwarded to the president a declaration of grievances and protest against the arrest and conviction of Mormons on the charge of unlawful cohabitation. The declaration is addressed to the president and the people of the United States, and is throughout a defense of polygamy. The document, which is a long one, concludes as follows: "We protest against unfair treatment on the part of the general government. We protest against a continuance of territorial bondage, subversiv of the rights of freemen, and contrary to the spirit of American institutions. We protest against special legislation, the result of popular prejudice and religious interference. We protest against the conscience of one class of citizens being made the criterion by which to judge another. We protest against the tyranny of federal officials and the continuance in office of men who disgrace their positions and use their official powers as a means of oppression. We protest against the partial administration of the Edmunds law—the punishment of one class for practicing their religion, and exempting from prosecution the votaries of lust and crime. We protest against the breaking up of family relations formed previous to the passage of the Edmunds law, and the depriving of women and children of the support and protection of their husbands and fathers. We protest against the prosecution of persons, many of whom are infirm and aged, who entered into plural marriage before it was declared a crime, and hav never violated any law. We respectfully ask for the appointment by the president of a commission to fairly and thoroughly investigate the Utah situation, and, pending its report, we solemnly protest against the continuance of this merciless crusade.'

News of the Week.

FOUR thousand immigrants landed at this port last Saturday.

FOUR German citizens of New York committed suicide on May day.

TWENTY-EIGHT poor families lost their homes by a fire in Hoboken, N. J., on the 3d.

THE people of Maine were treated to fifteen inches of snow and a northeast gale May 2d.

A NEW YORK police sergeant is in jail charged with criminal assault on a fifteen-year-old girl.

THE typhus-fever epidemic at Plymouth, Pa., seems to be increasing in virulence, and is spreading to adjoining towns.

SLOSSON won the billiard tourney held in New York last week. Many thousands of dollars changed hands on the result.

THERE is talk of offering James Russell Lowell, ex-minister to England, the Merton professorship of Oxford College. The salary is $4,500 per year.

J. HARVEY MOTT, the Spiritual medium, arrested at Kansas City, Mo., on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, was tried and acquitted on the 2d inst.

THE Chinese generals in Tonquin refuse to retire from the positions they hav gained, and new complications in the relations between China and France are feared.

EIGHT lives were lost by a tenement-house fire in First Avenue, this city, last Saturday night. Suspicion points to one of the dead tenants as the probable incendiary.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND neglected the means of grace and did not attend divine service last Sunday. Many visitors were accordingly disappointed at not seeing him in his pew.

NOTICE was sent to all the Protestant ministers of this state asking them to preach against the Freedom of Worship bill on May 3d. The request emanated from the Evangelical Alliance.

THE outlook for peace between England and Russia is considered more favorable. It seems that England is willing to grant valuable concessions, and Russia is not slow to ask them. There may be no war.

DISGRACEFUL demonstrations, brought about through incendiary speeches by Anarchists, are reported to hav occurred at Chicago on the 29th ult. A carriage was mobbed and a lady occupant severely injured.

A BREWERY in Pittsburgh, Pa., containing 10,000 barrels of beer caved in last Sunday, spilling all the contents. It is reported that many persons improved the opportunity to get drunk on the fluid, with which the streets were flooded.

GENERAL GRANT keeps on improving, and is at work on his book. He is writing now about Appomattox. The physicians continue to meet occasionally in counsel, but hav given up issuing bulletins informing the outside world how long their patient may be expected to liv.

COMSTOCK's society for the Suppression of Vice is at work in Toronto. Their aim is to suppress Sunday papers. Three boys were fined $5 each for selling papers on the alleged Lord's alleged day. The police commissioners of the city appear ready to become the tools of the fanatics.

A DISPATCH received at Montreal, Can., says that General Middleton, who went into the Northwest to suppress the Riel rebellion, was, at last accounts, unable to find the enemy and was fearful of an unexpected attack in the rear. A newspaper advocating the cause of the half-breeds has been started at Montreal.

THE Russian war vessel, Strelok, and the English corvet, Garnet, are both lying at anchor in New York harbor. If war is declared between the two countries, these vessels will probably leave the harbor and fight at sea. They must go out nine miles before firing a shot, so that New Yorkers will get no more of the fight than the noise.

ITS PARALLELS IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

I.

No doubt this heading will be a source of surprise to some, but I propose to demonstrate that all the essentials of the Roman Catholic—the Mother Christian—church were known to the ancient Mexicans, and her various rites and ceremonies were in practice among them for nearly, if not more than, three thousand years before the Christian era. I will divide my proposition into three parts—the first, to prove the above; the second, to giv a short account of Mexican civilization, their arts and sciences, which had attained to a flourishing state prior to the conquest, and compare the moral status of the two nations, conquered and conquerors; and the third, to prove conclusivly, from Spanish sources, that the welfare of the church, and its hold on the credulity of its followers, necessitated the extinction of the Mexicans, and the destruction of their monuments, symbols, and traditions.

After Cortez had conquered Mexico, and despoiled that gentle and refined people of their material wealth, the pope undertook to care for their spiritual welfare. Cortez had written a secret letter to Charles V. (which has very mysteriously disappeared from the archives), and in answer to it Pope Alexander VI. annexed Mexico to Spain. In his "bull" he commanded that none but Spaniards should be allowed to visit the conquered country, and even they had first to register at Seville. All "lawyers, surgeons, students, or people of an inquiring mind," were especially prohibited; also all heretics or persons suspected by the Inquisition, and their descendants to the third generation. Even secular priests were excluded, and only Dominicans and Franciscans were allowed to go. This law remained in force for over thirty years.

The Dominicans, founded by St. Dominic, who caused the slaughter of the Albigenses in the south of France because they refused to receive the Catholic version of "the glad tidings of great joy," and who is credited with having founded the Inquisition there, were notorious for their intolerance and cruelty. The Inquisition was under their control.

The Franciscans, a body of mendicant friars, owed their origin to St. Francis, a man who had been of "dissolute habits," and who had been "confined for insanity." They followed the example of "James the Just, Brother of the Lord," as described by Eusebius: "A razor never came upon his head; he never anointed with oil; and never used a bath." So they vowed poverty, humility, and chastity, and, from obvious reasons, it is a fair presumption that they kept the last vow, enforced or otherwise.

Father Joseph De Acosta, a learned Jesuit, who visited Mexico in 1586, has left us a valuable work, "Natural and Moral History of the Indies," which will be quoted, together with the "Conquest of Mexico," by Prescott, the histories by Diaz, Martyr, Garcia, Torquemada, Sahagun, and other Spanish writers, and the "Antiquities of Mexico," by Lord Kingsborough, who, if I understand matters correctly, was elevated to the peerage as a recompense for his work. It is very extensiv, and explains the facsimiles of the Mexican paintings and hieroglyphics in the various royal libraries of Europe.

I hav been obliged to confine my researches almost entirely to Christian writers, but, by gathering an admission here and a concession there, I hope to prove my proposition.

In reviewing the "bull" above referred to, which he givs in full, Kingsborough says: "It would appear that, whether or no she (the church) wished to conceal from Europe a fact which she feared might shake its institutions, shock and confound the prejudices of ages, and unmodel its laws, she took all the precautions which she could hav done if she really had entertained such a fear."

When the missionaries went among the Mexicans they found them a highly cultured and intelligent race, who in their religious rites and beliefs so closely resembled their own that the difference was hardly perceptible. They claimed to hav originated in a far distant Eastern land, and had emigrated by express command of their God, who promised them a new and beautiful country; and they divided their time, since their emigration, into four periods, and they exhibited their proofs, copies of which are now preserved in the "Codex Vaticanus."

Humboldt claims that the first period covered 5,206 years; the second, 4,804; the third, 4,010; and the fourth, up to the time of the conquest, 4,008; in all 18,028 years, "being 6,000 years more than the Persian Ages, described in the Zend Avesta." All historians admit this sum total, and many who had facilities for examining the subject say that their fourth period covered more than 5,000 years.

They worshiped a trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; the Father had created man after his own image and likeness; the Son was co-equal with him; and the Holy Ghost sprang from the love existing between them, and called them three in one and one in three. The Holy Ghost was represented under the form of an eagle.

Their devil had been turned out of heaven for conspiracy. They had their Eve, who committed the first sin by eating the fruit of a tree; and several paintings represent the devil in the guise of a male serpent tempting her; she is also pictured as the woman "whose seed was to bruise the serpent's head," and was known as "she by whom sin came into the world." Veytia says he saw one painting, "representing a garden with a single tree in it, round which was coiled a serpent with a human face." In speaking of Torquemada not entering fully into this subject, Kingsborough says that he did not do it, "lest he should too clearly prove that the Mexicans were acquainted with the history of Adam and Eve." But Torquemada admits that their Eve "had two sons," whom he compares with Cain and Abel; and on page 48 of the Vatican Paintings I find their Eve with two children; they hav been fighting and one of them has been killed. Humboldt, in speaking of this, remarks: "We might be led to suppose that the two vases which we see at the bottom of the picture, one of which is overturned, is the cause of this contention."

Their fourth period shows the world destroyed by water, and although Humboldt is not inclined to grant them the antiquity they claim, he admits that "it is, nevertheless, remarkable that we find an American people who, according to the same calendar in use among them on the arrival of Cortez, indicate the days and the years in which the world underwent great catastrophes, further back than twenty ages."

Their Noah, with six others, was saved in an ark. His decendants built the tower of Tulan Cholula in order to see what was going on in heaven, and its ruins were pointed out to the Spaniards. Kingsborough says: "The base of this tower is, at the present day, still remaining, and its circumference is 1,800 feet." Humboldt holds that their account of the deluge and the subsequent events, even to the sending out of the raven and dove (only they substituted a humming bird for the dove), which returned with a leafy branch, is identical with the Old Testament, and "they showed Mount Colhuacan as the place where the ark rested." Prescott says that "the boat in which he (their Noah) escaped was filled with various kinds of animals and birds."

They also had the legend of the "confusion of tongues," saying "that the gods, angry at the audacity of man, set fire to the tower, and then each family received a language of its own." The Spaniards found over thirty different and distinct languages between Florida and Panama, and one hundred and twenty dialects on the continent. In eighty-three of them, examined by Barton and Vater, only one hundred and seventy words were found the roots of which appear to be the same.

The 11th, 12th, and 19th pages of the Borgian manuscript describes the plagues. "A man is represented holding up in his left hand a rod, which became a serpent. The plagues, consisting of frogs, locusts, lice, flies, etc., were also represented, and the thick darkness which overspread the land for three days, and the slaughter of the first-born, and the curious symbol of one serpent swallowing another."

Their God the Father, Tezcatlipoca, once appeared on a mountain. "No one ever saw his face;" and "a figure with eyes bandaged, or a veil over his face (like Moses), frequently occurs in these paintings." They practiced circumcision, and had a legend that one of their holy men once caused the sun to stand still.

In regard to their God, Herrera says: "The Mexicans confessed a supreme God and Lord and framer of the universe, . . . and he was the principal object whom they adored, looking up to heaven and calling him the creator of heaven and earth," and Martyr admits that "they believed in the immortality of the soul and a future state of rewards and punishments."

In regard to the second person of their trinity, they informed the missionaries that, while the virgin Chimalman was seated in her house, with her two sisters, an angel appeared and announced that she was to conceive a son. The two sisters died of fright, but the virgin conceived a son and he was called Quetzalcoatl. Plate 10 in the Codex Vaticanus represents the annunciation. The devotion to the virgin was universal. They designated her "Queen of Heaven," and she was their chief intercessor before the throne of their God.

The vicar of St. Dominic, a Dominican monastery, relates that, in proof of this annunciation, he was shown sheets of paper containing drawings, copied from some extremely ancient paintings, and adds: "She who was represented as our lady had her hair tied up in the manner in which Mexican women tie and fasten their hair, and in a knot behind was inserted a small cross, by which it was intended to show that she was the most holy, and that a great prophet would be born of her, who would come from heaven, and whom she would bring forth without connection with man, still remaining a virgin; and that his own people would persecute that great prophet and meditate evil against him and would put him to death, crucifying him upon a cross; and, accordingly, he was represented in the painting as crucified with his hands and feet tied to the cross and without nails. The article of the resurrection, how he had to return again to life and ascend to heaven, were likewise painted."

When Bishop Las Casas took possession of his bishopric in Yucatan in 1545, he delegated Father Francis Hermandez, who was well acquainted with the language of the country, to visit and preach to the nativs. A year afterward, the father wrote him of a conversation he had held with one of the nobles, in which he received proof that the nativs believed in one God, who was in heaven, three in one, one in three; God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; that the Father had created man; that the Son was born of a virgin, was scourged and crowned with thorns, and placed, with his arms extended, upon a beam of wood, to which he was tied, and where he died for the sins of mankind; that he remained dead three days, and on the third day came to life and ascended into heaven, where he is with his Father; that immediately afterward the Holy Ghost came and filled the earth with whatsoever it stood in need of; and adds: "I remember that, being in Chuquisaca, an honorable priest showed me an information which I had long in my hands, where it was proved that there was a certain Oratory whereat the Mexicans did worship an idol which they said was one in three and three in one; and as this priest stood amazed thereat, I said that the devil, by his infernal and obstinate pride (whereby he always pretends to make himself God), did steal all that he could from the truth to employ it in his lyings and deceits."

Prescott says: "The Spaniards met with the cross in various places, and the image of a cross may be seen at this day, sculptured in bas-relief, on the walls of one of the buildings of Palenque, while a figure, bearing some resemblance to that of a child, is held up to it as if in adoration."

Concerning the birthday of Quetzalcoatl we learn from Acosta that, "in their first month, answering to our December, they celebrated a solemn feast called Capacrayme, wherein they made many sacrifices and ceremonies, which continued many days. Humboldt thinks he was born during the third cycle, as he saw a painting representing him appeasing the wrath of the gods, when, 13,060 years after the creation of the world, a great famin prevailed in the province of Culau."

Of his life few records hav been left to us, though all the historians agree that there had been a complete history. There are many incidents of his manhood that would appear familiar to a reader of the New Testament, but space forbids my mentioning all. The Mexicans believed that their supreme deity, who punished them for their sins, was the one who tempted them, and he it was who tempted Quetzalcoatl. Kingsborough remarks: "The temptation of Quetzalcoatl, the fast of forty days, the cup with which he was presented to drink, with many others relating to him, which are here omitted, are very curious and mysterious."

Torquemada, in his history, speaks as follows of one of his journeys: "Coming to a place called Quauhtitlau, where was a large, thick, and lofty tree, he leaned against its trunk and desired one of his pages to giv him a mirror, which looking into, and perceiving himself older than he was before, he exclaimed, 'I hav become old,' and gathering up stones from the ground flung them at the tree. From this place he passed on and was accompanied the whole of the way by a great multitude of people playing flutes and other instruments. He arrived at another place, which was a hill adjoining the city, where he sat down on a stone, and laid his hands upon it, and left their impression there, the marks of which are at the present day quite visible." On this journey he is also credited with having cured the blind and lame. Now, Sahagun says that the tree referred to was called Pochult, which means barren, and the orthodox Kingsborough, commenting on it, remarks: "How many incidents analagous to those which are related in the gospels of Christ occur in this short passage. The withered fig-tree; the crowd which followed him strewing branches in his way, singing hosannas; his custom of sitting on the ground and discoursing with the people and the disciples by whom he was attended. . . If more of his history and of the actions of his life had been preserved, we cannot tell where these analogies would hav ceased."

In one painting he is represented as crucified between two persons who are in the act of reviling him, and who hold, as it would appear, halters in their hands, "the symbols, perhaps, of some crime for which they themselvs were going to suffer." On page 73 of the same MS. (the Borgian) he is crucified on a cross of the Greek form, as also his burial and descent into hell. On the 4th, 72d, 73d, and 75th pages of the same MS. he is represented as nailed to the cross as an atonement for the sins of mankind. And the 61st page of the same, and the 9th in the library at Bologna, show him with his side pierced by a spear, and water flowing from the wound. Various paintings show their claims that the sun was darkened at his crucifixion.

He was also called Christ, and Kingsborough is surprised into saying: "With respect to the appellation Mesi, or Mesitli, the name by which he was known among the Mexicans, it is remarkable that it is precisely the same as anointed, which is applied by Christians to Christ." He was also called our dearly beloved son, and it has been clearly demonstrated that for obvious reasons the missionaries changed another of his names from Teopiltzin—the son of God—to Topiltzin—our son. As it is claimed that Jesus is shadowed in the Bible under many types, Kingsborough thinks "it very strange" that Quetzalcoatl should also be named "The Morning Star," "Light," "The Vine," "The Heart," "Our Bread," and others.

The Mexicans believed in a second advent. All the historians agree on this point, and Kingsborough comments: "But his (Quetzalcoatl's) second coming, after the lapse of a long period of time, is an enigmatical piece of history, which it is not probable will speedily be explained." As it is generally admitted that this God had been born during the latter part of their third cycle, he had been dead considerably over four thousand and possibly over five thousand years.

After the advent they taught the total destruction of the world, and the resurrection of the physical body. One historian informs us that "when the Spaniards opened the graves (looking for treasure) and scattered the bones, the Mexicans entreated them not to do so, assuring them that the bones would be united in the resurrection." Page 76 of the Borgian MS. represents the scene of the last day, and the dead awakened by the sound of a trumpet.

In reference to the teachings and example of this god, Torquemada is forced to say: "In truth, the dominion of Quetzalcoatl was sweet, and he exacted no service from them but easy and light things, instructing them in such as were virtuous, and prohibiting such as were wicked, evil, or injurious, teaching them likewise to abhor them." Dr. Brinton in his admirable work pays him this tribute: "He was represented of majestic stature and dignified demeanor. In his train came skilled artificers and men of learning. He was chaste and temperate in his life, wise in council; generous of gifts; conquering rather by arts of peace than by war; delighting in music, flowers, and brilliant colors, and so averse to human sacrifices that he shut his ears with both hands when they were even mentioned. Such was the ideal man or supreme god of a people, who even a Spanish monk (Sahagun) of the sixteenth century felt constrained to confess were 'a good people, attached to virtue; urbane and simple in social intercourse; shunning lies; skilful in arts, pious toward their God.' Is it likely, is it possible, that with such a model before their minds, they received no benefit from it? Was not this a lever, and a mighty one, lifting the race toward civilization and a purer faith?"

As the fundamentals of this creed are an exact counterpart of the Roman Catholic, it is by no means strange to find that the two approximate in their various ceremonials.

Father Acosta admits that "the Mexicans had an infinit number of ceremonies and customs which resembled to the ancient law of Moses, and some approached near to the law of the gospel; as the baths, or opacuna, as they call them; they did wash themselvs in water to cleanse themfrom their sins." It was called the "water of regeneration," and Martyr says: "The priests seem to baptize children with holy ceremonies, pouring water cross-wise out of a cruet upon their heads, saying, 'May this bath wash away and remove the stain of defilement which thou derivest from thy parents.'" It was also called "to be born again," and during the ceremony the child was named, several sponsors vouching for its future good conduct.

They also had auricular confession. Acosta remarks: "The father of lies would likewise counterfeit the sacrament of confession, and in his idolatries seek to be honored by ceremonies very like to the manner of Christians." The priest becomes exceedingly wroth as he finds how "very like" this is to the sacrament of the "holy church;" calls their confessors sorcerers and penitents dupes; scouts the idea that "the confession was held a secret;" wonders how his satanic majesty managed to impress on these poor, deluded people that the most grievous sins were "to be forgetful in reverence to their priests, and not to obey them, and not to observe the fasts and feasts of the church," and concludes by saying, as if astonished at the information: "They (the penitents) received penance; yea, sometimes very sharply, especially when the offender was a poor man, and had nothing to giv his confessor."

This confession carried with it an absolution, which was in reality an indulgence, and was received in place of the legal punishment for offenses, and authorized an acquittal in case of arrest. But it was granted only once during a lifetime, which seems to be an improvement on the "holy mother," who is always lavish in her favors for a small consideration. Prescott informs us that "long after the conquest the simple nativs, when they came under the arm of the law, sought to escape by producing a certificate of their confession."

In treating of the Lord's Supper—which is a misnomer, as it is partaken in the morning—we learn that "the virgins came out of their convent, bringing pieces of paste, ... then placing themselvs in order about these morsels, they performed certain ceremonies with singing and dancing, by means whereof the pieces were blessed and consecrated for the flesh and bones of this idol." The people then gathered together, morsels of this paste were given them, and they declared "that they did eat the flesh and bones of God." On the feast day every one fasted till noon, as this sacrament had to be taken on an empty stomach.

In the Codex Vaticanus there is a plate showing this ceremony, and it is so life-like and exact that the commentator, after vainly endeavoring to explain away the similarity, adds: "I am disposed to believe that these poor people hav had the knowledge of our mode of communion or the annunciation of the gospel; or perhaps the devil, most envious of the honor of God, may hav led them into this superstition, in order that by this ceremony he might be adored and served as Christ our Lord." The 4th and 74th pages of the Borgian MS. also represent the ceremony of "eating the body and drinking the blood of their God."

"The rites of marriage," says Prescott, "were celebrated with as much formality as in any Christian church, and the institution was held in such reverence that a tribunal was instituted for the sole purpose of determining questions relating to it. Divorces could not be obtained until authorized by a sentence of this court, after a patient hearing of the parties." As in their political economy marriages were considered to be for the convenience of the interested parties and the ultimate benefit of the state, no fee was charged for the ceremony, and Acosta ruminates: "Although it seems that many of their ceremonies agree with ours, yet differ they much."

They had many feasts. One, celebrated in May, was called the "Jubilee," at which they were granted "full indulgence and remission of sins." On August 23d was the "festival of all the dead," for the purpose of securing their souls a "safe passage through purgatory." September 12th was the "purification of their Virgin Mother;" September 13th the festival of "the woman who sinned by eating the fruit of the tree," and November 11th was dedicated to the gods "who fell from heaven;" and every day had its particular saint.

They fasted before their feasts, and "these fasts were the same unto them as our four ember weeks." They fasted forty days in memory of Quetzalcoatl, who was tempted forty days on a mountain, and Bishop Las Casas says that they fasted one day in the week, "like unto our Friday, in commemoration of the crucifixion.

Their purgatory was for the souls of children who died before attaining the age of reason, and for adults who had been guilty of minor offenses. Of this Kingsborough says: "In the same way as our holy doctors teach the existence of Limbo for children who died without baptism." Women dying in child-bed were exempted from purgatory and went straight to heaven. Their hell was a place of darkness, and situated in the center of the earth; and "the absence of all physical torture," says Prescott, "forms a striking contrast to the schemes of suffering so ingeniously devised by the fancies of the most enlightened nations."

They had their penates or household gods, whose little images were to be found in the humblest dwelling, and at their funerals, Acosta says, "The priests did sing the funeral offices like to our answers. At these mortuaries they ate and drank." This seems like a "wake."

The same writer says, "The devil has even in Mexico some kind of religious women." They were virgins; were closely immured; dressed in a peculiar habit; cut their hair close; rose at midnight to perform the same offices as the priests; the elder ones were called mothers; and they had their abbesses, who employed them in making cloth for the adornment of the idols and temples.

Before describing the priests, he says, "What made me wonder was that the devil would usurp to himself the service of God, yea, and use the same name; for they hav their Acolytes and Levites, and call their high priest pope." He then describes a monastery having cells for the monks; that their daily duty was to swing a censer full of incense before the idol; and that the acolytes (altar-boys) assisted in these ceremonies by handing them the incense, garments, lights, etc., with many bowings and genuflexions. Humboldt describes one painting that he examined, which portrayed these genuflexions.

The monks rose at midnight, went into the chapel, and there did penance. They were divided into two classes: seculars and regulars. To every large city there was delegated a priest of superior rank (bishop) who acted as the head and was obeyed by all others within a certain jurisdiction; but he was answerable only to the pope. All the clergy dressed in black cotton mantles.

On taking holy orders they were anointed, but the oil used is described as being unsavory and unlike "that sweet composition, which God defend should be employed in any other thing than in his divine service." The rosaries or beads are fully depicted in several plates, but more especially in one now in the Codex Vaticanus. Gomara says that they had a cross like that of St. Andrew and used it like us Catholics, to defend themselvs against nightly specters, and also placed it over new-born children." Martyr indorses this statement, and also that crosses of copper or wood were placed over their graves. Prayers were uttered at these ceremonies, in a language unknown even to the priests, thus proving the antiquity of these rites.

In the Mendoza collection is a curious symbol called Yxcoymec, a beast with an eye in the middle of his body, and on the 10th page of the Vatican MS. is another with five eyes on its back. A peculiar figure is also depicted, throwing off rays of light, and a stone in the Vienna collection has seven eyes. Speaking of these and others, Kingsborough remarks, "It cannot be denied that a passage in the twelfth chapter of Revelation which has perplexed all commentators on scripture, 'and there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun,' receives considerable elucidation from some of the figures contained in the Mexican paintings."

Owing to the great and almost total destruction of their symbols, which will be shown hereafter, it would be difficult to follow the comparisons further, with the means at my present command. As all these verbal admissions hav been collected from Christian authorities, and are fully corroborated by those paintings which escaped the hands of the conquerors, I think enough has been presented to entitle me to claim that my first proposition has been sustained. Moreover, the secret letter of Cortez and its mysterious disappearance hav been explained, and also why the bull allowed only the fanatical Dominicans and Franciscans to attend to the spiritual welfare of the Mexicans.

It may easily be conceived that Christian Europe would hav been shaken "from center to circumference" had the news been spread broadcast that the Mexicans worshiped a trinity, had their virgin-born, crucified Christ, and indulged in all the feasts, fasts, and ceremonies of the church, and could date the foundation of these institutions back almost to the time of the Mosaic creation.

The only difference that I hav been able to discover between the ancient Mexican and Roman Catholic faiths is the absence of physical torture to the wicked in the first, which is a prominent feature in the last. But I feel to say that when the true state of ancient Mexican civilization becomes better known, and they are recognized as having been a gentle and refined people, we will be better able to understand why they did not engraft on their religious system a doctrin which could only hav emanated from a Jewish Jehovah or a dyspeptic saint of the Dark Ages.

McARTHUR.

Brooklynite Ideas of Church and State.

At the meeting of the Constitution Club, on the 15th ult., the question of the relations of the church to the municipality and the state were again discussed. Mr. Duryea brought up the matter of the bill to place the management of the money for reformatory institutions in control of the city, and the bill exempting clergymen from taxation in real or personal estate after reaching a certain age. He commended the former, but the latter he regarded as very objectionable, as he also did the bill exempting the property of religious and charitable organizations from taxation. Mr. Duryea went back to 359 A.D., when the first effort was made to free church property from taxation. It was the result of the union of church and state. The growth of the world had favored their entire and absolute separation. The only relic was the exemption from taxation of religious bodies. It was the belief of many that a republican state should not exempt any religious body from tax. Charitable and educational institutions, free to all, should not be taxed. Here in this city was unimproved property on a street, and building materials for banks, churches, factories, and dwellings. Why should the one be taxed and the other go free? The church had all the protection of government, and on what ground should it be exempted? Was it more the house of God than a cottage of love and peace? It was a luxury, and should be taxed at its full value as such. All private institutions should be taxed, but public ones, working for the public, should not be taxed. Much danger is accruing in the country from the vast wealth in incorporated institutions which are not taxed. The farms and homes of citizens of the state were jeopardized. There were already too many eleemosynary institutions. The flat and the tenement broke down the privacy of home life and made these institutions necessary. While all institutions of charity should be fairly regarded, it would be for their advantage if all others were taxed. Instead of exempting these it would be better to giv them public support according to their merits. The recent bill to exempt the Young Men's Christian Association from taxation on religious grounds was defeated, but it claimed exemption on the ground of having a library, nothing being said of the value of it. Every man might seek freedom from taxation on the same ground if he had a few books.

Colonel Hemstreet said that in 1880 church property and sectarian schools worth $9,276,500 were exempted from taxation. The Roman Catholic church owned one-fourth, the Episcopal one-seventh, the Methodist one-seventh, and other property exempted was over $6,000,000, equaling about one-fourteenth of the entire realty in the city. There was a covert design in the mind of every man who favored this exemption. A great many influential Roman Catholics did not want their churches to be free, but wanted their charities and asylums exempted, as otherwise the beneficiaries would fall back on the community for support. The issue should be squarely met.

Mr. Douglass urged that the great property-owners felt that they were paying for the protection of their property. But it was really paid by the men who did not own the property, but paid rent. In whose interest were any exemptions made? When the state supported the church there was reason for the exemption. And more recently, when the governing classes had control in municipal affairs, it was easy to exempt the churches. Now society was entirely different. Many thousands held no religious tenets, and were as good citizens as those who supported churches. Those men who supported churches felt like freeing them from taxes, others did not. No one institution should be freed from taxation, as it would be unequal and unjust. It would bring down the government on our heads and end in revolution unless the wrong was righted. The whole matter of exemption was unconstitutional. If men could afford to build churches they could afford to pay taxes upon them.

Mr. Dumont urged the blotting out of the exemption law for the benefit of the entire city.

The Liberal Club.

Friday evening, May 1st, was what Mr. Mantalini might call "demd damp, moist, and unpleasant." The rain fell in a dreary, disconsolate way, and dripped from the umbrellas of about one hundred persons who attended the 377th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The torch of reason on the reporter's badge pin flared but dimly as he seated himself at the secretary's table to make the following notes of the proceedings.

At 8 o'clock Mr. Wakeman called the scattered assemblage to order, and the secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting and the business thereat transacted. Then the usual notices were read, and Mr. Henry O. Cherouny was introduced as the speaker of the evening, and a man who was better known than people generally supposed. Mr. Cherouny said that his subject was "Free Competition," and that he would take a retrospectiv view of history, which he proceeded to do. This gentleman is a foreigner, apparently of Germanic nativity, and his English is modified accordingly. This as regards his accent. The matter of the lecture was ably and grammatically arranged. As far as this writer caught the speaker's words and meaning, something was considered to be wrong in our economical system. The laborer was worse off in some respects than he was a thousand years ago. Free competition was selfishness and egotism, and logically called for the extinction of all opponents. Its results had not been altogether salutary. Mr. Cherouny deprecated the American tendency toward individualism. The decline of the powers of the state was the beginning of evil. Common sense was sense of common weal, and justice was far more important than liberty.

By virtue of its great staying powers, acquired through previous severe disciplin, the audience were enabled to listen patiently to the lecture for an hour and a half. Librarian King remarked that the duration of the discourse gav him quite a comprehensiv idea of what was meant by eternity. It is really a lamentable misfortune for an orator addressing an American audience not to be able to speak in intelligible English; but, after all, compared with the affliction which his audience suffer, he is to be felicitated.

Dr. Eccles, who was urged to go forward and make a speech, observed as he did so that he supposed it was necessary for him to say something in order that the rest of the critics might hav a basis for their remarks. He would say that the lecture was too long and too prosy for such an audience and such a night. Continuing, Dr. Eccles held that Socialism on the one side ought to go to the bottomless pit, and that Anarchism, on the other, ought to be sent after it. This country, he said, needed more competition among the rich, and less combination among the poor.

Mr. Langerfeld gave Dr. Eccles about a stickful of advice, urging him, by a proper course of study of the literature of Socialism, to gain such a knowledge of its aims and methods as would qualify him to express himself intelligently upon the subject. To this end Mr. Langerfeld recommended that Dr. Eccles should purchase a copy of a pamphlet entitled "The Reporter and Socialist," by Alexander Jonas, to be found on the table, price ten cents.

It seemed to be the sense of the meeting that Mr. Wakeman should offer some suggestions. The chairman compared Mr. Cherouny's ideas to some of those mysterious rivers in South America or elsewhere that vanish in the sand. The lecturer's expression was too elaborate, and his thoughts were lost in a multitude of words. Mr. Wakeman then sketched his plan for a reconstruction of society. It included salaries for professional men, with pensions for the same when superannuated, support guaranteed to females, and other pleasant things which the author hopes one day to put in print.

Mr. Cherouny did not care to offer any further remarks. The chairman warned all present to attend the Wednesday night meeting of the Institute of Social Science at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. On that occasion, they were assured, the lion and the lamb would lie together. The card of invitation bears the names of upward of a dozen ministers, about an equal number of Atheists, five doctors, four professors, one honorable, two governors, one general, and other gentlemen whose professions are peace or war as the case may be. Parke Godwin was president of the institute and would giv the inaugural address, and other eminent gentlemen would make brief addresses.

Next Friday evening the lecture will be upon "Socialism in the United States" by S. E. Shevitch, editor of the Volks Zeitung. The name sounds of Russia. It is hoped the lecture will be free from its accent. Some of the audience are growing weary of dialect artists, however accomplished, and would suggest that these non-English-speaking gentlemen be allowed to put their remarks in print.

Mrs. Slenker's Ghost-Hunting.

I hav been purposing for some time to write a note for THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning this much-talked-of affair, not because I think I can convince anyone of the truth of Spiritualism or prove to them that the whole thing is a fraud, as I know that there is no saying more certain than the oft-repeated one that "a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still," but to ask our friends if it is fair treatment to accuse Mrs. Slenker of being false to her convictions, avoiding the Spiritualists and hobnobbing with us in Syracuse, so as to help the author of "Bottom Facts." I think the trip was taken in good faith, and surely those of us who paid nothing toward it lost nothing, and if we gained nothing we need not complain. It may be our own fault. Would it not be something gained to open our eyes, by the help of another, and see how we are imposed upon by the trickery of public mediums? Spiritualists are not slow to discover and make public the frauds practiced by Christians upon the believing people. Why will they not listen to criticism of their own faith? I hav studied all phases of Spiritualism; commenced with the revelations and prophecies of A. J. Davis (how false they hav proved!); listened to the "Rochester knockings;" hav seen materialization, slate-writing, etc.; hav been shown the goods, pieces of dresses, shawls, even the hair, which were said to be produced in a dimly lighted room in the course of an hour; and I hav always found that though it was easy to do all this, the money to pay for seeing the show could never be produced by any medium, however clever in his trade. I hav nothing to say at this time about a continued life; I am dealing with the tricks of public mediums, such as our friend Elmina met, and such as the Spiritualists support and defend. I attended several seances with Mrs. Slenker in Syracuse, not because I hav any interest in them, but because I believe in Mrs. Slenker, and know she is trying to help humanity to advance in knowledge and righteousness, and I can testify to the truthfulness of her statement. Mr. Truesdell is my neighbor; I hav known him many years, and like him. I once told the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that as a medium he was a fraud, but they would not believe me, and some of them said of me what they say now of Mrs. Slenker, that I was not honest, but was trying to hurt mediums. I am very glad that "Bottom Facts" is published. I know the statements are true. I wish all Spiritualists would read it, and then rely upon themselvs to find out the "hidden things of the spirit," if such there are. I repeat, I hav no argument to make concerning a world beyond—"sufficient unto the day" is this life—I took my pen to testify to Mrs. Slenker's honesty and fidelity.

As I am in a critical mood, I wish to say that I wholly dissent from the article—I should say from the spirit of the article—of a correspondent from Syracuse who says, "There are women (in the judgment of the writer) whose writings are superior to Miss Helen H. Gardener's, and who were not introduced by Colonel Ingersoll to the platform." Cannot one be glad for another that she may hav had that advantage, even though she may be alone in the honor? I do not know the sex of the writer, but should be sorry to know it to be a woman.

Let us be glad for all good that comes to the advocates of Liberalism, not saying paltry things that may hurt their feelings.

Are we never to hear again from T. B. Wakeman and T. C. Leland? How much we miss them, even with all the good things which Watts, Putnam, and Reynolds giv us! LUCY N. COLEMAN.

Some Reflections by a Farmer.

I am a practical farmer on the last decade of life. I made my debut into this world in total ignorance of what should come after, and if I could hav known beforehand that the odds were ninety-nine to one that I should suffer for my brief stay forever in another life, which life could hav had no being if I had not been drafted into this, I certainly would hav entered my protest against being compelled to hazard so much with such fearful odds against me. As I hav had a beginning, so shall I hav an ending—a fact I cannot ignore, daily witnessing the coming and going of my fellows the past seventy years. We now, when thinking of a change, naturally wish to know where we will bring up. Some tell us, in words more laconic than polite, we'll bring up in a place we would not like to think about until later in the season. Presuming we might get habituated to the heat of its fires, the monotony from everlasting to everlasting would be intolerable. Others tell us that upon certain conditions we will migrate to another country whose climate is much preferable, yet subject to the same objectionable monotony.

The conditions upon which we secure a home that knows no eviction, in either place, we are told, lie between two personages, God and the devil; that God created this latter person so much astuter than himself that he gets ninety and nine per cent of all of us; that God, in order to get any of his own creation, was compelled to sacrifice his only begotten son to save, by proxy, those who believe in the marvelous feats performed by this son eighteen hundred years since. But as we are always believing, and as often find our credulity imposed upon, we are becoming skeptical except where we are actually cognizant of a fact, either from personal knowledge or some reliable source consistent within itself.

Now to the point. We are told that the son of God (which we are informed embodies God himself) gave his life for the saving of the world, yet I cannot learn that any but the Jews at the time of sacrifice had knowledge of this grave and certainly important fact, and the entire Jewish nation consisted of less than two millions, and the other Asiatic nations, numbering over four hundred and sixty millions, letting alone Western Europe and the American continent, were all ignorant of the means whereby they could be saved from the undesirable place. Of course, they could not hav been able to obtain this knowledge in the barbarous period of that time, no telegraph system or other means of rapid communication being known (waiving the fact that if God could make a world in six days he should be competent to hav transmitted these glad tidings to all his creatures in less time than eighteen hundred years), for at this moment sixty-seven per cent of the population of the world hav not heard of this plan of redemption, and of the thirty-three per cent called Christian the larger portion take no stock in the story when they do hear it.

We should much like you or some of the teachers of this business called Theology (for it is a business as much as the profession of law, fortune-telling, rum selling, or lottery dealing), to giv us a clearer view of this plan of redemption. Our question is asked in all honesty and sincerity. PAXTON.

The Prospect.

Are we living in the nineteenth century, or the ninth? Is the light of science still shining upon us, or are we still enveloped in the midnight gloom of superstition? How much hav the murky clouds of ignorance lifted since the dark day when the Christian church held the world in the death-dealing clutch of anti-naturalism?

Reading Silas J. Chesebrough's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 18th, I am carried in imagination back to the time when not one man in a thousand in Europe could write his name, and when, consequently, diakkism was a popular belief. That the gross superstition has survived the age that was stained with the bloodshed in the saturnalias of its power is the saddest fact that confronts us, for it shows us how slowly, how very slowly, the human intellect emerges from the chaos and night, the weakness and erraticism, of its infancy.

Mr. Wakeman's masterly review of Frederic May Holland's latest work is very timely, especially those portions of it wherein he points out the causes which may lead to a relapse into the barbarism of universal Catholicism and despotism. The very fact that there are among Freethinkers large numbers of people who read with eagerness and assent to such stuff as that written by Chesebrough, is proof positiv that our camp is yet good recruiting-ground for holy mother church.

Mr. Holland's work is a good one, but it has the defect that Mr. Wakeman has pointed out. But Dr. Felix Oswald's "Secret of the East" should be in the hands of every Freethinker in the world. It truly estimates the effect of the teachings credited to the mythical Nazarene. Publish Mr. Wakeman's review as a tract. EDWIN C. WALKER.

New Fields in Old Lands.

It seems to me that our philosophers and literati hav never enough studied the lives of Asiatic races and nations. All our considerations are confined to a few pages of history of Greek races and Egypt, Rome, and Carthage before Christ, and to what has occurred since in certain small territories of Europe, most of which, until within the past three or four centuries, hav been occupied by semi-barbarous races.

Meanwhile India, China, Japan, and Thibet, with all Mongolia, hav been neglected comparativly. A few scholars hav delved a little, a few travelers hav passed through portions of these countries and given us reports enough only to show the vast importance of the subject.

We hav volumes on volumes about what a few million people hav done in Western Europe during the past few hundred years. Meanwhile some six hundred millions living in the very highest states of civilization, with a religion superior in many respects to our own, hav led their lives for thousands of years, and all we know of them can be comprised in two or three volumes. Admitted that more has been written, but not popularized. A hundred years ago the learned world began to take a profound interest in the life of these nations, and it was predicted by the most brilliant Oriental scholars that great results must follow. Suddenly, as it seemed, and with one accord, the leaders of scientific research, the heads of schools, dropped the subject. Why? The writer of this believes this is due to the reaction from the old French Revolution. For just consider what would be the effect upon the popular mind if it were once thoroughly apprized of and familiarized with the fact that this comparativly little stream of history that has its source in and around Palestine, Greece, and Egypt, and has run through Italy and up through Western Europe, is a mere brooklet: that a vast, mightily-tided ocean exists all round it. To one who has a conception of the magnitude of this other, how ridiculous seem some of the ideas and plans by which the story of the human race is illustrated in the schools. A little chart that used to be popular will giv one an idea how the human mind is dwarfed on this subject. It was called the "Stream of Time." It was based on the Bible story, of course. The human race began with Adam. Two-thirds of the subject was filled by England, France, and the United States. It would not do to tell the truth. The fact would burst upon the mind that when Adam was created mighty nations existed, whose civilization, save in two or three respects of rapid transport, labor-saving and life-destroying inventions, lately made, too, was equal to anything the imagination of the modern man can conceive. But there is another condition of life, very different from that of a land covered with cities and villages, equally civilized, more natural, subject to few fluctuations or changes, that has been lived by great races from immemorial time. I mean the nomadic pastoral. It lacks the refinements, corruptions, and vices of city life, even as does our own country life to-day, but is none the less a life of the very highest civilization, as it is and has been led by mighty races of Western Asia and Eastern Europe. Its religion is its main feature. Here for countless ages man has led the same life, following the sun within certain degrees of latitude. Here the race maintains eternal youth because it livs in harmony with the divine laws of nature. Effete, dying races are unknown, and age on age may pass, seeing little alteration in its external life. Like all others, it is profoundly stirred by moral causes; singular religious developments hav followed on this life. Here is a vast and comparativly new field for the explorer. HOLT.

A MEXICAN historian makes a new attempt to show that America was discovered in the fifth century A.D. by a party of Buddhist monks from Afghanistan, of whom one, Hwui Shan, returned to Asia after an absence of forty-one years. A short account of the land which he visited, supposed to be Mexico, was included in the official history of China. There is proof that Hwui Shan actually visited some unknown Eastern region, and the traditions of Mexico contain an account of the arrival of monks.

News and Notes from the Field.

The meeting on Monday evening, April 20th, at Dodge City, in spite of stormy weather was a success. Dodge City is destined to occupy a central position in the growth of this Western frontier, and its unconventional life is favorable to the development of Freethought. The grip of the church is not so firmly fixed here as in older societies. Its prominent and leading business men are interested in our movement, and the organization formed will be activly indorsed by the best intelligence of the place. Dodge City will be one of the banner towns of Liberalism.

On our way to Wichita, we ran around the edge of a waterspout which did an immense amount of injury in southwestern Kansas. The papers reported that the survivors of this terrible flood gave thanks to God that it came in the day-time instead of at night, when twice as many lives would hav been lost. How very accommodating the deity was! It is to be hoped that he will be always be as obliging to his children, and if he must send a cyclone, send it in the day-time and giv people some chance to escape.

Through the energetic efforts of G. W. Collings, a very good audience greeted us at the Opera House on Wednesday evening, April 22d, although the weather was quite unfavorable. The lectures were received with enthusiasm, and an auxiliary society was established. G. W. Collings was elected temporary secretary, and through his persistent and able management the Freethought element will no doubt be prominent and influential in this rapidly growing country.

Mr. John Fisher, the sheriff of the county, Fred Sowers, Mr. Mathewson, and others, leading professional men and merchants of the city, will co-operate with Mr. Collings for the advancement of the Secular Union. With such pronounced elements of ability and energy in our cause a very marked success will be achieved, and the thoroughgoing Radical spirit of the West will show how effectually it can progress to the highest civilization. There is, indeed, a freshness and intensity in Western life that givs vast opportunity for the attainment of our noblest ideals. Mr. Mathewson, of Wichita, has had a remarkable experience of frontier adventure. He was the first white man that ever set foot in Kansas. He has been scout, hunter, fighter; has lived among the Indians, and has traversed nearly every part of this Western country. He has witnessed from the beginning the magnificent growth of the American nation in this once almost untrodden wilderness. He has seen humanity in many and wonderful changes, and has acquired that sturdy education from actual life which givs one confidence in his fellow-man and but little faith in deity. He is a specimen of that valuable and trustworthy material out of which scientific Liberalism will build in this new world a genuin humanitarian republic.

The cyclones and waterspouts sweeping up and down the plains in reckless fashion almost prevented us reaching Fort Scott in time for a lecture on Thursday evening, but the audience waited, and w arrived at half-past eight and went immediately to the platform. The Opera House was well filled on the first evening, and on the second was crowded. Our reception at Fort Scott, both by the press and the people, was one of the most pleasant we hav received in our whole tour. The following notices and comments from the papers of the city demonstrate the liberal sentiment that is in the community, and the promising field opened to our campaign work. The daily Tribune says:

"Mr. Charles Watts is an earnest and forcible speaker. His address was a fine intellectual effort, sparkling with rhetorical gems and at times intensely eloquent. He was also scathing at times, and unsparing to what the speaker considered the weakness of the Bible and Christianity. Mr. S. P. Putnam is a gentleman of pleasing presence and manner, and is evidently a scholar of considerable research. Both gentlemen more than sustained their well-earned fame on the rostrum. None could deny their earnestness, their courteous bearing, their high intelligence, or their logical and oratorical powers. In all these respects they are on a level with the very best lecturers in the country. They are polished speakers, and evidently sincere in their utterances."

And the daily Monitor observes:

"The audience which faced the Secularist lecturers, Messrs. Watts and Putnam, at the Opera House last night was certainly one which was decidedly complimentary to these gentlemen. It was a representativ gathering of the intelligence and culture of Fort Scott, and the attention paid the speakers was such as is always dictated by refinement. Many ladies graced the occasion, and at least two of the prominent ministers of the city were present."

In speaking of these gentlemen, Governor McComas said to the Tribune reporter: "Yes, they did me the honor of calling upon me, and of giving me a most agreeable surprise by more than filling my conception of them by their well-known reputation. They passed several hours of most animated intercourse with several of my Liberal neighbors and myself, both to our pleasure and profit. It was not difficult to perceive at once that they were gentlemen, and further intercourse gave us ample assurance that they well deserved their high reputation for talent and culture. Both hav the social qualities. Watts is an excellent specimen of the best type of Englishman in form, feature, and style, and has that portly and commanding presence and self-possession which are so essential and effectiv on the rostrum. Putnam is rather gracious and pleasing than commanding, but not less interesting and engaging."

I quite enjoyed my visit with Governor McComas. He is the author of those well-known books, "The Divine Problem" and "The Religion of Christ." In the latter book the remarkable theory is propounded that Jesus did not die upon the cross, but survived for many years. The analysis of evidence is exceedingly clear, and is one of the finest exhibitions of legal ability in the language. Mr. Watts has delivered many lectures on this book in England, and it was a gratifying surprise to meet its author unexpectedly in this remote country. I read "The Divine Problem" with great interest. It is somewhat Platonic and Pantheistic in its philosophy, but original both in language and method of illustration. His processes of reasoning are very subtle, and if it be allowed that the mind can pass beyond the boundary of phenomena into the world of being or substance, and formulate a science of ontology, I think Governor McComas has done this with a grasp of mind and felicity of expression that is surpassingly entertaining. It could not be better done, with a more genial spirit or brilliancy of logical deduction. His deduction is correct. Allowing his premises, I find no fault with his conclusion. His three unities are admirably correlated—the unity of the ultimate atom, the unity of the finite organization, and the absolute unity, or the unity of the whole. But, after all, these beautiful pictures of the play and interplay of the eternal force in these correlated unities are, to my mind, philosophy, and not strictly science—but a philosophy that it is well worth our while to contemplate. Mr. McComas's system of thought, like that of Universology, is one that no student should neglect, for though it may never become a certainty, it unfolds a splendid and fascinating possibility. It is a wondrous and delightful dream, not of superstition, but of that exultant thought which sweeps beyond the bounds of space and time.

I was glad to meet John Farnsworth also, an old-time valiant Freethinker, who has always been ready to do his share of work, and who has never yet been afraid to express the honest convictions of his mind, and who has won and retained the thorough respect of the community. M. S. Fox is also a valuable promoter of the Freethought cause. He has quite an inventiv genius. He has already secured patents on some of his mechanical appliances which promis practical success, and I hope fortune. In every respect our work at Fort Scott was encouraging. We came in contact with hearts and minds that furnished fresh intellectual and moral equipment.

From Fort Scott we came to Kansas City, where one of the most difficult fields of work in the whole country had been prepared by that faithful officer of the American Secular Union. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel. The following from the Kansas City News shows how earnestly she is enlisted in this movement:

"THE GOSPEL OF RIGHT LIVING.

"EDITOR Daily News: Will you allow me, as matter of public interest, to call attention to the fact that we are to hav in this city during the next few days two public teachers of exceptional excellence, Mr. Charles Watts, of London, England, for many years editor of the Secular Review, and co-worker with Bradlaugh, Holyoake, Renan, and Victor Hugo, at present vice-president of the American Secular Union, of which Colonel Ingersoll is president, and Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the same society, also a fine speaker and writer as well as poet of acknowledged ability. These gentlemen come among us to voice the new gospel of that already large and rapidly increasing army of truth seekers who believe in the authority of truth and that alone, whether in the old or new creed, whether founded on religious or scientific ground.

"An opportunity is now presented Christians to hear for themselvs (not by proxies, of whom we hav had many, in pulpit and press, during the last year) what the outcome of the scientific gospel of right living is. I, for one, most earnestly hope the courage of our orthodox friends will be equal to the occasion, and that our Secular friends will call as large and attentiv audiences to listen to their presentation of Constructiv Rationalism as do their opponents to hear the demolishing of these gentlemen and their views, when they are at a safe and comfortable distance from the attack. A free platform will be offered—no firing from an entrenched and sheltered position, but a fair, open, available field. It is proposed while these gentlemen are with us to organize a chapter, or auxiliary, to the National Secular Society, which this year comes into fellowship with the European Secular Society, organizing the Universal Brotherhood of Man, the Religion of Humanity.

"Yours in the interest of truth, MATTIE P. KREKEL."

We had a meeting Sunday morning at Turner Hall, and after addresses by Judge Krekel, Mrs. Mattie Krekel, Dr. Bowker, Charles Watts, and others, an organization was formed auxiliary to the American Secular Union. In the afternoon Mr. Watts lectured on "Secularism and Christianity." In the evening a reception was held at the residence of Mrs. Krekel. On Monday evening Mr. Watts lectured on "Agnosticism and Theism," and myself on "The Demands of Humanity." Good reports of these lectures hav been published in the daily papers. We lecture at the same place on Wednesday and Thursday evening of this week. Next Sunday we shall lecture at Chicago; May 10th at Grand Rapids; May 12th and 13th at Springport, Mich.; May 14th and 15th at Auburn, Ind.; May 24th at Louisville, Ky., and I hope at New Albany, Ind., and again at Nashville, Tenn., May 31st at Cleveland, June 7th and 14th at Canton, Ohio, and vicinity; June 21st at Pittsburgh; and June 28th at Salamanca. There is a prospect of a debate at Waynesburg, Pa., and if the Christians are sufficiently valiant it will certainly come off about the middle of June. We are now enjoying the hospitality of Mrs. Krekel with her happy and beautiful family. Mrs. Krekel is one of our most brilliant speakers, but she has also a pre-eminent practical ability, and is a wonderful housekeeper, and so we are really in a paradise of Freethought, and find invigoration both for mind and body. Judge Krekel is a man of deep and comprehensiv views, a thorough student, a brave thinker, and one who understands and applies the philosophy of law with the genius of originality. In the progress of our work he will render valuable assistance in spreading abroad a true understanding of the spirit of our government, and what should be the scope of its laws. This is a subject upon which he has spent years of study, and his theory of legislation is, to my mind, just, profound, and in harmony with natural liberty. His contributions to the literature of Freethought in this direction will be of vast importance, for surely there is no question so difficult to settle as the harmonizing of the rights of the individual with the happiness of society; and the efforts of a mind trained in legal lore and precedent, but which has never lost the philosophic spirit and insight, will be recognized as of priceless service in the cause of liberty and order.

Matter—Man—Mind.

The infinit universe, from atoms to astral worlds, is a material unity. All matter is essentially the same. It varies only in its forms. They are changing constantly. No two are ever exactly alike; nature never repeats herself. Leibnitz once picked up a leaf, declaring there was but one such leaf in existence; that whatever might be the resemblance between the leaves of one tree and another, each had its own distinguishing tint—each its wave-like surface.

All bodies are being constantly decomposed and recomposed, but their constituents are indestructible. These admit of infinit combination and assume an infinit diversity of forms, but not an atom can be created or annihilated; so that the same elemental matter is everywhere eternally existent. There is never a grain more nor one less at one time than another.

Matter in all its myriad forms may be resolved into primal elements. These admit of no further reduction; they are the simples of existence. These elements compose the world. Their number is about sixty; some scientists say sixty-four. Only about sixteen of these enter into the human organization; these same elements also compose all other animal bodies. All the materials in man are common to the whole world: there is no especial human element.

There is a nonsensical notion that there are two totally different kinds of matter—dead and living; the eye of science has never detected a dust of dead or inert matter. This distinction without a difference was devised by theologians to giv a need for a God. If matter were dead, then there would be a demand for a deity to breathe into it the breath of life. An animal body is declared dead when it commences to decay; but, as science sees it, it was never more alive. Every atom of it is activ; every part is energetically engaged in picking itself to pieces. Chemical action is even more potent in the process of pulling to pieces than in putting together.

Force is an attribute of matter; it is one of its principal inherent properties, and is manifested in all its forms. Force and matter are inseparable; one cannot exist without the other. The mind of man is merely a modification of nervous force belonging to his bodily structure. What we term death is but a transformation of material elements and forces.

These processes of decomposition and recomposition, of growth and decay, are ceaseless. In inorganic bodies, or those without regular form or parts, such as stone, these processes are much slower than in organized bodies, or those with definit form and functional parts. This is owing to the more complex combination of elements in the latter.

In animal bodies are found but few of the metallic elements, such as iron, copper, calcium, etc., which impart to inorganic matter its immobility and fixedness of form. Say that the standard weight of the human body is 154 pounds. Of this weight 88 pounds are water; the metallic compounds weigh less than five pounds; the weight of one of the gaseous elements, oxygen, is 109 pounds, while that of some of the metals is but a few grains. It is this large preponderance of liquid and small proportion of solid substances that renders the body soft and supple, and causes it to so decompose much sooner than inorganic or more metallic matter.

These observations are pitted against the prevalent opinion that man is a distinct order of being by himself, apart from all other animated entities. The absurdity of such an assumption is apparent when it is ascertained that, scientifically considered, he does not materially differ from the rest of the animal world, or even the vegetable.

Like all other bodies, man is but one of the many manifestations of matter. The same elements that make up a man would, were they put in different proportion and arranged differently, produce a plant or a quadruped, just as from the same brick may be constructed a crypt or a cathedral. The rock and the rose, the babe and the butterfly, and all the infinit diversity of forms the objectiv world presents, are only different states or conditions of the same, original, universal matter.

The carbon in the air we breathe also constitutes the solid structure of the corrugated oak. Chop down the oak and burn it to ashes; the same matter still exists, chiefly in the form of gas and water. If consumed under proper conditions, every particle can, weight for weight, be chemically accounted for.

So with the forces of matter. They can be changed, be converted into each other, but can never be destroyed. In the course of centuries the oak becomes a carboniferous deposit deep down in the earth. The light and heat of every sun ray that ever fell upon it is still retained, and can be given out again in light and heat from the combustion of the coal into which it changed.

As before remarked, matter, in all states and under all conditions, is endowed with energy or force. It could not exist without it. And as far as human knowledge ranges, there is no force apart from matter. Motion, light, heat, electricity, are merely modifications of the one, original, primal force inherent in all matter. Motion, change, is the eternal order of existence. Nothing is stationary. Grow or decay, is the decree of nature. Matter is ever on the march. Atoms attract or repel each other. Associated atoms form organizations. Through organizations are elaborated the higher forms and finer forces of life.

So we see that the character of bodies, their modes and capacities of action, always correspond to their structure. The complex, mysterious mechanism of man is capable of converting the chemical and electrical forces of his being into nervous influence, and, through this, of transmuting them into thought. Every atom has an aspiration upward, an ambition for the highest office that matter can assume. It serves its apprenticeship in the mineral, vegetable, and animal, to fit it for its finer duties in the human economy. The world is as a mighty mill for the grinding up of granit and gross matter, and refining it through a gradation of forms and forces for its mission in making perfect man.

Through the marvelous mechanism of man's organism, matter finally attains a form so fine that it eludes further chemical analysis—mind. Is that, too, material? It must be, as we hav no knowledge of it apart from organization, no manifestation of it except through matter. The brain is its organ. We think through that. Thought tires us. The thing that thinks requires rest, recuperation, sustenance, the same as an exhausted muscle. There is a throwing off of something in thought, a tangible loss to be replenished. The brain ceases its action, and there is a termination to thought. There is not a trace of thought beyond brain. A boy with a big brain is said to be "bright." Brightness is also an attribute of polished steel. A drop of water will rust the steel, a pistol-ball put out the brightness of the brain.

So that the prime product of man's organism is nervous force, the product of that brain, and of brain, mind. Like always produces like. The mind is the extremest measure of man, and all the antecedents of that are material.

The flower givs forth a fragrance that fills the atmosphere. This perfume is formed of imperceptible particles of matter. These attenuated atoms act upon but one of our senses. Without smell we would know no more of this fragrant emanation from the flower than of man's mental forces. We know that these forces are evolved from the operation of certain organs—that they are an effect from purely physical functions. We also know that the minds of men act and react upon each other, that they are subject to material conditions and produce material effects, and that therefore they must be material.

S. H. Preston.

A Few Remarks by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll lectured in Boston on the evening of April 19th. In the afternoon he attended the meeting of the Ingersoll Secular Society, and in response to a most enthusiastic welcome spoke as follows. We take the report from the Investigator:

Ladies and Gentlemen: To tell you the truth, I felt a certain delicacy about coming here this afternoon—a little delicacy about coming to a meeting of a society that had done me the honor to bear my name; but I'll be as frank with you as you hav been with me. I'm glad I did come. We hav heard a very excellent discourse, and hav heard reasons given why a man is called a Freethinker.

I'm disposed to think that this world has been reasonably honest. I'm disposed to believe that, generally speaking, the founders of all religions, and nearly all the followers of those religions—especially those who hav been paying members—hav been reasonably honest. You know that this is not a very good world. I hav heard a great deal of flattery addressed to God for the wisdom he manifested in making it. I hav never been able to see it. I do not think that human life has been, in the history of this poor world, a very great blessing, but we must take into consideration the condition of our poor ancestors when we pass judgment upon their superstitions.

We must think of the huts and holes and miserable dens in which they lived, surrounded by heat, and frost, and storm, attacked by all the diseases we now know. Just for one moment imagin this world at that time. Poor mothers, clasping naked infants to naked breasts; famin, disease, and war! Just think of the condition of our ancestors when they laid the foundations of orthodox religion!

I also take another step and say that everybody does as he must. He is the product of all that has gone before, so that he is entitled to a certain degree of charity. I want some charity myself, and so I say of these others, I presume they did as they must, which, as a rule, is bad enough. So, taking into consideration the circumstances, with the idea that they did as they must, I find charity even for those who conceived of the doctrin of eternal pain; and that, in my judgment, is the worst thing the human mind ever has conceived.

Another thing we must bear in mind: In those things that touch human nature the closest, progress is the slowest. We made considerable progress in astrology before we began to teach astronomy; we knew all about heaven before we knew anything of this world; we had made theology a science before we knew anything about human nature. Now, there has been a little progress in every direction, even in the direction of mistakes. You can hardly imagin the debt we owe to the mistakes of the world. The mistakes we hav forgotten hav almost made us rich.

I say there has been a little advance. Take, for instance, music. At one time the little pipe of Pan was all the music there was. One poor little flute, the sound varied by stopping the aperture with the fingers. But there was one good thing about that little flute—it excited the love for music, it increased the desire for harmony, until finally the orchestra was born, and the opera, with all its expression of human emotion. Growth is a very slow process. I tell you it is a long way from the first whisper to Lohengrin. But we hav traveled all that distance.

Now, I find this not only in music, but in everything else. The savage eye takes cognizance of a very few colors—nowhere near the colors we see. Now, I hav said of music a great many times, that the first music of the world was the music of time, the music of the feet. That is all. Joy is time and tune, with emphasis added. This is what I call the music of the heart. It produces states of feeling. Now, there is another kind of music, such as is produced by Wagner, the Shakspere of music (you may not all agree with me, but you will some day), that produces not simply states of feeling, but trains of thought.

So our religion, at first, played only upon the single string of feeling. That harp of God never had but two strings—one of fear, and the other that of selfish joy, that you had escaped eternal pain, no matter who had failed. Now, this was a religion born in what you might call the caves of the soul. That religion no longer suffices the cultivated brain or the cultivated heart.

Now, millions imagin that if you take away the doctrin of eternal pain nothing is left, but the consequences of all actions still remain; the absolute fruit of all the seed you sow is still saved. And some people imagin if you do not love God there is no goodness in you, but I do not see why you will not love your children just as well, and why you will not feel under the same obligation to your friend or neighbor.

In the early stages of civilization each tribe had its own god, and when these tribes became a nation, the god of the tribe that conquered the other tribes, became the god of that nation, and the reality of that god was established by the club of barbarism. Now, this national god hated with all his heart all other nations. But it is gradually dawning upon orthodoxy that if there is any god at all he is the God of humanity; that he does not like the Englishman any better than he does the Russian; that he does not absolutely love the American and hold in detestation all other nations.

So we are gradually widening and finding that the whole human race must permanently rise or permanently fall together. In other words, we are getting philosophy in the place of religion, and philosophy is only a higher form; that is all, and whatever we are endeavoring to do we ought to try to make ourselvs happy. There is no other good. The gods can do me no good but to add to my happiness. Let them put all their heads together, let them hold a divine caucus in every star. There is nothing they can do but that.

There is only one good—that is happiness; and by happiness I mean the fruit that a decent action bears; the result of trying to make somebody else happy. Now, if happiness is the only good, the man who makes the most people happy is the best man, and the man to commence with is himself, so that he will not become a burden to others. He must see to it, if possible, that some time in his life he shall be able to stand alone, and not go through the world on crutches and a pain to other people.

The next thing to do is to help somebody else. That, to my mind, is all there can possibly be to any religion. I am a believer in the family. This is the only society I hav any great confidence in. The man who makes a happy home is fit society in this world, or any other, for man or gods. No god can disgrace himself by associating with a man who has been devoted to making a happy fireside. This is what I call religion; and a young man instead of getting in love with God, had better get in love with some good, sweet girl that he is willing to giv his life for. It is a thousand times better than the worship of any imaginary or of any real being.

If there be a God, I certainly can do him no particular good. The only way I can help him is to help him to make his universe a success; and it can only be a success by making the creatures into which he has breathed life happy, making their lives better.

Now the first thing for a young man to do is to make a home. This is the real temple, and you will understand the worship of this religion. There is no mystery about it, and yet nobody has ever understood it. There is no mystery about human affection, and yet it is infinitly beyond our conception.

Now, if we hav a child and allow it to grow up in the sunshine of affection, in the perfume of love, and see that little bud of humanity burst into flower and giv back joy for joy, that is success; and whoever has raised such a child, has lived a truly religious life; and when men and women hav gathered about them such ties, and when they truly love each other, there is real worship.

I understand the name you hav taken for this society is the "Secular Society." What does that mean? I understand it to mean to attend to the affairs of this world? But are you never to hav any thought about another world? Yes, dream about it, think about it, build your castles in a future Spain, if you will, and when one dies that you love, hope to meet that one again. Nobody can object to that; but when you say your neighbor has not the same right to look into the stars and guess that you hav, then you hav become an intellectual tyrant.

I believe in Freethought. Fear is the jailer of the mind; and you can take a little child before it has left the cradle, and make its poor little soul the slave of fear. Fear is the only thing that can forge chains for the mind. You may finally get people so they will not think, simply because their minds are imprisoned by this tyrant.

We not only want Freethought, but in addition we want free speech. Now I do not mean by this, anything offensiv. If I know myself, I hav been driven to the position I now occupy by the cruelty of religion. When I was a little boy, sitting by the jamb of the fireside, watching the sparks, hearing my good old father read the Old Testament, I do not remember the time when I did not, with all my heart, hate his God, and so I hav broken away from all religions.

We want not only Freethought, but we want every Freethinker to do what he can to cultivate tenderness, kindness, especially at home. That is the real church, and it is about the only church worth preserving, and it is the only religion.

Think how many religions this world has outlived! Hundreds and hundreds of religions are dead, and we love one another still. Thousands and millions of gods hav grown old, and deaf, and wrinkled, and toothless, and finally joined that shadowy throng; yet there are husbands and wives, lovers, firesides, and little children; so this is really the religion in which I believe.

I'm satisfied (but about that I may be mistaken) that these questions which we hav always been asking of the sphinx, in the desert of time: "Where did we come from?—Whither are we going?—What is all this for?" will never be answered by the intellect of man, and in my judgment cannot be answered. I believe, then, in spending time in asking questions that can be. What is the best way to prevent poverty? What is the best way to prevent crime? How can we increase the sum of human happiness? And without having the egotism to think, or to imagin, that what the speaker of the day has been kind enough to say about me, is true, without even dreaming that I hav ever accomplished anything worth speaking of—because I know, after all, how little he can do without somebody to help him—so, I say, knowing how little one man is, and knowing that he can only succeed when he givs utterance to the thoughts that others think, I want to thank, here and now, every man who has, either publicly or privately, sympathized with the efforts, no matter how feeble, that I hav made, knowing that without them, all I hav done, which is little enough, would be absolutely nothing.

And now, thanking the gentlemen who hav done me the great honor to call this society by my name, and thanking you for your kindness and attention, and hoping, as I now do, that the lives of every one of you from this day until the last may be rich with human affection, with love given and love returned, and that you may be happy husbands and fathers, happy wives and mothers, and happy children, with this wish I bid you good-bye.

Doctor Severance Retorts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As you hav taken occasion to criticise in no very tender manner my article, "What Has Been Done?" of course you will publish a brief reply.

You say, "Mrs. Severance is in error in regard to what has been done?" I do not see how you can justly come to any such conclusion, as I did not state what had been done, as I did not know, but did ask for information. It seems to me, with a department especially devoted to that subject in The Truth Seeker, if organic work is done, it should be reported, as encouragement to all of us who are working in season and out, through evil as well as good report, for Liberalism.

No one would be more rejoiced than myself to see a mighty organizing of Liberals throughout the country, and if it is being done, I want to be informed thereof. Last year in two weeks I helped organize four Leagues. I think they still liv—at least, I hav seen no obituary notice. Now, three able agents such as we hav in the field, backed by money and influence, it appears to me, should be able to report by this time at least a hundred societies. You say:

"Touching Colonel Ingersoll, Mrs. Severance is very far astray. He did not ask for the presidency of the League, and now that he has accepted it, that the work may not be impeded by any action of his, it is in the very worst possible taste to slur him as Mrs. Severance does by her quotation of "our noble leader." Whether Mr. Ingersoll believes in self-sacrifice or not, we know that he lectured for years in the West and footed his own bills. We know, too, that he could hav been governor of Illinois had he been willing to keep his opinions to himself."

I never intimated he wanted the presidency; on the contrary, I had no reason to believe he would accept it; and you as well as I know that his letter, published in the same issue, dated April 2d, was written two months after my article was written, and that this was the first word of his that was given the public on the subject. My quotation "of our noble leader" was no slur upon him, but a quotation from those that were ringing the changes upon it when he had not manifested enough interest in the matter to even notice the fact of his election, or whether he would accept or not. I hav always admired Colonel Ingersoll as the eloquent opponent of the churches' ideas of Bible inspiration, and that I consider his especial role. That he has always "paid his bills" while lecturing I hav no reason to doubt. We all generally do that, and especially would we be able to if we could command the prices for speaking he does. But it seems to me, Mr. Editor, when you say you know he could hav been governor of Illinois had he been willing to keep his opinions to himself, you must hav had a special revelation, for you could not prove any such thing certainly.

Was it not a little far-fetched to assume that I was "throwing a stone in the way of the League," or planting thorns along the paths of workers, because I saw fit to offer some opinions or even criticisms? I think I hav manifested by my works my interest in the League in the past, which, I assure you, is no whit abated; but as a worker and life member I feel I hav a right to express my opinions, even if they differ from some others, whose opinions, of course, differ just as much from mine.

In conclusion, is it incompatible with the "Nine Demands" to giv to women as well as to men their justly earned titles? It requires one letter less to spell Dr. Knapp than Mrs. Knapp.

Yours for Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity,

Juliet H. Severance, M. D.

Canadian Notes.

Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, Mich., gave his last lecture on Sunday evening last, in Albert Hall, to a crowded house, his subject being "The Philosophy of the Religious Emotions." The Ex-Rev. riveted the attention of his audience so that you might hav heard a pin drop. The wily and wary clergy of the present day, being conscious that Christianity is nothing but a ridiculous piece of tomfoolery, which is incapable of being defended or tested by examination, warn their flocks not to enter into disputations with Freethinkers; to use no arguments on the Christian side, but to oppose the arguments of Freethinkers with Christian experience. To such a lame and impotent conclusion has the boasted religion revealed by God arrived at last—the clergy are so conscious of the rottenness and idiotic imbecility of Christianity—that they dare not defend it. They enjoin their flocks to trust to experience only, knowing all the time that the devotees of all the other religions of the world pass through an experience precisely similar to that of the Christian. "As the fool thinketh so the bell tinketh." The whole thing is a "will-o'-the-wisp"—an ignis-fatuus of the mind.

In noticing a Secular reunion, the Toronto Daily World remarks:

"A concert and social took place last night at the rooms of the Secular Union, under the management of the ladies of the society. The rooms were crowded with members and their friends. Miss Nellie Stewart sang 'Jessie's Dream' in a very pleasing manner. Arthur Tilney sang an old plantation song, to his own accompaniment on the banjo, very effectivly. Mrs. Stevens sang in an artistic style 'Jock o' Hazeldean.' D. Richmond gave a negro sermon in character, and produced much merriment.

"Charles Peters, an old member of the society, who is about to leave the city, was presented with a gold-headed cane by Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, on behalf of the society. The evening's entertainment terminated by a grand ball in the Opera House lecture hall."

Julian the apostate was born at Constantinople 331. When he became emperor he shook off the yoke of Christianity that had been imposed upon him; he attempted to arrest the old civilization in its headlong career and to restore the edifice with the fragments of universal ruin. This was his glory, and his premature death was a real calamity. His chimeras might not indeed hav got the better of those of Christianity, but during the respit afforded by them some half rational heresy, whether of Arius, Pelagius, or Manes, might hav succeeded in breaking Catholic unity and thus hastening the hour of a general return to common sense. Towards the end of the fourth century the Alexandrian had taken the name of the Athenian school. Passing mention may be made of a famous woman, Hypatia, pathetic victim of Christian fanaticism, daughter of the famous mathematician Theon. Pupil of Plutarch, the Athenian inspirer of the poet-bishop Synesius, Hypatia, beautiful, chaste, and eloquent, became the vindicator of the rights of Freethought and science in the midst of the Jewish, Pagan, and Christian sects, whose sanguinary dissensions were desolating Alexandria. Everywhere in those unhappy days of the opening of the fifth century, but nowhere more than in Alexandria, where the most senseless and wild docrins, adding the chaos of internecine strife to the confusion of the barbaric invasions, the old world was devouring its own vitals, and was falling a prey to its savage progeny. The jealousy of a Bishop Cyril of Alexandria, combining with the ferocity of frenzied monks, let loose the blind hatred of the populace against Hypatia, dragged from her pulpit, stoned and torn to pieces. Hypatia, whose lessons had inspired the enthusiasm of the few surviving noble and enlightened minds, sealed with her blood the triumph of Christianity. The school that she had restored perished with her, and Hypatia was the last Alexandrian philosopher in Alexandria. The schools of Athens were closed by a decree of Justinian in the year 519, and the philosophers who remained took refuge in the court of Chosroes, emperor of Persia, in order to escape being murdered by the bloodthirsty Christians. The fourth century was one of the most troubled, one of the most sanguinary and disastrous, that mankind has outlived. But it is celebrated by the church because it ushers in the era of her political and social supremacy. Yet, for all the ostentatious pride she may take in her great men Athanasius, Jerome, Hillary, Ambrose, Augustine, she cannot conceal from history the wrangling of her dignitaries, the furies of the sects, the fooleries of monasticism, the ruin of the arts, the proscription of thought, the disembodiment of the Roman world, that crowning work of a religion in league with a truculent barbarism. What characterizes the fourth century is the divorce of faith and reason, the substitution of faith for philosophy, causing thereby the debasement, degradation, and wild insanity of human thought and human morals. We get an insight into the extent to which Christianity had debased the human intellect by the two councils of Nice and Constantinople, whose chief labors were to define the nature and persons of the trinity. To what a state of degradation was humanity brought by Christian superstition. There is no more abject humiliation than a belief in such idiocies as a god conceived in the womb of a virgin, the death and resurrection of a God, and such insane logomachies as the trinity, with its attendant idiocy, transubstantiation. St. Augustine, after writing fifteen books explanatory of the doctrin of trinity, was fain to confess that he had explained nothing, but he adds, "We must always make believe to say something."

Eschylus's Tragedies including Prometheus, translated by Buckley, in Bohn's Classical Library, published by Harper, is as good as any other. I believe it is published at 3s. 6d. English—$1.25 United States. It can be had at any book store, or, still better, send $1.25 to The Truth Seeker office, and you will get Prometheus by return mail. Taylor was a very learned man. I believe he translated Prometheus for his own use and never published it. He also translated, for his own use, many hymns addressed to Prometheus, and various fragments of ancient Greek poetry on the subject of Prometheus. After Taylor left the church he set up a church of his own, and published his sermons under the name of the "Devil's Pulpit." He also published a work on theology called "The Syntagmia," and, best of all, another entitled "The Diegesis." Send $2.00 to The Truth Seeker office. On receipt of $2.00 for each of these works, we can post them by return mail. "The Diegesis" is a perfect mine of wealth of anti-theological ideas. The Rev. Robert Taylor, M.A. and M.R.C.S., while at the University of Cambridge, won double first-class honors and gold medals, and, altogether, achieved extraordinary honors for his learning and literary attainments. His writings should be in the possession of everyone. R. B. Butland.

Several new facts will be brought forth by the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Among new and valuable discoveries were Professor Hildgard's communication regarding the difference of the sea level between the mouth of the Mississippi and Sandy Hook, Professor Cope's discovery of a human tooth in a stratum which would demonstrate the antiquity of man on this continent, and Professor Morse's collection of facts regarding the habits and customs of the Coreans.

Pope Pius IX. has been dead seven years, yet he is still in purgatory. At least, we judge so from the Catholic churches offering on the anniversary of his death solemn requiem masses for the repose of his soul. If it takes seven years to pray a pope's soul out of purgatory, how long does an ordinary sinner stay there?—Sunday Gazetteer.

New England Superstition.

Since the culmination of the Millerite excitement in 1843, in which year Miller predicted the final collapse of the world, but little has been heard of the Adventists. They then wisely concluded not to set definit dates, which led to disappointment and afforded the ungodly opportunities to scoff, and confined themselvs to preaching the near destruction of the world in a general way. Mr. Miller, it will be recollected, was a Massachusetts man, and his doctrins found numerous believers in New England. In Maine, especially, Miller found devout followers who went so far as to giv away property and prepare their ascension robes. Since the subsidence of this craze, Miller has had but few imitators, though there are some twenty or thirty thousand Adventists in the country.

During the last two or three months, however, there has been a revival of the delusion in the towns of Corinna, Newport, Orrington, and one or two others. A "prophet" named Nickerson has been laboring there and has made many converts. The end of the world was set for April 29th. This prophecy was based on the seventh chapter of Daniel, Nickerson declaring that all the things which Daniel saw in his dream had come to pass except that described in the thirteenth verse—"And behold one like the son of man came with the cloud of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days." The previous sights of Daniel—the four great beasts which came up from the sea—the lion with eagle's wings, who stood upon its feet like a man, and had a man's heart given it—the bear which had three of its own ribs "between the teeth of it"—the leopard, which had four wings and four heads—the fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, with iron teeth and ten horns, with a little horn with eyes and mouth—all these sights hav been symbolically fulfilled and are clear to the eyes of the faithful who look over the world's history. One of the brethren, in conversation recently with a correspondent of a Boston daily, averred that Napoleon was one of these beasts. The correspondent suggested that perhaps O'Donavan Rossa was he of the iron teeth and ten horns, and the brother thought the suggestion worthy of consideration. In an interview with the prophet Nickerson just before the 29th he said that "the time included in the vision of Daniel is 2,300 years. We hav passed that time. The last great day is at hand. The seventh seal is about to be opened. There will be silence in heaven about the space of half an hour. Then the ten thousand times ten thousand will be gathered before the Ancient of days. So it was with Noah. He was given the year (120) and then he was ordered to move into the ark. He obeyed instructions. After that, seven days and then the awful flood."

The correspondent visited one of their meetings and thus describes it:

"It was a weird scene. There were about one hundred people in a small room lighted by two kerosene lamps. On the wall where all could see it was a large chart on which the allegory of Daniel was illustrated and explained with realistic pictures and mathematical demonstrations. The dragons, horned beasts, and impossible monsters, frolicking over this great map in red, yellow, and green colors, looked partly ferocious and partly fantastic, in the dim light. There were the lion with eagle's wings, and the bear munching his own ribs, and the other monstrosities prancing in bright paint before the Ancient of days with his throne of flame and chariot of fire. It was a spectacle well calculated to appeal to credulity and superstition, and the application of these pictures to the tragic events in the career of the world by the prophet who was speaking was ingenious; but his addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, by which he made the world end on the 29th o April, 1885, was tedious, and not very lucid.

"Some of the leading disciples, as well as the prophet, took part in the meeting, and one or two brethren, who agree in the substance of the doctrin, but differ slightly from the chief priest in their arithmetic, also lifted up their voices. These men are called by the others 'opposers.' They argue that the judgment day should be postponed till 1889. A debate was kept up for an hour between the two sects, with seriousness and good temper. The 1885 people seemed to get the better of it."

As April 29th approached the sect got their robes ready. The same kind of robe was put on by all, men, women, and children. It was a flowing garment of white cotton cloth, "something like a priest's surplice, something like a butcher's frock, and most like a nightgown." The farmers who had been drawn into the craze did not get out any wood last winter, and neglected all their usual spring preparations. Some of them sold their cattle.

The proceedings of these Christian fanatics during the past winter hav been barbaric in the extreme. When the prophet baptized a convert he cut a hole through the ice in some pond or stream, and doused the man or woman into the frigid water. "It has not been an unusual spectacle," says the correspondent, "to see the disciples kneel and pray on the street corners in loud voices. Sometimes they hav gathered groups of people around them in the open air. Their favorit mode of self-disciplin has been to crawl through the streets in the mud and slush. One woman crept half a mile in this way, singing and groaning alternately. Strangest of all, one of the believers declared last week that nothing would mortify his pride but to sink him in the ground like a fence post, with nothing but his head out. He induced two of his brethren to dig a circular hole in the ground, and he jumped in and prayed while they shoveled the dirt around him up to his neck and shoulders. He remained in this position several hours."

If all this had happened in the infancy of the race, when our ancestors wore necklaces of snakes and ornaments made from their enemies' bones, or even in the days when Cotton Mather and his fellows were whipping Quakers and accusing old women of occasionally appearing as toads, or of changing themselvs into black cats and flying through the air on broomsticks, it would not be a matter for much surprise. But this is commonly supposed to be a civilized era, when people are accustomed to reason, and are credited with knowing a little something concerning the laws governing the earth and its immediate planetary neighbors. Twenty-three hundred years ago the Ancient of days might hav existed for the barbaric tribes wandering over the Eastern deserts, and Daniel's picturesque jim-jams might hav been thought, by a people feasting on horrors, symbolical of something or other, but one would think that the prophet who should preach them now would find his audience limited to the insane asylum in which he was confined. It is certain that these delusions can spread only among devout Bible-believers, and the pernicious influence of that book can scarcely be seen plainer than in the hallucination of these semi-lunatics. And, after all, the Millerites' faith is no more ridiculous than the story of the incarnation, the resurrection, or even the Athanasian creed, to which most of the Christian world subscribes.

Hear Them Talk.

Mr. Keiley, the pope-supporting gentleman who was appointed minister to Italy, has resigned that mission and been appointed to Austro-Hungary. His resignation was due to a gentle hint from the Quirinal that his reception in Rome would not be over cordial. Speaking of this gentleman's appointment to the Italian mission, the Catholic Union and Times says:

"We think it a mistake on the part of our esteemed Catholic contemporaries to hav dragged in Mr. Keiley's religion into this appointment. The subject of a man's religion is entirely foreign in such connection. The only pertinent question is one of fitness. All creeds are equally free in this republic. But they hav no rights before the law. It is only American citizens who profess them that hav rights; and among these is the right to profess the religion of their choice without citizen detriment. Therefore, neither the Catholicity nor the Protestantism nor the Judaism of an American citizen should exercise any influence in his selection or rejection for political honors."

This is square, all-wool-and-a-yard-wide talk, so far as it goes, and if it only were sincere it might giv us some hope of the reformation of the Jesuits. But it will not wash. The idea of Catholics now is, keep mum, get our men into office, extend the power of the Catholic church, and then seize the opportunity. This talk about freedom, and American citizenship, is only a blind. In the days of church power, heretics were turned over to the "secular" government "to be punished without shedding of blood." This meant the stake. And the burning by the government officials enabled Catholics to claim that the church never murdered. With the same sinister hypocrisy the church now strokes the Eagle's head and cries, "Glorious bird!" but let her get a firm grip on the eagle's neck and she would choke him to death and laugh at the impotent flapping of his wings.

By the way, were the Infidels intentionally omitted from the list of citizens whose religious opinions should be no bar to political preferment?

A Defense of Herbert Spencer.

E. L. Youmans has edited and the Appletons hav published the controversy on Religion held recently between Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. Professor Youmans has given the work a Preface and Introduction, and has appended an article by Count Goblet D'Alviella on "The Religious Value of the Unknowable," the "Cardinal Principles of the Synthetic Philosophy," and "A Positivist Religious Service."

The book might very properly be called a defense of Mr. Spencer. By its heat and, in one instance at least, unfairness, it indicates that the editor almost concurs in Harrison's characterization of Mr. Spencer's "The Man versus the State," namely, that it is Spencer against all England. The papers which make make up the work, with the exception of Count D'Alviella's, hav been published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and reviewed at the time by Stephen Pearl Andrews; and we are further promised a comparison of the two philosophers from the pen of T. B. Wakeman, himself a Positivist, but a "follower" neither of Comte, Congreve, nor Harrison. Frothingham, though educated as a Christian, once said that he was willing to be known through life as a Frothinghamite. In the same way Mr. Wakeman, though a Comtist, is a Wakemanian one.

The controversy between Messrs. Harrison and Spencer, though incidentally touching many points, has for its main theses: (1) the origin of religious feeling; (2) the value of Mr. Spencer's Unknowable or "Infinit Eternal Energy from which all things proceed" as a substitute for deity, and (3) the reasonableness of adopting humanity as an adequate object of religion. Mr. Spencer finds the origin of religious feeling in the ghost-theory; Mr. Harrison, following Comte, finds it in fetichism, or, as Mr. Harrison prefers to call it, nature-worship, before spirits, ghosts, or gods ever took definit form in the human mind. Upon this point it is admitted by some Positivists that Mr. Spencer has the best of the argument. Upon the question of the religious value of the Unknowable, it is generally held, and rightly, we think, that Mr. Harrison has shown the logical impossibility of depressing the unknowable to the uses of religious conjuration, or of its forming the basis, as Count D'Alviella has put it in his paper, of the religion of evolution. Upon the remaining point—that of adopting humanity as an adequate object of religion—opinions will differ, as the bias or studies of the readers incline. But we dislike the unfairness of the editor of this volume in quoting a Positivistic service held by Richard Congreve, of London, and thus implying that that was Harrison's doctrin and ritual. Mr. Harrison has time and again disavowed the "worship" of humanity in any sense, and in his second paper in this very controversy he takes pains to repudiate any addressing of prayers to "holy" humanity, or the use of the banners which in the religious service of Comte is a prominent object for ridicule. Mr. Harrison is no blind devotee of Comte; he regards much that that individual threw out as tentativ and utopian; he has no sympathy with the theological parodying of Comte's more Romish followers, and it is, therefore, rank injustice to Mr. Harrison to endeavor to make him responsible for them. The special pleading in Mr. Youmans's notes to Mr. Harrison's side of the dispute is also in bad taste. It is well known that Spencer is Professor Youmans's philosophical deity; his notes therefore hav the same value as the ministerial instruction offered Jehovah in the prayers going up from the Christian pulpits. This partiality of Mr. Youmans is further shown by the editing into the book of Count D'Alviella's paper, which is entirely in favor of Mr. Spencer. It seems to a lover of fair play in philosophy as well as in religion that a spirit of strict justice would hav enforced silence upon the part of outsiders, or the admission of an equal amount of expert testimony upon either side.

With these criticisms of the make-up of the book we shall turn it over to our legal and philosophical friend Wakeman, who has something to say upon the subjects discussed by the two great heretics.

Dr Severance and the League.

Except for one or two errors she makes, we are disposed to let Dr. Severance hav the last word.

The tenor of Dr. Severance's "What has been done?" was to the effect that nothing had been done. In assuming this by ill-concealed implication we thought the doctor erred, and said so. Mr. Putnam and Mr. Reynolds hav reported from many places that "a League was formed here after the lecture." The Campaign Fund and the efforts made by the League officers hav been published from week to week, and Dr. Severance has probably seen them. In the secretary's report to the next Congress we presume the number of new Leagues will be given, their condition stated, and other information afforded. Perhaps the secretary may enlighten us sooner.

We do not care to discuss Colonel Ingersoll. Admiration of his powers must be second to respect for him as a man with those who know of his many noble acts. In saying he paid his bills we meant that in his early lecturing days he went into his own pocket to foot advertising bills, hall rent, etc. There is a story current among the colonel's acquaintances that upon being applied to once by a lecture agent to make a contract for a series of lectures, he refused. "No," he said, "I lectured for years and paid all my own expenses; now I am going to hav for myself whatever I make," or words to that effect. It did not require any special revelation to know about the governorship of Illinois. Mr. Ingersoll could hav had the Republican nomination for that office had he kept his heretical opinions to himself. A nomination by the Republican party in Illinois meant election as surely as in Vermont, as any one conversant with politics knows.

We cheerfully acquit Dr. Severance of any intention to roll a stone in the way of the League, though her letter seemed a trifle sharp and premature. She certainly has a right to express her opinion, and the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are open to her in which to do it.

In conclusion, if we hav done Dr. Knapp any injustice by printing "Mrs." instead of "Dr.," we humbly apologize. We hav great esteem for Dr. Knapp, and no less for the wife than for the physician.

Editorial Notes.

THE Freedom of Worship bill is probably dead for this session. It came up last week on a motion to discuss in committee of the whole, which was defeated, fifty-eight to fifty-eight, the Republicans of the Assembly voting almost solidly against it. Unless the bill is called from the committee and rushed through in the closing hours of the session, when the Assemblymen are more or less excited and careless, we hav heard the last of it till next session.

A METHODIST paper says: "The cry against Sunday laws does not come naturally or directly from the workingman. The clamor for larger liberty does not come so much from those who desire the convenience or the amusement, as from those who hope to enrich themselvs by supplying it." The reverse of this is nearer the truth. The people are not clamoring for the re-enactment of the Blue laws. It is the preachers who desire to enrich themselvs by forcing everybody to support the churches.

MR. TUCKER has resumed the regular fortnightly publication of Liberty. Tucker is doing solid work for individualism, but Anarchy is too one-sided and extreme a philosophy to contain the whole of truth, and is unfitted to replace the present order of society, as we took considerable pains recently to show. We hav heard the wish expressed that Mr. Tucker would throw out some of his novels and giv more of himself and Kelly and Appleton. "Edgeworth," also, one of our own correspondents, is a trifle too obscure for ordinary human minds, but he means well, and occasionally reaches the level of his readers.

CONSIDERING the differences between Mr. J. Harrison and his Freemason lodge, the story of which was told by Mr. Harrison himself in the last TRUTH SEEKER, the Town Talk of Toronto says: "Now, if the religious test required to be passed by Masonic candidates amounts simply to belief in a supreme being, it stands to reason that no initiated member can be required to believe in anything more. Even were the defendant all that he is charged with being—a Secularist, a Freethinker, and an Agnostic—this would not go one inch to prove his disbelief in a God. Many eminent Unitarians hav been Secularists; there are Freethinkers in every enlightened and progressiv body of Christians. As to the charge of Agnosticism, that sounds more formidable on account of the word being generally misapplied. An Agnostic may—thousands of them do—believe in the existence of a supreme being, but he can not affirm that existence to be a part of his own positiv intellectua knowledge. The matter is one which has been prett openly discussed of late, both by members and by non-members of the craft. It is urged that the expulsion of Mr. Harrison under such circumstances would be a glaring scandal and a lasting disgrace to the Masonic order. It is freely asserted that, while impure livers and convicted offenders against justice are permitted to sit unimpeached night after night in their lodge rooms, this prosecution of a man who has ever worn 'the white flower of a blameless life' is a monstrous mockery of the principles on which the order was founded."

MR. EVERETT, editor and publisher of the Labor Advocate at Shelbyville, Ill., is having a lively time in his town. In his issue of April 28th he thus explains:

"Since I commenced running this office every expedient has been resorted to to run me out of this place, by ridicule, defaming, and every other way they could devise, but Monday morning as I came to the office I found on the door the infamous initials, K. K. K., with a skull and cross-bones depicted thereon, with the word 'Warning' underneath, and in another place written 'a word to the wise,' which is going one step too far, and I wish it distinctly understood that the mob that waits on me with any Ku-Klux designs I will see that subjects for six funerals are prepared from out of the mob, for this editor don't scare worth a damn."

ALEXANDER LONGLEY has changed the name of his Communist to Altruist, and moved from Glen Allen to St. Louis. Mr. Longley appears to hav left his common sense on the farm at Glen Allen, if we may judge from these comments upon the recent lectures of Messrs. Putnam and Watts at St. Louis:

"Well, if these men make a living by lecturing against religion, it is doing the same as the preachers, who also make their living by upholding it. These Secularists are generally strenuously opposed to liquor prohibition, while at the same time they zealously advocate religion prohibition. A free country should allow of the greatest personal liberty that is compatible with the public good, but at the same time should restrict its citizens in doing anything to the injury of others."

We should like to hav Mr. Longley point out the Secularist who advocates the prohibition of religion.

THE American hierarchy, during the late Plenary Council, addressed a letter to the German bishops. Its import was "How d'ye do?" By the following sentences from the reply it will be seen they do not do very well:

"Far off as yet appears the end and our delivery from affliction, the chain of the May laws by which the liberties and the rights of the church are fettered still binds and galls us. Our seminaries and monasteries are suppressed; thousands of parishes still remain desolate, bereft of pastors. The religious orders and congregations are still expelled and exiled from their nativ land. Still are the church's disciplin, the functions of the episcopacy, and the mangement of the church's good subjected in many things to the jurisdiction and control of the government, which, moreover, arrogates to itself the management of our schools. Clerics and even priests are still impressed into the military services. The archbishops of Prussia continue to languish in exile beneath alien skies."

What a pity that a priest should be put on the same footing as a peasant in the defense of his country! What a shame that the church cannot govern Germany, and her ecclesiastics wax fat and rich at the expense of the state, and be exempt from all disagreeable duties of citizenship! Too bad, too bad!

THE Boycotter, which is supposed to be published in the interest of labor, but which, we are afraid, is being prostituted to advancing the political ambitions of a few men, doubleleads the following sentiments:

"We hav never had the slightest sympathy for the woman politician, or the advocates of woman suffrage, so-called. We do not believe it to be any part of a woman's business to engage in politics—and usually she don't, unless she is so ugly that she fails, or is unable, to 'engage' herself in a more congenial direction. Short-haired women and long-haired men instinctivly excite our inherent abhorrence. And we hav no hesitation in asserting that the woman suffrage movement is largely responsible for the loose divorce system that is now so prevalent all over the country, and particularly in New England."

If the Boycotter allows itself to indulge in this antediluvian slang, its days of usefulness are over, and the sooner the workingmen withhold support from it the better. While such senseless talk will not alienate from the labor movement the people abused, it will alienate them from the self-assumed leaders of that movement in this city. The Boycotter and other labor journals hav received a large proportion of their support from those who also believe in and work for woman suffrage; but if the present style of editorial is to continue, we think that support will soon be withdrawn.

THE Day Star is a semi-Christiau paper published in this city, in which often appear common-sense articles. Speaking of doctors, ministers, miracles, the prayer business generally, and especially of the claim that General Grant's convalescence is due to the free use of prayer on the part of the general's friends, the Day Star observes:

"If he did anything of this kind for Ex-President Grant, why did he not do it in answer to the universal petitions sent up for the recovery of President Garfield? Why should he be deaf to the prayers of the same people in the one case and answer them by a life-sparing miracle in the other? Why, also, does he allow the ex-secretary of state, F. T. Frelinghuysen, to sink day by day and remain unconscious, in spite of numerous and earnest prayers, and permit General Grant to go out riding in Central Park these beautiful spring days? Is it just for God to permit thousands to daily pass away amid weeping friends and pious prayers for their recovery, leaving helpless widows and friendless orphans, and yet perform a miracle in violation of every law of nature, and contradictory to all reason, for the sole purpose of gratifying the friends of General Grant? If, as the Bible declares, 'God is no respecter of persons,' and to him all his creatures are equally precious, then why should we believe that Dr. Talmage and Parson Newman and the Baptist ministers were permitted to come in and reverse God's decree that General Grant should die of cancer some time since? If it was not decreed by the Almighty that he should die, then his recovery was no miracle. If it was so decreed, then the Bible is false, and God is a respecter of persons. Is it not clear enough that the talk of these men who say that General Grant's life was saved by their interference with 'God's management of the universe' is inexcusable nonsense—is it not worse than that?—indeed, what is it but irreverence and self-assumption? If they insist that the world shall believe that their prayers hav induced a miracle for this case, they must establish: 1. That the general had a cancer. 2. That it was decreed by the almighty that he must die of that disease at a certain time past, which they shall exactly fix to an instant. 3. That having that disease, and that God had decreed his death from it at a certain moment, he did not die. All of these three propositions being each established beyond question, we may then, and never before, reasonably conclude that the survival of General Grant is because of a miracle performed by the Almighty in response to the prayers of Drs. Talmage, Newman, and others. Thus far it does not appear that General Grant has now, or ever had, a cancer."

THE Rev. F. J. Fisher, of the First Methodist church, of St. Paul, Minn., is in trouble. Cause: heresy. At a "pastor's meeting," held on the evening of April 13th, Mr. Fisher read a paper on "The Use and Abuse of the Old Testament." This paper was so radical that the Pioneer Press reported the listening pastors as being "all torn up" over it. Some of his sentences are as follows:

"Thirty-nine so-called books, containing the larger part of the ancient Jewish literature, hav been translated by the church and bound together in a single volume called the Old Testament. The dates and authorship of most of the manuscripts are unknown. They cover a period of a thousand years and comprise history, legend, laws, poems, prophecies, genealogies. By the philologist and antiquary they are placed in the same class as the Vedas, Shastas, and Greek and Roman classics. The tendency to-day is to place them on the same basis. Is this tendency right, or must it be resisted as pernicious? We may define the Old Testament as the literature naturally produced and preserved of a people in whose national life God had gradually revealed his holiness and his law of human liie. The right use of this literature is the discovery of the unfolding of divine truth in the life of the people. There also are two additional uses of the Old Testament—the devotional and literary. The Old Testament is abused, first, when it is used as a text-book of morality. Neither its precepts nor examples exhibit the highest moral law. Many people still cling to the old Ten Commandments. Excruciating attempts hav been made to prove that Jesus did not supersede the moral precepts of Moses. High and lofty tumbling has been performed by the skilful theological acrobats in this arena. Their failure has been pitiable. In his Sermon on the Mount Christ distinctly put his teachings in opposition to those of the Mosaic law. The Christian morality has outgrown the precepts of the Old Testament, even the Ten Commandments. Polygamy is not only not condemned but inferentially, at least, approved in the Old Testament. If the Old Testament be taken as a statute-book of marriage law, then the Mormon apostle has the divine sanction. Laws claiming the divine sanction legalized the buying and selling of men and women. The condition of woman and the training of children presents facts painful to us. and the ethics, or rather vices, of war which assert a 'Thus saith the Lord' shock the highest moral sense of to-day. Thus there are many things that make any attempt to use the Old Testament as a text-book of morality an insult to him whose life was law and whose law is life. In the second place, the use of the Old Testament as a text-book of religion is an abuse. To treat those ancient writings as collections of aphoristic sayings of unchangeable truth indicates puerility or hypocrisy. The careless use of the Old Testament for illustration is often dangerous and delusiv. Mr. Moody cited Samson's terrible slaughter of men and beasts as an illustration of what the holy spirit can accomplish. To what strange work the Holy Spirit had come! Abraham's intended offering of Isaac, Jephthah's actual offering of his daughter, Jacob's deceit and treachery, and many other instauces of dubious morality and piety, when regarded as unequivocal divine teachings, only by logical jugglery can be given the semblance of righteousness. The further attempt to teach the great doctrin of the atonement by the crude sacrificial notions of early Judaism is not only misleading, reading into the doctrin much of bloody cruelty, but truly blasphemous, by ascribing to deity a disposition that would shame a savage parent. In the third place, it is an abuse to read the Old Testament indiscriminately. Much of its history and legends cannot be read before promiscuous audiences. We purge our editions of Shakspere for general use; there are many chapters of the Old Testament equally unfit for general reading as anything in Shakspere. Many beautiful and inspiring passages are to be found in the Old Testament by judicious selection, but the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove are necessary to such selection. It is an abuse of the Old Testament to regard its utterances in morality and religion as final and place it on an equality with the New Testament."

Mr. Eckler Sees the Point of the Cartoon.

MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Allow me to thank you for your very flattering notice of "Voltaire's Romances." The extract from the circular which you credit to me was written by our mutual friend, Mr. C. P. Farrell, the Liberal publisher of Washington, D. C., and it is his criticism of the book.

Allow me also to thank you for publishing that splendid cartoon, "The Modern Balaam," in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The artist has truly shown the people under the form of the patient ass, wearing the collar of subjection, held by the bit of faith, guided by the reins of credulity, goaded by the whip of hell, and ridden by barefaced priestcraft. But the absurd animal seems to be thinking and reasoning. He has seen before him the spirit of liberty illumined with the torch of truth, and armed with the sword of reason. He has read the glorious names inscribed on her soaring pinions: the noble TRUTH SEEKER, the grand old Investigator, that for over half a century has borne aloft untarnished the sacred flag of mental liberty, the young and energetic Iron Clad Age, the Nonconformist, the Angostic, the Liberal, Liberty; Lucifer, Banner of Light, Secular Review, London Freethinker, etc., all of them brave and brilliant names that form the wings and bear aloft the genius of liberty. Seeing before him this brilliant host, the beast of the modern Balaam turns toward his cruel tyrant a questioning look. He even dreams of justice, and begins to doubt whether the people were really "born with saddles on their backs," and the favored priesthood "booted and spurred to ride them by the grace of God." PETER ECKLER.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., April 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: "The Bible Analyzed" came some days ago. The paper, printing, and binding are lovely. Colonel Kelso knew what hardships and warfare were in the late Rebellion, having fought for freedom in no less than sixty battles. It seems now in his war on superstition, as I read from his preface, he fights in a soldier-like manner, exercising a brave soldier's self-denial. Such a book as this, written so clearly, so tersely, by such a man, ought to sell by thousands. I trust our Liberal friends will add it to their libraries.

Inclosed you will find money order for $10.00. I wish $2.00 to go to the Campaign Fund, $2.00 to Tent Fund, $1.00 to Bruno Statue, $2.00 to Brother Hacker, $1.50 for "All in a Lifetime;" the remainder will pay for placing the donations where they belong. I giv away my TRUTH SEEKERS as fast as I read them, so I hav none by me at this writing to get the addresses for these gifts, therefore you will pardon me for troubling you.

I believe THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better as it grows older, though it was hard to tell some years ago how it could be any better. Should it ever get in a hard place it can call on me to help it over with a few dollars. Hoping, however, it may flourish while my head is above the sod and long after I go to my rest, I am Yours truly,

MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

PALATKA, FLA., April 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find five dollars, to be appropriated as below directed. I look upon THE TRUTH SEEKER as the very best paper now published on the "footstool." That is to say, it is doubtless benefiting humanity more than any one of the many excellent Liberal journals now published. I should feel lost were I to miss it from my table. I hav just passed the sixtieth "mile-post" on the journey of life, and certify that it is the most liberally and fairly conducted exponent of Liberal thought that has come to my knowledge during nearly half a century, and, withal, I doubt very seriously if another journal of any ilk can boast of a greater amount of well-written, logical, and educational (education in the larger sense) editorial matter than is from week to week found within its columns. This is not intended for taffy, but penned only in testimony of what every Liberal reader of the great and grand mouthpiece of the truly Liberal ranks of America must admit; and should L. L. Northrup, Materialist's, "fear [see pp. 202-3 current vol. TRUTH SEEKER] that you will, like its former editor, finally bring up within the fold of the semi-religious society commonly called Spiritualism" some day become fully realized, then, in my humble judgment, will you hav mounted another rung higher up on the ladder of progressiv development, enlarging your mental horizon and adding much to the already almost inestimable usefulness of the journal you so ably edit.

I, like Mr. Northrup, "hav never seen any of the remarkable mediums," neither hav I any doubt but a very large per cent of what goes for spiritual phenomena is only fraud and deceit; and yet I know, even with more certainty of conviction than I know the earth is globular, that life, individualized human life, survives the grave. For, while all the evidence I hav of the rotundity of the earth comes to me second-hand, from the mathematicians and other savans, directly through my own senses I hav both seen the forms, including size, complexion, and features, and heard the voices (observing the motions of the lips meanwhile) of, and held intelligent intercourse with, friends and acquaintances whose grosser organizations I had followed to the sepulcher. Also hav I been visited by the so-called spirit (a misnomer) before I had otherwise received the slightest intimation of its dissolution.

I wish in this connection to mention a fact of which all self-styled Materialists, so far as I hav observed, are either supremely ignorant or wholly ignore it, to wit, that a very small proportion of the representativ Spiritualists (probably not more than five per cent) hold to the doctrin of the existence of "pure spirit" any more than the veteran and venerable T. Winter does. The most of them assent to all the demonstrations of science, and on doubtful matters are eminently Agnostic. (This last fact probably indicates the only real difference between them and the pronounced Materialist. He knows what is not; they only know what is—what has been shown to be.)

The intelligent and well-posted Spiritualist does not believe in *super*naturalism of any kind; nor has he any faith in the existence of either entity or phenomenon wholly independent of matter. With very few exceptions, they think as little of Yahweh as Winter and Northrup possibly can, and with most of them even Spencer's "Eternal Energy" is vague and apocryphal.

The facility with which some Liberals are able to "set up straw men" of their own creation and then demolish them is, to say the least, very remarkable, and would be amusing were it not a habit so fraught with mischief to the Liberal cause itself. They will persist, among other errors, in calling Spiritualism a "religion," and so treating it, when in fact it claims to be, and is, a system, a genuin philosophy, based wholly upon the phenomena of nature, and evolved under the scrutiny of pure science, and by scientific methods only. I speak now of what Spirtualism really is, and not of what mountebanks and unprincipled jugglers make it appear to be to many honest and earnest truth seekers.

It is my humble but most candid opinion, Mr. Editor, that gentlemen (and ladies too) of the "death ends all" school would do well before they make an attack upon "modern Spiritualism" (so-called) to learn something of it, to accurately acquaint themselvs with its real claims, and, at least moderately, look into the grounds of its pretensions, and thereby save themselvs the mortification of some day discovering they had been fighting windmills and giants having little or no existence outside their own brains. MARY A. VORE.

ATLANTA, GA., April 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The ladies of this city hav been spending their energies in getting up an entertainment for the benefit of the widows and orphans of this city, and from the first, because the young folks wanted to hav dancing, the pious, hypocritical preachers hav been violently opposed to it. I hand you a few samples of their charity. If ever the sword is beaten into the plowshare and the spear into the pruning-hook, it will hav to be done by us Infidels, for the priests of the orthodox God hav been working at it for these eighteen hundred years with fire and sword, and all they want to-day is the power and they would keep on in the same. Oh, for an Ingersoll to wake up their dry bones. GEO. W. PRICE.

COMMON SENSE AND CHRISTIANITY.

JERSEY CITY, N. J., April 13, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Trinity Church, M.E., this city, has a new sky-pilot who expatiated last evening on the theme of theological therapeutics, or prayer cure.

He said: "Christ commanded men everywhere to pray. The model prayer which Christ gave transcended human power to think. Lincoln's Gettysburg oration was much the best human speech ever made, but the Lord's Prayer was far above that. The order to pray is accompanied with the direction to use means. 'Pray and anoint with oil, and the prayer of faith shall heal the sick.' I think the man was 'cranky' who went to Memphis on a mission to the yellow fever sufferers and would not hav a physician when he took the disease. Common sense is a good thing in Christianity. I hav my doubts about those who go about the country—'faith-healers,' so-called. God sometimes curses men by his own will, as he also takes them away."

Mr. Editor, it strikes me that a little more *un*common logical consistency, which this preacher calls common sense, would be an improvement in his utterances. If, short of the so-called Lord's Prayer, the best literary production were Lincoln's oration, would its unparalleled excellence hav proven Old Abe to hav been a God or a son of a God, had there been no Lord's Prayer or any other superior production? Does the fact of pre-eminence prove preternaturalism? What real excellence is there in a person who himself declares that "God is not tempted, neither tempteth he any man" when he begs God to "lead us not into temptation?" If prayer and oil together is what the prescription of Dr. Paul calls for, why does he not giv credit to the oil as well as to the prayer when he says the prayer of faith shall heal the sick? Because men die without known ailment, and get well without known manner, is no more evidence of a supposed God's work than it is of the art of the devil or any other hobgoblin.

JOHN P. GUILD.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., April 20, 285.

MR. EDITOR: As Geo. N. Hill is very anxious to hav his "blunt and (to him) practical question concerning the rum-beverage traffic" answered, and seems to be liberal enough to accept an answer from almost anybody, I wish to giv what I consider as practical an answer as the question is blunt. His question is: "If the drunken stabbing of three innocent people upon the public street does not giv me a right to vote against the further sale of alcoholic liquor as a beverage, what would?"

Our answer is: "Nothing will ever giv you a right to meddle with other people's rights, or set yourself up as censor for other people's morals or appetites, business or pleasure, so long as they do not interfere with your rights or privileges, and then the one guilty of the offense should alone be held responsible, and not another or all others be punished on the vicarious atonement plan." As well might Mr. Hill ask: If the recent stabbing, clubbing, murdering, and numerous other crimes caused by over-religious excitement does not giv me a right to vote against the holding of revivals and preaching, what would? Or, if the disasters and deaths caused by coal mines does not giv me a right to vote against coal mining, what would? and many other equally "blunt (dull) questions," the bluntness of which is quite apparent, but where the practicability? No, Mr. Hill, the "stabbing of three or three hundred times three people" will not giv you a right to prevent the sale of alcohol more than it would the sale of knives, as neither the sellers of the alcohol or the knife are to blame; but the one that did the stabbing, and he and no other should be punished. I claim the right to eat meat, if the eating of meat does giv some one else dyspepsia; the right to hav money and horses, if some others do steal theirs; and the right to make and drink wine, if some one else does get drunk, and do not think it right to hav my rights and liberties curtailed because a few others abuse theirs.

Yours for freedom, H. H. HUTCHESON.

NEW VALLEY, N. Y., April 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: We hav looked in vain for some more able pen than mine to make favorable mention in THE TRUTH SEEKER of John R. Kelso's works, especially "The Bible Analyzed." His attack upon the idolized book of the Christians is like the storming of a fortress from every quarter at once. Its absurdities, contradictions, and unscientific teaching, under his scathing irony, keen witticisms, cutting sarcasms, and convincing logic, seem to collapse from every side. In my humble opinion, this grand work ranks among Liberal literature as does "The Origin of Species" among scientific works; and I do not think I am putting it too strongly when I consider John R. Kelso the Darwin of Secularism. His language is simple and plain, yet scholarly and dignified, so that anyone of ordinary attainments can understand and comprehend him. Each of his works is well suited to the mass of readers. It is a misfortune that each one—"Bible Analyzed," "Deity Analyzed, and The Devil's Defense," and "The Real Blasphemers"—could not be in every household; and had I the fortune of a Vanderbilt or Gould, it should be the crowning work of my life to place these grand books in the reach of every one that would read them. We hav the eloquence and reasoning of an Ingersoll to vanquish the Judge Blacks; We hav the keen debater in the person of Charles Watts, ready for every opponent; we hav the dignified lectures of Wakeman; we hav the sledge-hammer blows of John Peck to knock out of time all such mountebanks as Talmage; we hav the poetical flights of Chainey; yet it is left for Kelso to attack the citadel of superstition and the whole army of bigots, and with the pruning-knife of science and common sense cut off every root and branch of the Bohun-upas of civilization—the Christian Bible, and the false teachings of the Christian religion. I write this as a eulogy on no man, but simply to do justice to and bring prominently to the notice of all friends of Secularism these splendid books, and to induce each and every one to use his best endeavor to place these books in the hands o every one who has independence and courage enough to inve tigate the errors of his own early religious teaching and training. E. W. COUNCILMAN.

A MYSTERIOUS LETTER.

SAUVIE'S, OR., March 22, 285

MR. EDITOR: With your permission, I would like to tell Mr T. Winter and Aunt Elmina how they can convince themselvs that spirits do exist. They can do so by making the following "favorable conditions:" Stretch your arm out at full length from your body, let your thumb stick up and in line with some object like a post, tree, or man, say four or five rods from you, and look direct at your thumb and you can see two objects of the man, tree, or whatever your thumb is in line with one side. One is the exact counterpart of the other, so one must be the spirit of the object split out of it by your thumb. Next look direct at the tree, man, or whatever it is; its spirit jumps inside of it, but you can see a shadowy spirit thumb—can see clear through it; and what can it be if it is not the spirit thumb of your own spirit? Now, I want to show you how an "endless life" is possible by referring you to common objects. Take a rail, for example. Can't a rail be split out in the endless future that will hav one end (the first end) and no more. Can't you see what an easy task it would be for some "infinit being" to commence making a rope now that has a beginning, or first end, but will never hav the other end? If you can understand arithmetic you can work it out by the following example. Six thousand years ago a Jew commenced making an endless rope, and in A.D. 1885, a Christian commenced making an endless rope also. Which will have the longest rope—each rope to hav but one end? Again—you can see into it by studying geography—six thousand years ago Abel landed at the "Summer-Land," and has been advancing and progressing ever since, and in 1885 a Methodist preacher landed there also. When Abel landed there were no cars, as there now are. Won't the preacher progress or travel faster than Abel does? Now, if the Summer-Land progresses both before and behind Abel, is there not a chance for him to progress by turning about and coming back? Hav not Washington, Greeley, Alexander the Great progressed so far that they hav got back to the same place they started from? Don't you know that the farther you get away from the earth when you get to be a "spirit," the apter you are to land in somebody's box, or under the table of some one on earth you never saw, but are well acquainted with?

Get you a little box, a table, and a few slates, and take your thumbs out of your mouth and go to work as I hav directed, and if you are then not convinced, there is no show for you. "Spiritualism" must be true, because it is so plain and easy to prove. My thumb proves to me that even a little doll-baby and a brass monkey hav a spirit. THUMB MEDIUM.

SAN JOSE, CAL., April 14, 1885.

TO MY GOOD BROTHER-LIBERALS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE: I see by the tab on my last paper that I am a few days behind, but here is your money for another year's subscription, and I ought to send for a whole pile of your good pamphlets for general distribution, but just now I am "short," and must wait till I pay my $40 subscription to the League fund. I hav sent in $20 of it already; the rest will come in the course of time, and I am looking every week for names to the League fund which I know ought to be there, but they do not come in yet. I saw a rich man's name down for only $1. Well, well; that is like a stockholder taking $5 stock in the Panama Canal! If they wish to see good lecturers kept in the field, let them take for a pattern Courtlandt Palmer and Dr. Foote's subscription, and such as gave the thing a good start.

By the by, good Dr. Foote was at our house in this San Jose valley a few days ago, and we had a good time with him. Success to him on his journey back to New York. George Lynn, of Lockport, Ill., in my last TRUTH SEEKER, writes well of subscribers growling about not having everything in the paper just to suit them. The poet says:

"Or fast or slow, or bold or lame,
Lofty or low, 'tis all the same;
Too haughty or too humble.
And every editorial wight
Has naught to do but what is right.
And let the grumblers grumble."

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for a copy of the "Bible Morals." I get a copy of your valuable paper weekly, and by its influence and masterly arguments hav convinced several of my enslaved friends, who hav always looked upon the Bible as an inspired work, that it is no more than a mythical work devised by the crafty priests of former ages. May the work of liberating those poor souls who hav been drawn into the maelstrom of superstition continue successfully. I am only seventeen years of age, but I shall do all in my power to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER and to spread the flames of Freethought through the youth of the land, so that, by the time I shall hav reached manhood, I may see this country a grand republic of Freethought.

Yours, etc., B. B. SHRIEVER.

THE CHURCH HAS MISSED A GREAT OPPORTUNITY!

NEW YORK, April 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: When Garfield was shot by the saintly Guiteau, a lot of wise doctors pronounced his case very uncertain, but still left some hope that he might get well. Then the churches, as with one voice, went before the throne of God to ask for his almighty aid to make the president whole again; but he could or would not hear or do it. Anyhow, he left them in the lurch, and Garfield had to die.

Now here is ex-president Grant sick, and another group of the most renowned doctors gave him up to incurable cancer, but not a cry from any church through the land we hear, to supplicate their God's help to restore Grant to his health, or even to assuage in some degree his terrible sufferings. What is the cause of this?

Evidently they must hav lost all confidence in their God, or themselvs either, or in the doctors, and their last farce played at Garfield's sickness must hav discouraged them entirely.

Garfield died contrary to all prayers and doctors, and General Grant gets well without prayers, and in spite of doctors. What a great opportunity the churches hav lost for their glorification!

Now, how many cases do not happen where doctors giv up all hope and abandon their cases, and the patient takes refuge in any and all remedies next handy, or in prayers, and gets well, because he would get well anyhow, and then we hear how his, or somebody else's, prayers had worked a wonder.

BRONSTON, KY., April 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please continue to publish everything from every quarter that you may think worthy of a place in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let the Spiritualists prove their position true if they can. Don't muzzle Brother Winter. Brother Winter's position is a great deal more tolerable than "Wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat; because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matthew vii, 13–14).

Inclosed find twenty-five cents, for which send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1885. J. N. BROWN.

A LETTER TO MR. REYNOLDS.

AUBURN, N. Y., (Sunday) April 19, 1885.

DEAR BROTHER REYNOLDS: To day is the Christian Sabbath, so-called. You hav shown, however (in "Facts and Fallacies"), that this day is not intended by Bible authority for rest; that it is explicitly commanded us to rest, not on the first, but seventh day (Saturday). One has only to refer to the old Jewish scriptures and be convinced. It will be difficult for the Christian church to show by what authority it calls this first day of the week "holy." The Christians themselvs are the breakers in the fullest extremity, and it will be a long day, I fear, before they can extricate themselvs from the Sabbath-breaking position in which you hav placed them. I would like to see just one effort set forth to show why this day (Sunday) is God's day, so-called by Christians. Why it is more "holy" than any other day. The Christians will never learn that the Sabbath had its origin in the fact arising from a needful day of rest instead of worship, that mankind hav always required one-seventh of the time for rest, but never is it necessary for worship.

Sometime ago I promised you $1 for the Tent Fund, and as I am now "flush," I, on this day of rest, forward it to THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose columns will acknowledge it. Yours for truth, liberty, and reason, L. DE WITT GRISWOLD.

SACO, ME., April 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: You will see by glancing at your list my name as a subscriber is of only a recent date and that in my first letter it was intimated that I would take the paper on trial.

On quite a number of perhaps our best citizens, church going people and some members for thirty years or more, THE TRUTH SEEKER has had the same test as with me, and although they hav had far more education and experience in years than myself, when these papers are returned to me there is an inquiry as to how I came with them and if that was the only one I had, and on finding that I had them supplied every week, will naturally ask for the loan of another. Some of these gentlemen hav said to me that reason is, or should be, one of our best advisers, and they would hav said more about it years before only it would hav a tendency to hurt their business.

I hav a copy of "Bible Morals" in my possession, or hav had it, and now when it is returned to me it makes me think of the story I hav read somewhere about an old soldier that carried his Bible concealed in his coat over his heart, and the bullets were so thick that they at last completely destroyed the covers. "Bible Morals," in my opinion, does not cover the heart, but there are pages in it that cause a man, if he has a heart, not to try to conceal it, but use his reason rather than to exercise his superstition. C. E. SAWYER.

BARRE, MASS., April 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent, Wm. Hart, has entirely misunderstood me in your issue of April 18th. My questions had reference, as will be seen by turning to THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 14th, to an article published December 6, 1884, in which the writer suspects that "Mr. Truesdell possesses the power called mediumship, can answer unknown questions, and write upon slates," and to refute this suspicion and implication of fraud and liar, I inquired: "Mr. Truesdell says that he does the writing on the slate himself, etc. Does he? If he does he does not lie, neither is he a fraud. If he does not do it, then is he a liar and a fraud. Will his accusers show that he does not do it, by proving who does do it?"

Instead of answering my question whether Mr. Truesdell does or does not perform the tricks which he says he does, and which if proved he does not do, I will admit he is a fraud and liar, Mr. Hart substitutes a statement and another question thus: "If practicing tricks for years, and passing them off for genuin phenomena, which I believe he admits having done, does not constitute him a fraud, what would?" which amounts to inquiring whether a detectiv is a fraud and a liar when deceiving for the purpose of discovering and capturing a criminal. Now this introduces another question, viz: If Mr. Truesdell assumed the role of mediumship for years in order to discover the tricks of mediums by performing those tricks himself, and to show how far he could deceive the very elect for the purpose of exposing the frauds in Spiritualism, and when thoroughly posted attempted to expose them by publishing a book in which he givs names, dates, and places, should he be stigmatized any more as a fraud and liar than any other detectiv who plays a similar role for the same purpose? If Mr. Truesdell has been thus disguised as a detectiv all these years for this purpose only, and has, when satisfied with his discoveries, given to the world his conclusions, every Spiritualist and lover of truth should rise up and call him blessed instead of denouncing him. The question is, was it legitimate in him to employ his arts, under deception, to expose bogus mediums by witnessing their frauds and giving their names to the public. In other criminal cases detectivs are hired and paid by individuals, corporations, governments, etc., to pretend to be what they are not, sail under false colors, and bring the guilty rascals to justice. Mr. Truesdell was self-appointed, had no pay, took no fees, did his own work, and kept his own secrets until he considered the time ripe for him to disclose, so it appears.

When in the army, I became acquainted with a secret service detectiv. At one time he was stealing the Union army horses with the other thieves, running them through the lines, selling them to the rebels, and taking his share of the booty, and he informed me that, had he been caught, he would hav shared the fate of the thieves he was sent to detect and bring to justice, providing he could not hav reached his superior officer with a cipher dispatch—yes, been hanged by the very party and government he was risking his life to serve. Was he a fraud, liar, and thief when he stole horses, sold them, and pocketed the money with the rest, in order to detect them? Was this legitimate business to catch horsethieves and deceive while doing so? Is there justification in employing detectivs to lie, steal, and thus apparently becoming frauds to recover horses, ferret out burglars, and bring to justice murderers and other criminals? If so, why not to catch bogus mediums, who, under false pretenses, are swindling people out of their money under advertisments of being able to giv them information from the dead? Why, then, should Spiritualists hang Mr. Truesdell for exposing impostors within their ranks? He was a self-appointed detectiv; his tricks, his exposures, hav nothing to do with honest mediums; they need not fear any more than any honest man or woman, any other detectiv or sheriff.

Mr. Truesdell's exposures hav nothing to do with genuin phenomena; he only exposes those he has proven as frauds. This is where the great mistake has been made by Spiritualists, many of whom hav become his foes. No one need fear him but impostors, for it is as true in this instance as in any other:

"No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

ELLA E. GIBSON.

COLON, MICH., March 15, 285.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure I again address you. I received the ANNUAL and monument all safe and sound; the monument, I must say, is very nice, and a very fitting tribute to the memory of one of nature's noblemen. It shows that his friends are many and true. The ANNUAL also is full of good. Long may the hands that furnish such instruction be held up and supported, that more may be done and more may see the light. I met an old friend, J. W. Turner, of Mattison, yesterday. After a pleasant greeting he handed us a two dollar bill and said: "Will you send this to THE TRUTH SEEKER office for me? I must hav the paper, can't do without it. I will hav it while I liv if money will buy it. When this is up I will giv more. The correspondence is of great interest. One gets the views of the many, and much food for thought." With thanks for sending to him so long after the money last sent is used up, etc. There are but few outspoken Liberals here in our little town, but many that are of us. If that old block, fear of being unpopular, could be removed, much good would be done, and many would come to the front who now are led, by fear of others' opinions, to stand still.

Yours fraternally, B. B. POWERS.

BREWER, ME., April 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find one dollar, for which please send books of your own selection from those advertised in "False Claims." I would like something to assist me in argument against the Bible religion and the whole of Christian creeds. I sometimes argue on these points. I was brought up in the Christian faith, but when a boy I happened to leave this belt of commerce and trade, and for a time traveled outside of civilization, where people knew nothing of arts, education, commerce, or trade. None among them could read or write, but the priest had been there before me and taught them of Christ and his mother, and all believed that either mother or boy could forgiv all sins, if they believed the story. So all believed. And now let me say that here I found the pure, undefiled Christian, the man of God, the most devoted, pious, best Christian that I ever met.

None ever slept without first asking God to care for them while they did so. None ever went out hunting or fishing without first telling Christ or his mother to be sure and prosper their undertaking. If lucky, they thought that God helped them; if not, they said he was angry and punished them. Nevertheless, they were the best Christians I ever saw on top of this globe; at the same time as citizens they were the most degraded cursed scoundrels that ever cursed the world. They would kill you, if they could, for a tin plate or a red ribbon, and hide you in the sand, pray for forgivness, and the next day be all right and ready for heaven and Christ. That is forty years ago. But since that time I hav never believed that the Christian religion helped in any way to civilize or benefit the world. W. H. MALING.

MORRILL, KAN., April 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your paper for nearly two years, and think it is improving with age. It is all the Bible I hav or want. I keep it and other Freethought papers in my rooms, and giv back numbers to all that ask for them. Liberals are scarce here, yet we manage to hav a lecture once in a while. J. E. Remsburg, who, by the way, is an old friend and acquaintance, gave us his lecture on "Bible Morals" on the 17th inst. We had a good crowd, and John told them some things that did not seem to set very well with the Christians. But not until he was gone did they hav aught to say. Now they are anxious to discuss the question of "Bible Morals," or any other, with him, finally concluding that the divinity of the Bible should be the question. I told them to get their best representativ, name time and place, and I would get Remsburg or Jamieson to represent the Liberal cause. I shall do all I can to bring about the discussion, as many would no doubt come out to hear it that would not go to hear a Freethought lecture. But whether or not the Christians will come to the scratch remains to be seen. JAKE HOFFMAN.

PIERRE, DAK., March 2, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to learn by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you hav made the Rev. L. A. Lambert a fair offer to discuss the question. But I am afraid that Lambert will not accept your offer. But it is certainly a fair and square offer.

W. D. CURTIS, JR.

NEWARK, N. J., April 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of April 11th, I see an article on Spiritualism signed Henry Charles, saying, "I hav myself investigated Spiritualism for thirty years, and am well acquainted with nearly all the celebrated mediums from the Fox girls, and hav yet to find the medium that has ever accomplished any good for himself or anyone else." He says every one of the celebrated mediums has been caught in trickery, Foster, Slade, Davenports, Fox girls, and Eddy brothers, and goes on to say, "Why don't they tell us at once who Cleveland will appoint to his cabinet?" and such nonsense. He says he should like very much to be convinced of the truth of Spiritualism, so much so that he will giv $1,000 to any medium that will answer him three questions correctly, or will giv to any medium $500 who will move a table one inch, or produce a rap upon the table, without contact, either public or private, before a committee of six persons, three to be selected by himself and three by the medium, money payable before the medium leaves the room. Now, for him to say that all these mediums hav been caught in trickery is a falsehood of the first water, as I am acquainted with most of them and know there is not one word of truth in all he says, and it is only put in print to injure a cause that, after thirty years' investigation, he knows nothing about; and I am prepared to say that he never caught Slade, nor Fox sisters, nor Eddy brothers, in any tricks. And I am prepared to meet him any time and will prove that all he says is false, for we hav plenty of mediums here, or near by, that can move tables without contact, and write more than three words in the presence of anyone that is not evil disposed, and if I should fail it would only prove the same that Christ taught when on earth. He could not heal the sick nor do any mighty works where they would not believe. Charles is evidently one of this kind. One dozen or twenty of such unbelievers would break up the best spiritual meeting of any kind. I will meet Mr. Henry Charles at any time he givs me one week's notice. A. BRASS.

MAYNARDVILLE, TENN., April 5, 285.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to me as regular as pig-tracks, and I am always eager to get it. "It is a fault-finder," as one told me after examining a sample copy, "and, therefore, I can't take it," said he. This is the reason why I like it; it finds the fault and exposes it. Bible superstition as a religion is nothing but a bundle of faults and errors held together by church organization under the influence of the clergy. THE TRUTH SEEKER exposes all this; knocks out all their slender, rotten props, and lets their fabrics tumble. Take away the idea of fault-finding from all governments, religions of all sects, and all organized political bodies, and then think of the condition in which we to-day would find ourselvs. There can be no reform in any nation, in any organized body of any sect, except we find fault and expose it.

T. H. BUTCHER.

KEOTA, IOWA, March 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Do we want a free paper? Yes, sir! Yes, sir! we do, and you are the one best qualified to sail between all these rocks, and keep the good TRUTH SEEKER afloat. It is natural, however, that ever reader would like to see you dwell on the same rock with him, but as long as all may throw in a shovel or two of coal none should complain.

I stand in line with E. C. Walker and Bell on prohibition, and with Wettstein and Winter on the eternal question, but read with much interest contributions by all sides, such as E. A Chapman, the Spiritist, gave us in former years, full of thought.

All visions between Damascus and Cassadaga, between Paul I.'s casket of unclean animals and Paul II., Lilly Dove, with heavenly lights surrounding, prove that their irritated brains are overworked, and need rest.

I did read the R-P Journal and Light for Thinkers on three months' trials, but could not continue. A variety of diet, physical and mental, is wholesome, and healthy, and preferable to any one-sided paper. H. Heine said: "One of the devil's latest inventions, surpassing all former cruel torments, is this, one of the sinners has to read, and all others to listen to, every silly sermon that has been preached on this earth." Think of this, truth seekers, and be thankful to our editor.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Farmer's Three Boys,

AND HOW THEY TURNED OUT.

"'Tis plain to me," said the farmer's wife,
"These boys will make their marks in life!
They never were made to handle a hoe,
And at once to college ought to go;
Yes, John and Henry, 'tis clear to me,
Great men in this world are sure to be;
But Tom, he's little above a fool;
So John and Henry must go to school."

"Now, really, wife," quoth Farmer Brown,
As he set his mug of cider down,
"Tom does more work in a day, for me,
Than both of his brothers do in three.
Book learning will never plant beans or corn,
Nor hoe potatoes—sure as you're born—
Nor mend a rood of broken fence;
For my part, giv me common sense."

But his wife the roost was bound to rule,
And so "the boys" were sent to school,
While Tom, of course, was left behind,
For his mother said he had no mind.

Five years at school the students spent,
Then each one into business went;
John learned to play the flute and fiddle,
And parted his hair (of course) in the middle,
Though his brother looked rather higher than he,
And hung out his shingle—"H. Brown, M.D."
Meanwhile, at home, their brother Tom
Had taken a "notion" into his head,
Though he said not a word, but trimmed his trees,
And hoed his corn and sowed his peas;
But somehow, either by hook or by crook,
He managed to read full many a book.

Well, the war broke out; and "Captain Tom"
To battle a hundred soldiers led;
And when the rebel flag went down
Came marching home as "General Brown."
But he went to work on the farm again,
Planted his corn and sowed his grain,
Repaired the house and broken fence,
And people said he had common sense.

Now, common sense was rather rare,
And the state house needed a portion there,
So our "family dunce" moved into town,
And people called him "Governor Brown."
And his brothers that went to the city school
Came home to liv with mother's fool!

A Box of Flowers—

WHERE THEY WENT AND WHAT THEY DID.

A large number of people from several cities and towns met in convention. The last day of the meetings, a collation was served in a lower room, in which were fifteen long tables, and each table was adorned with a beautiful bouquet. One of the largest bouquets was contributed by a lovely and intelligent lady whose father is owner of a conservatory. The one who solicited these flowers did not expect to receive so many as came in the box, and would hav been thankful for a much smaller number.

Hence she was very much surprised, as well as delighted, at the abundance of rare and elegant blossoms, roses, large and fragrant, geraniums whose scarlet hues and scented leaves filled the room with beauty, brightness, and perfume, fuchsias in graceful, drooping clusters and crimson plumes fit to adorn the cap of some noble knight of olden legend lore, besides many other buds and sprays of blossoms that seemed like fairies straying from some elfin home to foretell the sunny hours that soon will make the earth a lovely summer garden.

The flowers when properly arranged made the handsomest bouquet in the room, and excited much comment, and, possibly, a little envy. Everybody present admired the flowers, and one visitor from abroad said, "The richness and luxuriance of these flowers remind me of the sunny South—their beauty is almost tropical!"

After the collation was over the flowers still drew many admiring glances, and the eyes continued to be feasted by their presence.

Presently a lady timidly approached and, in a low tone, said, "I hav a sick friend—a flower would brighten up her room amazingly. Won't you giv me one flower for my friend?"

"Certainly, I will," instantly responded the one who presided at the table, and she gave, not only one, but several bright buds, and leaves of the scented geranium.

By and by, another lady lingered, and looked longingly at the bouquet, then sighed and was passing on, when she was recalled. "Would you like a flower? You looked at them so tenderly."

"Oh, I would, indeed," she replied. "My mother is an invalid these many years; she can never be well again, and she loves flowers." So she was made glad by a nosegay, and went away smiling and happy.

"Won't you please giv me a rose for my babies?" and a fond mother paused and blushed, as if she half expected to be refused.

"Of course I will," was the answer. "How many babies are there at home?"

"Only two."

"Well, here are two handsome buds. Put them in water, and they will unfold tomorrow. They are pure and sweet like the babies," and the mother smiled her thanks as she received the buds.

The remainder of the flowers were then gathered up and taken away. News came to the one who held them of the death of an aged woman whom she had known a long time. She had died, like so many others, poor, old, and uncared-for. "No one will think to lay a flower upon her breast," said the one who possessed the flowers. So she took some of the fairest and freshest of the flowers, put them in a little box, and went to the house where the aged woman lay in the stillness of death, plainly robed, and lying in a hard, plain casket unsoftened by drapery or flower, waiting burial. The little orphan granddaughter, herself an invalid, clasped her little hands with joy at sight of the flowers.

"I am so glad you brought flowers!" she whispered. "My grandma thought flowers were so pretty. She used always to bring me one when they bloomed. I wanted to get some for her to-day, but there are none in bloom yet, only the pussy willows. If the daisies had only come, I would get daisies for her; and blue violets, too—they grow in the fields, you know. But these are so beautiful, and just the same as rich people hav! And did you really bring these for my poor dead grandma! Poor grandma! she would be so pleased! and she would thank you so much! But she can't speak now! Poor grandma!" and the little lips trembled, while the tears gathered in her eyes.

The lady soothed and comforted the little one, as she placed white rosebuds, and a green leaf or two, at the neck of the dead grandmother.

"Won't you put a white rose in grandma's hand?" pleaded the little one. "She used to bring me the first rose she found."

So the white rose was placed in the lifeless fingers, and the other flowers arranged in vases seemed to smile upon the little mourner, and point to brighter hours.

Still there were blossoms left from that wonderful box of flowers. And some were arranged in a little vase that had belonged to a dear child, whose sweet face grew suddenly gray and grave with the chill that closed her dear eyes forever nearly one year ago this time of the year, and buds were placed beneath her picture. Then her mamma took the slips of scented geranium and put them in pots to grow, so, by and by, there will be some new plants and blooms from these old ones to make more beauty and adornment in garden and home.

"And were these the last of the flowers?" you inquire.

Not quite. There were still some clusters of scarlet and crimson geraniums, plenty of green leaves, and a few little bell-like flowers left. Some of these, with the leaves that were cut from the geranium-slips, were placed by loving hands upon a child's grave in Oak Grove Cemetery, and the remainder, a few tea-rose buds that in water hav bloomed into roses, and hav kept fresh by care, are now before me, although it is more than a week since they were cut from the parent stem. They cheer me by their fragrance and convey many lessons of love, purity, and contentment.

Now, do you not think that box of blossoms bore many blessings in it? How they brought smiles and gladness into the eyes of the weary sufferers languishing on beds of pain! How they brightened the sick-room and perfumed the air with sweetness! How they whispered of warm sunshine and balmy skies! How the little children laughed and chattered their baby-talk when they saw the lovely buds with the delicate petals just opening to the light of day! And how pleased was the little bereaved granddaughter to hav the flowers put inside the casket that contained all that remained of her best and dearest friend! She will always think of her dear grandmother asleep with roses in her hand and sweet buds on her breast. And the sweet child who went away in the springtime of her life, ere she had known the trials and sorrows of life, has her memory shrined in roses and evergreen, and livs daily and hourly in the hearts of those who will love her to the end of time. The flowers in the vase beneath her portrait and that lie on her grave to-night but speak of her loveliness and purity, for she was herself a fair flower of our human kind.

The sweet-faced woman who so willingly gave the flowers from her father's conservatory little thought how far their influence would extend, nor how many hearts they would cheer and help. Just in this way does the influence of act and word reach out and on. How careful, then, should we all be that thought, act, and word be as sweet and fragrant as the flowers.

"There is a tongue in every leaf,
A voice in every rill—
A voice that speaketh everywhere—
In flood and fire, through earth and air,
A tongue that is never still."

And so we are all talking by our acts, our thoughts, and the expression of our faces, even when we utter no word, and our influence is always being felt in one way or another.

"Our acts our angels are, if good; if ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still."

We should endeavor to hav them always good and true, in order that they may bless others as well as ourselvs, for

"Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

Who does not know how a smiling face brightens and beautifies a whole household?—how a loving word gladdens everyone that hears it?—how a warm clasp of the hand carries strength and courage with it? We may think, sometimes, such little dots as we hav only slight weight in this world, where there is so much pushing, jostling, and striving for place and preferment, but the slightest and smallest child has influence untold. Nothing is truer than that we cannot liv to ourselvs alone.

"'Not to myself alone,'
The little flower transported cries,
'Not to myself alone I bud and bloom;
With fragrant breath the breezes I perfume,
And gladden all things with my rainbow dyes.'"

And since we can no more liv to ourselvs alone than can the flowers, let us try to liv nobly and well, that the influence radiating from us may be as sweet aud generous as the fragrance of the flowers, and as wide-reaching.

Rapatap.

Two little Moody boys with two little drums.
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.
To hav seen them you'd thought they were General Tom Thumbs,
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.
Then the music, how charming, from such little toys,
In the hands of such brave and athletic boys!
Their music consists in making a noise.
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.

Oh, the drums, the drums, the little snare-drums,
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.
Stand by to be ready when the little band comes,
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.
They march here and there, and all round the square,
They march across lots, and make music so rare,
Oh, what shall be done for the musical pair
Of rapataps, rapatap, tap?

"To the fields we'll hie, and the drumsticks shall fly
To the tune of rapatap, tap.
And all other bands we will knock sky-high,
Rapatap, rapatap, tap."
So they marched all day and were greatly admired,
But then the little Rapataps 'gan to grow tired,
And to march any longer they couldn't be hired,
Rapatap, rapatap, tap.

Must, letter by letter, my answer spell.

2.—INVOLVED REBUS.

A happy family were they,
I knew them passing well,
They camped beside a sparkling brook
Within a quiet dell.
They had no wish for worldly gain,
They cared not for its strife,
They wanted nothing on this earth,
They led a happy life.
Above their door a letter stood,
It might hav meant a hundred,
What they had it painted for
Us tourists often wondered.
I asked them one day what it meant,
This symbol, so conspicuous,
The answer was so simple,
It really was ridiculous.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER, APRIL 25, 1885.

1. Massachusetts. 2. United States.

Correspondence.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Will you pardon an old, old lady, nearing her fourscore years, for contributing an idea to your Children's Corner, with which she is well pleased, by saying that I was delighted hearing one of my grandchildren reading "Going Strawberrying," when I noticed the puzzled expression on the face of little Willie, eight years old, as he burst out with: "Why, grandma, you and grandpa don't eat so—with such a noise." "No, my child," I replied, "but many other people do—and very good people, too. Lida is just right, Willie; and I am glad Miss Wixon published her letter in the Children's Corner, for you all to read."

But, Miss Wixon, lest other children get a false impression, as did my little grandson, and a prejudice against the aged, I want to say to them that all old people were once young like themselvs, and full of play, fun, hope, and vigor, and that their lives hav been spent in caring for their children, grandchildren, and others, and when they grow old and feeble, and can no longer care for others, or even for themselvs, that those younger, whom they hav toiled for and hav instructed, should be kind to them and wait on them in return, and should never despise and insult them by calling them "old man," or "old woman," or "old granny," or in any other way ridicule or ill-treat them, for it is very wrong and improper. They should be respected and honored, and their faults and old-fashioned ways pardoned and overlooked, for you can learn much from your elders and superiors, if you will but listen and take heed to their advice, for they hav been young and hav experienced during a long life what you you are ignorant of and must learn. But remember above all, dear children, that if you liv you, too, will be old and infirm, and hav to be taken care of, even as are the aged and feeble that you see around you

GRANDMA CRAGGIN

DUNKIRK, N. Y., April 25, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Please accept my hearty congratulations for your success in so well conducting the Children's Corner. The fact that the little ones should not be neglected is doubly impressiv when we realize that in them we hav our future women and men.

I conceive that you in your work hav commenced nearer the base of the future reformation of society than anyone has yet done. Our best and smartest women and men of the present hav spent the better part of their lives in outgrowing the superstitious teachings of childhood, and now, when the pleasures of mental freedom hav dawned upon them, they must step into the grave.

Your Liberal teachings will save for your present little readers this needless loss of time, and will help them to begin life with a free mind, one without the taint of superstition to spoil their future pleasure and usefulness. To my mind there seems but one step more to insure a more perfect reformation of society, and that is to properly educate the girls, the mothers of the future generation.

This done, children will be born Liberals and born temperate; then there will be no necessity for fighting superstition nor voting for Prohibition.

Wishing you unbounded success in your good and useful work, I remain

Yours very truly, ROSE E. PHILLIPS.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Like "Silly Lida" (and not so very silly, either), I, too, hav my grievances, but unlike hers, mine do not especially arise from bad habits in the grandfathers and grandmothers, but from my young friends. And if you please, I will state some of them as briefly as possible, which will giv you a sample of what I hav to contend with.

I am fifteen years old, attend high school, and hope soon to graduate. Therefore I am striving to perfect myself not only in every branch of my studies, but in manners also, hence endeavor to use correct language in writing and speaking, invariably, as I hav learned that habit becomes second nature, and that I must never permit myself to depart, knowingly, from strict grammatical rules, misplace or mispronounce words, unless I am willing to be considered by scholars and critics as ignorant, careless, or foolish.

I do not include here "slang phrases," which no lady, miss, or well-educated boy will ever use, but such gross inaccuracies as I hear every day from my schoolmates, young people generally, and adults even, those whose education, social position, and profession should elevate them far above such flagrant transgressions of the king's English as I will point out to you; and if you discover any errors in my composition please specify them, for I shall always be a learner.

But to my grievances. My ears are constantly assailed with such expressions as: "I aint-er gont-er," for "I am not going to." "I haint got none," for "I havn't any." "Taint nuther," for "It isn't neither" "I'd druther not," for "I had rather not." "I wont touch-ter," for "I will not touch it." "Less go," for "let us go." "I haint-er min-ter," for "I havn't a mind to." "I see," for "I saw." "Come," for "came." "Sot" and "set," for "sat" and "sit." "Jes-so," for "just so." "Great big apple." "Sunthin,' for "something," etc.

Now, Miss Wixon, I could fill the whole Children's Corner with similar offensiv errors, perhaps, every week, but hav I not given sufficient to call the attention of your readers to the subject, who will surely desire to improve and overcome any bad habit they may hav fallen into, lest in maturer years they find it impossible to change, and when they might otherwise be sweet and affable parents and grandparents, they disgust and repel by their uncouth manners, inelegant conversation, and gross habits incurred in youth, which might hav been easily avoided or corrected by taking pains as Lida suggests, and proposes for us all to practice. GEORGIE M——.

CLEOPATRA Mo., April 17, 285.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My parents take THE TRUTH SEEKER and we think it is a very nice paper. I read the Children's Corner and see many nice letters from the girls and boys, so I thought I would write. I never did write any for a paper before, so I cannot write a very good letter. I am a little girl twelve years of age. I hav two sisters, one younger and one older than myself. Pa got us "The Darwins" and "John's Way" for us to read, and we think they are so nice. We got the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1885, and I saw your picture in it; you looked so nice with your hair shingled that I had my hair shingled. Well, I will close, hoping you will hav room in the Corner for my letter.

Your friend, FANNIE F. DAY.

Saturday, April 18, 1885

DEAR MISS WIXON: My mamma says you wish me to write a letter for your Children's Corner. I can't write very good, as I hav just begun to learn. I go to school, study spelling, reading, and writing. I hav a lovely teacher; she is so kind, we all love her, and try to learn and please her. I hav a sick mamma—she has been sick for a long time. I wish she could get well. But she is so kind, and tries to make us happy. Mamma's room is the pleasantest in the house.

I hav one sister and two brothers; hav a pet canary that will sit on my finger and sing, eat from my mouth, scolds me, and is, oh, so sweet and cunning! Hav a pet rabbit, too. I love flowers. My grandma has a conservatory full of lovely flowers, and sends my sick mamma some. She loves them, and says they teach her lessons of patience.

I am eight years old, and am going to study and learn as fast as I can, so as to be a help to my mamma.

Good-by from CORA.

Thomas Paine.

The mighty debt this world owes Thomas Paine
Has grown no less, though church and state disdain
Officially to pay it—sore afraid
Mankind might thus learn how it was betrayed
And outraged by the wickedness of those
Son's of perdition, liberty's worst foes—

Priests, princes, presidents, and kindred knaves
Around the world, whose dupes are always slaves;
Inspired by malice, quick to stab or stain.
Now where are they? Their crimes are all in vain;
Enlightened freedom honors Thomas Paine.

A Useful and Interesting Book.

During one of my recent tours I sought to destroy the monotony of the long railway journeys by reading Mr. S. P. Putnam's new novel, "Waifs and Wanderings." As a rule, I hav neither time nor inclination for much novel reading, but having heard so much from different sources in praise of Mr. Putnam's latest effort, I was induced to read it for myself. Having commenced the little volume I became so thoroughly interested in its varied and graphic contents that I read the whole with eagerness and delight. The plot is clever in design, and for the most part masterly in its working out. Two or three of the chapters are really grand, and I fully indorse the opinion of Colonel Ingersoll, who told me that he considered some parts of the book more worthy of Charles Dickens himself. The object of the story is to show that humanity is essentially good under all conditions, and that creeds and dogmas are no real help to kindly feelings and generous actions. Cupples, one of the heroes of the book, is a man in a humble situation of life, given to drink rather freely and to swearing too frequently. He finds a strange infant thrust upon his care much against his will, and he tries to get rid of it, but is unable to discover anyone to take charge of the little stranger. Various characters—many of them original in conception—are introduced in his endeavors to obtain a home for the waif. Mr. Putnam has here availed himself of a good opportunity to delineate the hypocrisies of the church and many of its pious members. Cupples is compelled to keep the baby, and ultimately he learns to love it as his own.

After a while the child is lost, and then the reader is introduced to many thrilling adventures, and devotion and heroism of character, in the endeavor to find the lost one. The story runs through the Civil War, and is of a most exciting nature, with its accounts of romantic incidents, narrow escapes, and charming love scenes. Some of the pictures of human nature are exceedingly accurate, showing that Mr. Putnam has studied mankind very closely. In my opinion the earlier chapters are superior to the later; still, with this trifling drawback, an unflagging interest is kept up to the close, and noble lessons of liberty, justice, love, and heroism are inculcated throughout. Persons who desire to see these virtues couched in choice language, and presented in a lofty and charming manner, should read "Waifs and Wanderings." CHARLES WATTS.

"All in a Lifetime."

(Extract from a letter to the Author)

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: If I am a competent judge of fictional literature—and I hav read tons of it—you may safely rest your reputation as an author on "All in a Lifetime." You surprise me with your vivid delineation of intense human passions. Is it possible that this is the result of cool, calculating art? Or did the irresistible current of an inspired fancy drive you out upon the wild, tempestuous ocean of human life? Did you really weep in sympathy with poor Regina and Donald Stewart? How could you help dispatching that villain Kaslar at his first appearance? And how could you let Falsun liv till the very last chapter? The answer must be that you were but the helpless spectator of life's panorama as it passed before you. It is a thrilling story, and the interest increases from the beginning to the close.

The view of Somerset and Mount Hope Bay from Kissen Bridge, beneath an autumn sunset (two pictures in one), are so well presented in less than a quarter page that, although I generally skip the stereotyped landscapes that are so often borrowed from guide-books and other works, yet here upon Kissen Bridge I stood and drank in the ripe, mellow glory of the scene, and for the first time wished for more scenery. If you had not given me this pleasant glimpse from Kissen Bridge, I might hav thought it a grand merit that you were free from landscapes. But with this very delightful little sketch, my appetite was whetted for more.

Your book furnishes more plain instruction in Constructiv Liberalism than most works of the same size devoted exclusivly to the subject. It will answer the question, "What will you giv me in the place of Christianity?" more to the satisfaction of the average inquirer than any work I ever saw. Your ghost is as near an approach to one as you can probably find in fact; but old Peter and the whole Commikle outfit are more interesting than any ghost could be. Mrs. Nancy did well to keep Christopher "under her thumb." In that court scene, when he was asked about those letters—if he could produce them—and replied, "Wall, I dunno' 'bout that; I—I rather guess I lost them 'ere letters!" and when Mrs. Nancy arose in her seat, and, pointing her umbrella at him, exclaimed, "Christopher!" I smiled. At his startled look and hung head my smile became audible; but when she continued, still pointing at him, in her emphatic, commanding tone, as if she knew both the master and the man, "Christopher! feel in the right-hand pocket of your coat," as he obeyed her I snorted right in court, at the risk of having a fine imposed by "his honor" for "contempt." I wish everybody and his wife and children, too, would read "All in a Lifetime." Yours sincerely,

J. K. P. BAKER.

P. S.—I am glad to notice that your book is stereotyped, for I predict it will "wear,' and I suppose that, being stereotyped, we can depend upon any future demand being supplied. J. K. P. B.

Stray Scraps.

"The Freedom of Worship bill reappears in the New York legislature this year for the seventh time."

I hope it will reappear the seventy-seventh time before it will pass. [See TRUTH SEEKER, March 21st.]

Dr. Howard Crosby made the statement in Boston a few years ago, that he could not call that poison which Christ blessed. Would it make poison innocuous, because Christ blessed it? To be consistent, no Christian should prohibit the sale or use of an article that his divine Lord and master not only blessed and drank, but actually manufactured (?) at a wedding carnival for the use of the company, drunkards included.

"Here is a pretty conceit of a child, noted by an exchange: 'What does God send the snow for?' asked one little girl of another. 'Why, the snow flakes are the umbrellas he covers his flowers with,' was the answer."

"Pretty conceit," we should think! What had those parents and teachers, who had instructed the poor child in such nonsense and falsity, to do but to correct it? Instead, they parade it in print as if something smart.

And here is another, much more sensible than the former, for, really, there is not as much difference between baptism and vaccination as might at first be supposed:

"A Sunday-school teacher asked a little girl of her class if she had been baptized. 'Yes,' said the little girl, 'two times.' 'Two times! Why, how could that be?' exclaimed the teacher. 'It didn't take the first time,' said the little girl.—The Independent."

"A bright wife whose husband had contracted a club fever hit upon a brilliant scheme recently. She procured a partly-worn gentleman's glove and left it on the parlor sofa when she retired, after sitting up until 12 o'clock for her derelict lord. He does not go out in the evenings now."

This plan will not work a second time with the same husband, nor yet with this wife's husband who reads this, therefore, a "partly-worn" boot, hat, overcoat, or some other relic of masculin wearing apparel will hav to be substituted. Wives, take note, for husbands will henceforth be on the alert.

"An Anti-Deist society has just been formed in Paris, the object of which is to combat religious dogmas of every description. Members are bound to labor to suppress the word God and all its equivalents in all languages, and are pledged never to use it in conversation or correspondence."

Good! I wish a similar society could be formed in this country. We need new names, terms, and phrases wherewith to express our Agnostic, Deistical, Atheistical, or even Liberal views, and giv theology and Christianity the go-by. Who will set the ball rolling?

"THE PRINCE OF WALES ON GENUIN FREEMASONRY.—London, Feb. 17th: The troubles between the English Freemasons and the grand orient of France continue. The Prince of Wales, replying to a recent letter of the French grand master, says: 'English Masons hav always held to the belief that God is the first and great landmark of genuin Freemasonry. Without such belief nobody can rightly claim to inherit the traditions of true Freemasonry.' It is expected that the grand orient will convene a meeting in London in order to explain the attitude of the Orient, which intended to allow the fullest liberty of conscience."

Liberal and Infidel Masons, is this true? If so, when the great inevitable struggle approaches between Christianity and liberty of conscience, speech, and action, or national Secularism in its entirety, where will you be found? Even a Good Templar must bow his head to the sacred shibboleth of God's word before he can be initiated. Come ye out from among them, and touch not the unclean thing of Bible authority or theology.

Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells spoke on the "Relations of the Minister to the Sunday-school." at the monthly meeting of the Unitarian Sunday-school Union, in Boston, March 16th. She said: "The minister has a great desire to make them [children] God's children, . . even if at variance with those taught at home, or by the teacher. . . In the highest relation of the minister to the school, he should be the ordained mediator between the child and God." Come, Liberals, now send your children to Sunday-school to be taught doctrins at variance with yours, with the pastor or superintendent a mediator between the child and God, with yourself thrust out just nowhere, for that is the way "to make them God's children." Do you want them thus made God's children?

"A French traveler who has just returned from Terra del Fuego says the Fuegians are the lowest human beings in the scale of existence. They hav no word for any number above three; they are unable to distinguish one color from another; they hav no religion and no funeral rites, and they possess neither chiefs nor slaves. Their only weapons are bone-pointed spears; they grow neither fruit nor vegetables, and, as their country is naturally barren, they are obliged to liv entirely on animal food. But they are not cannibals; they ill-treat neither their women nor their old people, and they are monogamous."

Now, Christians, send on your missionaries with your woman-degrading, polygamous God, Bible, and religion, and convert these heathen to a Christianity of which you boast to your own disgrace.

"A nativ paper of Japan has advanced the proposition that the nation should become nominally Christian, regarding it as a stroke of policy to enter the number of Christian nations, at least in name. This is a new idea, or rather a very old one, recalling the time when tribes were baptized at once."

Behold the fulfilment of prophecy—"a nation shall be born in a day!" Is not this a nice way to increase numerical Christianity in Japan, or any other country? Whole nations turn at once when an Emperor Constantine is converted, all his subjects following suit, or being reckoned Christians, as all the employees in a boot shop vote as does their master on election day, or else are turned out in the cold. All who will not embrace Christianity are thus whipped into the traces, as Jesus commanded, "Compel them to come in." And so Christianity is regarded as politic already in Japan! Liberals, are you asleep or awake? and do you realize what is being done in in the proselytizing of whole nations from an honest belief to to the most absurd, tyrannous, cruel, false, and demoralizing religion on the face of the globe?

EVANGELICAL MINISTERS.—On Monday, March 9th, at the regular meeting of the Evangelical Ministers' Association in Wesleyan Hall, Bos-Boston, Rev. V. A. Lewis, of the Columbus Avenue Presbyterian church, for the Special Committee on Indecent Pictures on Bill Boards, reported that there is sufficient law to meet this evil, and that the society for the Suppression of Vice and other like organizations be requested to move and be supported in moving against it. Mr. Lewis said that in this city there is civilized degradation. In proof of this he cited the criticisms which the erection of the Cogswell fountain evoked, asserting that this came not from true artistic feeling, but because the fountain has a temperance element behind it. He declared that the posters on the walls opposite the Providence Railroad station are fit "wall-paper for hell," and that pictures of ballet dancers shown in the windows of the piano warerooms are of such character that he would sooner bury his children in the years of their innocency than hav them exposed to the contamination of such vileness. In fact he is of the opinion that Boston in this way is Sodom and Gomorrah, and that unless something radical be done this city will meet with the fate of the cities of the plain. He would hav the bill-posters and the piano manufacturers proceeded against if they do not heed a suitable warning, and put in state prison. Mr. Lewis's words were warmly applauded. The report of his committee, with its recommendation, was adopted, and Rev. J. L. Withrow, D.D, was selected to represent the Alliance before the Legislativ Judiciary Committee, to urge upon its attention, in connection with the Grand Army lottery question (so-called), this special subject, if perchance the laws relating to it require modification. The committee was continued, and instructed to call the attention of the mayor to the subject. And yet all these reverends believe in the divinity of the obscene old sacred Bible, and at this very meeting Prof. H. C. Sheldon, of Boston University, read a paper on "John Wycliffe and the English Bible." "Wall-paper for hell!" "Sodom and Gomorrah!" Please illustrate some of the Bible scenes, in which, it is assumed, God took a part, and see if the bulletin boards are not moral by their side! While we do not believe in indecent posters, literature, etc., we would beg these clergymen to purify their Bible and their lives before they make war on ballet dancer pictures, posters, etc. "Would sooner bury his children in their innocency than hav them exposed to the contamination of such vileness?" Would not many a parent echo "ditto" rather than hav their children exposed to Bible, and Christian, and ministerial vileness, did they fully realize the extent of this influence? ELLA E. GIBSON.

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

The Missing Link —IN— MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Let There Be Light!

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

SIGNIFICANT. NEAT AND BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIV.

FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

DESCRIPTION:

The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3.00, $3.50, $4.00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt. OTTO WETTSTEIN,

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

A HEATHEN desiring to learn the doctrins of Christianity might attend the best of our churches for a whole year and not hear one word of the torments of hell or the anger of an offended deity, and not enough of the fall of man or the sacrificial sufferings of Christ to offend the most bigoted disciple of evolution. Listening and observing for himself, he would infer that the way of salvation consisted in declaring his faith in a few abstract doctrins which both preacher and hearer seemed quite ready to explain away as far as possible; become a regular attendant at church and church sociables; put something into the contribution-box every Sunday, and, in every way, behave as much as possible like his neighbors. Why is this? Simply because the demand for doctrinal preaching is dying out. The law of supply and demand in our time controls sermons as well as flour, doctrins as well as dry-goods. Men hav ceased to demand doctrins, not necessarily because they hav ceased to believe in them, but because they hav taken the first step toward unbelief by losing their interest in them. Their faith is dragging its anchors without their knowing it.—The Religion of To-Day, North American Review, Dec., 1879.

MEN of great and stirring powers who are destined to mold the age in which they are born must first mold themselvs upon it.—S. T. Coleridge.

GIVEN your man of genius—your Shakspere or Dante—we can dimly see how he was created by the conditions of the time. He is great in virtue of his capacity for gathering into one focus and uttering in articulate language the thoughts and emotions indistinctly fermenting in the minds of innumerable contemporaries. Yet no one can predict the appearance of a man of genius, or show deductivly that a Shakspere must hav arisen in the time of Elizabeth. The founder of a religion belongs to an order still more exalted than that of poets, philosophers, or statesmen. When he has solved the problem, the answer is simple enough. Till he has solved it, we are still blindly groping in the dark, conscious of a want, but totally unable to giv it distinct utterance or to predict what will satisfy it.—Leslie Stephen.

O YE who pined in dungeons for the sake
Of truths which tyrants shadowed with their hate;
Whose only crime was that ye were awake
Too soon, or that your brothers slept too late;
Mountainous minds!—upon whose tops the great
Sunrise of knowledge came, long ere its glance
Fell on the foggy swamps of fear and ignorance—

The time shall come when from your hights serene
Beyond the dark, ye will look back and smile
To see the steril earth all growing green,
When science, art, and love repeat heaven's style
In crowded city and in desert isle,
Till Eden blooms where martyr-fires hav burned,
And to the lord of life all hearts and minds are turned. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

LOCKE was opposed to the dogmas of Puritans and Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Catholics alike. Let each man, he said, do his utmost try to liv up to the ideal of a Christian life as set forth in the Bible, and let no man dare to force upon another his own notions as to what even the Bible teaches.—Browne's Life of Locke.

I BELONG to the republic of intellectual liberty, and only those are good citizens of that republic who depend upon reason and persuasion; and only those are traitors who resort to brute force. Now, I beg of you to forget, just for a few moments, that you are Methodists, or Baptists, or Catholics, or Presbyterians, and let us, for an hour or two, remember only that we are men and women.—Ingersoll's What Must We Do to be Saved?

I THINK that in life not to be cheerful is to blaspheme against God.—Mumford.

IT is now becoming a religious duty to enjoy life. A man ought to be ashamed to say, in the face of nature, that "life protracted is protracted woe." I venture to say that, nine times out of ten, the man that declares life to be only "vanity and vexation of spirit" would not be the man to start a subscription to buy the winter's coal for a poor widow. The world is finding out that the people who call life so hard and undesirable are the ones that make it hard and undesirable for others. We do not take a man for a saint because he reads the Bible, nor for a sinner because he does not read the Bible. We no longer weigh men in the scales of orthodox piety.—L. K. Washburn.

IT is the nature of extreme self-lovers as they will set a house on fire an it were but to roast their eggs. —Bacon's Essays.

EVEN doves hav their little differences of opinion, as anyone who has kept a wedded pair of them in a wicker cage can safely avouch.—Rhoda Broughton.

A YOUNG man named Joshua, or Jesus, a carpenter by trade, believed that the world belonged to the devil, and that God would shortly take it from him, and that he, the Christ or the Anointed, would be appointed by God to judge the souls of men and to reign over them on earth. In politics he was a leveler and Communist; in morals he was a monk. He believed that only the poor and the despised would inherit the kingdom of God. All men who had riches or reputations would follow their dethroned master into everlasting pain. He attacked the church-going, Sabbatarian, ever-praying Pharisees; he declared that piety was worthless if it were praised on earth. It was his belief that earthly happiness was a gift from Satan, and should therefore be refused. If a man were poor in this world, that was good; he would be rich in the world to come. If he were miserable and despised, he had reason to rejoice; he was out of favor with the ruler of this world, namely, Satan, and therefore he would be favored by the new dynasty.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

As for our mis-education, make not bad worse; waste not the time yet ours in trampling on thistles because they hav yielded us no fruit. Here are books and we hav brains to read them; here is a whole earth and a whole heaven and we hav eyes to look on them.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Why did the children of Israel sprinkle blood on the door posts?" Pupil: "Please mum they wanted to paint the town red."

A MODERN novel has the following passage: "With one hand he held the beautiful golden head above the chilling wave, and with the other called loudly for assistance."

A BAPTIST minister was once asked how it was that he consented to the marriage of his daughter to a Presbyterian. "Well, my dear friend," he replied, "as far as I hav been able to discover, Cupid never studied theology."

MR. MONOPOLE (anti-collegiate): "So your father is going to make a doctor of you?" Divinity freshman (facetiously): "Oh, yes. A D.D.; doctor of souls, don't you know." Mr. M.: "Oh! they call 'em chiropodists, don't they?"

I THOUGHT you said the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage was such a great preacher," said a visitor to Brooklyn. "I heard him yesterday, and cannot agree with you." "My dear sir, Talmage is the finest pulpit orator in America. You ought to hear him preach when he isn't wearing new boots." "Why so?" "Because new boots hurt his corns so badly that he cannot gesticulate with his legs."

"MR. MOODY says that if a person prays while roller-skating he is all right," said a little Brooklyn girl to her mother. "Well, my child, did you ever hear anybody pray while at the rink?" "Oh, yes! Papa did last night when he sat down so hard that the gas went out." "What did he say?" "He said, 'Merciful heavens!' and lots of other things, just like a minister does when he pounds the pulpit."

SUBSCRIPTION agent: "I would like to get you to subscribe for our handsomely-bound, elegantly-printed, profusely-illustrated edition of the revised Old Testament, just—" Chicago man: "We've got an Old Testament somewhere about and don't want no more." "But this is not the same. It's the revised edition, and has a lot of things out of it, and ever so many changes, and—" "Eh? I hadn't heard of that. Is the Ten Commandments taken out?" "Oh, no." "I don't want it."

WHEN France was threatened with the cholera, the board of health telegraphed to every town in the country: "Cholera is coming; prepare for it." From a certain interior town came back the answer "We are quite ready." The board of health, thinking that perhaps a new scheme of sanitation had been discovered and applied in the town referred to, that so prompt an answer was received, wired to the mayor, "What hav you done?" His reply was, "We estimate that about four hundred people will die here of cholera, and we hav graves dug for the whole of them."

SMALL boy (to young minister): "Mr. Watergruel, were you a ball player before you got good?" Young minister: "Yes, my boy, I belonged to a ball club when I was at college." Small boy: "Did you—" Anxious mother: "Johnnie, don't bother Mr. Watergruel any more. Run out and play with your sister." Small boy: "All right, maw. Did you play on a base, Mr. Watergruel?" Young minister: "No, I generally played right field." Anxious mother (very anxiously): "Now run along, Johnnie." Small boy (with great unction): "Well, I thought you played on one of the bases 'cause father says you're off your base." Anxious mother sinks through the floor.

THREE SIZES.

Maud watched Si's ship with streaming eyes
And aching heart sail out the bay;
And watching there that dismal day
Her bosom rose and fell—with sighs.

Great giant cliffs in warrior guise
Threw up the spray with mighty hand,
And all the while old ocean's grand,
Great bosom rose and fell—with size.

Yet when to port Maud's eager eyes
His ship discerned, and Si with grace
Did leap ashore, in stout embrace
Her bosom rose and fell—with Si's.

A FEW Sundays ago, a minister preached a sermon on the evils of mendacity to a congregation in the backwoods near Fipandtuck. In the course of his remarks he alluded to the tragic death of Ananias. At the close of the sermon an old deacon took the minister aside and informed the reverend gentleman that he had made a mistake in regard to Ananias. "How so?" asked the astonished divine, "Why, by telling the congregation that Ananias is dead," said the deacon. "I—I don't understand," said the minister in some confusion. "Please explain." "Dang it!" said the deacon, "nearly every man in the congregation is an office seeker, and when they learn that Ananias is dead the whole durned mob will want to fill his place!"

THIS is given by Snap as a bachelor's reverie: "Somehow I never weary of watching the girl I am going to marry. It is so odd to think that she and I are to pass the greater part of our lives together. As I watch her close her eyes in a moment of reverie, I wonder if she will wake me in the morning with a sweet kiss, or whether she will pull the pillow from under my head with a jerk, and make me dream I hav fallen down a precipice 19,000 feet high. Will she be ready to open the door and receive me kindly when I come home late, or will she call me hard names and threaten to go home to her mother? As I take her soft palm in mine and kiss the tips of her pink fingers, I wonder if they will ever giv me a box that may make my ears tingle. She has a pretty little mouth and pearly teeth; and will she ever put them to bad use by reading me Caudle lectures? Will those mild blue eyes ever flash in anger at me, and will that wealth of auburn hair, so neatly coiled, ever hang in frowsy disorder down her back? She has cunning little feet. She says they get cold very easily. Horror! Will she ever put them on me when they are cold? No; my darling will do none of these things. She is a little lady, and I know that her greatest happiness will be to make me happy. If I began married life by anticipating so many sad things, I should deserve any fate which might befall me."

Notes and Clippings.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is in feeble health and has been obliged to cease work.

THE Mormon church, it is said, has more missionaries than the American board of foreign missions.

AN applicant to St. Peter, being refused admission into heaven, looked him steadily in the eye and crowed three times. The apostle, coloring, and fumbling his key, said, "You may go in, but don't do that to me again."

CANON FARRAR'S latest work, on the "Message of the Books," contains the statement that "the number of competent critics who still believe Mark xvi, 9-20 to be genuin is diminishing." These passages, as reference to the gospel of Mark will show, are rather difficult of defense, and it is no wonder that the Christians are anxious to be rid of them.

THE following blasphemous rhymes appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette:

We don't want to fight;
But, by Jingo, if we do—
We've Protestant and Catholic,
Turk, Infidel, and Jew;
We've God and Mammon, Allah,
Buddha, Brahma, and Vishnu;
We've collared all the Deities, so what can Russia do?

MR. MOODY declined to commit himself when a Milwaukee brother asked him if he had grace enough to die at the stake. All he wanted, he said, was "just grace enough to hold this convention for three days in Milwaukee." Mr. Moody is a sensible man. There are plenty of people who will, as Poe said, suffer for religion and die for it—anything but liv for it.—Leavenworth (Kan.) Times.

IT would appear that the study of Shakspere in Sunday-schools fatally affects Bible research. The Christian Union says: "In one of our church papers, not long ago, was a communication from a Methodist preacher, in which he makes the sweeping declaration that 'the plan of furnishing every teacher a Journal, and every scholar a "Lear," has resulted in banishing all Bibles and Testaments from the Sunday-school.'"

SAID Richard Grant White: "When at last it dawned upon the pedagogs that English was a language, or rather, in their significant phrase, a vulgar tongue, and they set themselvs to giving rules for the art of writing and speaking it correctly, they attempted to form these rules upon models furnished by the Latin language. From this heterogeneous union sprang that hybrid monster known as English grammar, before whose fruitless loins we hav sacrificed for nearly three hundred years our children and the strangers within our gates."

SAYS the Brooklyn Eagle of May 4th: "Mr. Anthony Comstock, whose statement before a convention of clergymen that Kings county is a paradise of gamblers the Eagle took occasion to contradict a day or two ago, has thought fit to write a communication to the Eagle, which was published on Saturday. The general tenor of this epistle is characteristic. Brought face to face with facts, the writer informs us, among other things, that the laws against gambling are enforced in Brooklyn, and consequently that Kings county, which is mainly Brooklyn, is not a paradise of gamblers. The insignificant foundation of fact, namely, that there has been some gambling at Coney Island in the past, is reluctantly put forward as the best he can do for his case. Had Mr. Comstock exhibited the courage and candor to tell the listening clergymen that Coney Island was one among many places in this country at which gentlemen bet money through pools on horse races he would hav told all the truth there was to tell; but it would hardly hav served his purpose of self-glorification. Solely on account of the fact thas he is, ostensibly at least, connected with certain moral and religious organizations this community will be satisfied by characterizing his statement as a sheer falsehood and himself as a falsifier. If a mere unsanctified layman had done as much he would hav been open to the charge of lying and being a liar."

REGARDING the incomprehensibilities in the form of slang and local expressions daily making their appearance among the words which go to form the English language, George A. Sala suggests that it is about time we had a society for the protection of that tongue. He is moved just at present to this conviction by the introduction of such an uncouth piece of verbal coinage as "vestrify," by Mr. Chaplin, in the House of Commons. It is as abhorrent a word, Sala says, as "interviewer." The first thing to be done by the society should be the publication of an "Index Expurgatorius," in which such detestable innovations as "vestrify," "interview" (as a verb), "collide" (for to come into collision with), "cloture" (for closure), etc., should be gibbeted with the names of the offenders who most persistently coin words or seek to familiarize the public with unauthorized expressions.

A METHODIST clergyman, recently in England, visited Westminster Abbey, and in the Independent givs a quite interesting account of the graves of distinguished men which he saw in that vicinity. Then he goes on: "Yet there is one tomb which attracts more visitors than the novelist, the theologian, the chemist, the philosopher, or the sociologist. Mysterious are the vagaries of human nature. It is a large marble closet on whose doors is carved a head of the deceased, and lying in front of it is a marble figure, life size, of a huge English mastiff, the companion of the deceased in life. Does the reader wonder whose grave it is that attracts more visitors than any other whose tenant has been so long buried? Let the marble tell its own story:

"Sacred to the memory
of
THOMAS SAYERS,
England's famous prize-fighter."

AN English country dentist recently made a set of teeth for the bishop of his diocese. He anxiously watched the prelate as he examined himself and his new teeth in the pier-glass, and was startled when he heard the bishop utter language ending with that fearful word, "damnation." The dentist ventured to suggest that his lordship might feel them rather uncomfortable at first, but in a little time he would get used to them. Without appearing to notice the dentist his lordship exclaimed with vehemence, "Without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." "But, indeed, my lord, if you hav patience," pleaded the dentist, "in a week's time or so——" "What do you mean?" inquired the prelate, turning round with an apostolic smile; "why should I hav patience? The teeth fit me beautifully; it is the first time I hav found myself able to pronounce the Athanasian creed with distinctness for these twenty years."

WAR is, of course, economically purely destructiv. The men employed produce nothing; the engins prepared are useless, except for killing; the money expended is most of it consumed on objects which can yield no direct return. Enormous quantities of food are wasted in transport, domestic animals are used up in unproductiv labor, and the men slain are necessarily among the strongest in the nation. Nevertheless, the economic loss of war is often not felt for a time; and it is probable that in the war supposed to be coming with Russia this will be the case to an unusual degree. It is by degrees that the economic effect of war comes to be felt, through the agency usually of taxation. No nation can throw away perhaps two years' revenue in one on unproductiv effort without becoming gradually poorer—that is, without having less to spend in giving good wages to great multitudes of men. Suppose a war to cost £50,000,000 a year—and the American war cost £120,000,000—though much of that is spent in wages, the whole is loss, for even the wages are paid, from the economic point of view, for doing nothing. When the war stops, therefore, there will be distress, great or little, in proportion to the expenditure, but great or little, equally inevitable, not to be kept off by any financial arrangement. It may be rendered short, of course, or even innocuous, by other causes, such as a sudden discovery of a new and cheaper motor, which, by reducing the energy to be expended on producing a result, positivly adds to the national force, and therefore to the national producing power, or by the opening up of new channels of industry; but apart from these there is no avoiding the economic consequences of war. War is waste; the nation pays for the waste by taxation, and therefore every individual in the nation must, pro tanto, suffer. The particular war may be right, or unavoidable, or purely self-defensiv, but one of its consequences must be this; and it is never wise to conceal what must inevitably happen.—London Spectator.

THE following letter, written nearly forty-one years ago to Mr. Curtis Whipples, of New Britain, proposes to hav a debt canceled, in view of the coming of the Lord "in the clouds of heaven:" "WALLINGFORD, Oct. 12, 1844. MR. WHIPPLES: Sir: I take this favorable opportunity of writing a line or two. I am indebted to you and Mr. Stanley some considerable amount, and hav been for nearly or quite twelve years, but hav never been able to pay without distressing myself and family, and am not able to pay you now, but hav always had the disposition to pay you, if I had the means. I must therefore beg you to forgiv the debt, trusting that God may incline you so to do, for if ye forgiv not men their trespasses, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgiv you yours. In expectation of meeting the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven on the tenth day of the seventh month of this Jewish year, prepare to meet thy God in judgment.—LYMAN CURTIS."

GOPAL VENAYAK JOSHEE is a Hindoo and a nativ of Sangamner county, in the Bombay presidency. He left Bombay more than nine months ago and traveled hither, via Burmah, Siam, China, and Japan. Joshee was visited by a Chronicle reporter in his rooms, on Bush street, and having placed a lighted candle on a small table, with his legs crossed under him on his chair, his small bronzed hands clasping his small bare feet, he proceeded to explain that the communications he was about to make were not voluntary, but only in answer to questions. "I travel for my pleasure and instruction, and to find out for myself if all that English missionaries say is true; they make attacks on my religion and customs, and I want to find out what is fact and what is falsehood." "Are you a Brahman or a Buddhist?" "I am a Brahman. There are very few Buddhists, but hundreds of thousands of Brahmans. We are all idolaters, and we are proud of it. We do not respect the images, but the holy men whom they represent." "Do you believe in a Supreme Being?" "Yes. But we do not worship him. Of course not. A Supreme Being does not want any worship. People cannot worship what they cannot conceive." "Tell me about your religion." "People in this country respect the memory of their dead relativs; they worship insignificant beings such as their fathers and mothers. We worship those who hav been worthy men and hav left records behind them, and who are God incarnate like your Christ. Our religion is not idolatry; we do not worship gods, but godlike men." "You seem to hav studied different religions." "I believe I hav studied well, and maintain my ground. Our aim is to destroy our individuality. We should be above our passions, else we are only animals." "But you worship animals," remarked the reporter. The Brahman, however, was not to be cornered. "We do not worship the serpent, but the extraordiuary power it possesses. A serpent with us is the symbol of eternity, because with a single sting he can pass a man into eternity." "What other animals do you thus revere, since we must not say worship?" "The cow is very divine. We respect it the same as our mother, because it givs milk to all, as our mother to us. I must tell you we do not worship animals themselvs, but their powers. I am a Hindoo—a so-called idolater; our religion is superior to yours. We strive to look on all things with even eyes. A man who says 'this thing is good and that thing is bad' is not fit for absorption in God, because he is selfish. Nothing is bad in this world. If a man hits me I must bear it, or I am selfish, for I am the one hurt."—San Francisco Chronicle.

News of the Week.

FRANCE and China are still negotiating for peace.

THERE is no prospect of immediate war between Russia and England.

IMMIGRANTS landed at this port average about four thousand per week.

GENERAL GRANT takes short walks on pleasant days, and works industriously upon his book.

THE scourge of typhoid fever which recently struck Plymouth, Pa., remains unabated.

FIFTEEN roller skaters started on a six-day race at Madison Square Garden in this city last Sunday night.

QUEEN VICTORIA will be 66 years old on the 24th inst. Her health is good and she enjoys an income of $1,925,000 a year.

THE revised Old Testament did not appear May 1st, as promised. May 19th is the day now set for putting it upon the market.

SHORT, the dynamiter, who attempted to assassinate Phelan in Rossa's newspaper office, has been acquitted. Everybody except Short's friends believes that the verdict is an unjust one.

"OUR Duties Toward the Dead" was the subject of the Rev. Heber Newton's sermon last Sunday. He considered the present mode of interment revolting, and hoped to see the introduction of cremation.

THE Rev. J. H. Dally, formerly of Jersey City, N. J., committed suicide last week by jumping from a Mississippi steamboat. He recently left the pulpit confessing that he had been unduly intimate with a woman not his wife.

GENERAL MIDDLETON'S forces attacked the rebel army in the Northwest last Sunday, and defeated them with heavy loss, capturing Batouche. One Canadian was killed. It is believed that the rebels are nearly out of ammunition.

LOUIS KELLMER, of Newburgh, N. Y., went to the Catholic church one day last week and was developed into a lunatic. While insane he jumped over the rail and tore the cloth from the altar, creating a panic. The man was locked up.

THE pious banker, Fish, ex-president of the Marine Bank, in jail for embezzlement, is still further disgraced by the discovery that a woman with whom he lived, and who was not known as his wife, has recently died under suspicious circumstances, after giving birth to a child.

REPORT says that Elder Thomas Smith, a prominent Shaker, is married. Elder Smith was talked of as successor to Elder F. W. Evans, and his apostasy has caused much sorrow at Mount Lebanon, N.Y., where the ministry and highest authority of the Shaker church is located.

VINELAND, N. J., began with prohibition, and has grown up that way. It is surprising, therefore, to learn that out of seventeen indictments just found in the county court, nine were against citizens for illegal liquor-selling, and that eight of the nine pleaded guilty, and paid $40 fine apiece.

THE congregation of the new Methodist church at Fair Haven, N. J., were considerably worked up on the 7th inst. by the downfall of their pastor, the Rev. Charles D. Lupple. The minister was on the first tower of the edifice and fell off. It was forty feet to the ground, but he landed in a pile of sand and was not much hurt.

THE Russian and British war vessels remain in New York Harbor. Last Sunday "divine" service was held on both ships. The Russians are Greek Catholics and the Englishmen are Episcopalians. A New York man swam out and placed a dummy torpedo under the bow of the Garnet the other night, and frightened the marines somewhat. Since that time the visitors hav kept out a torpedo net.

The Civilization and Moral Status of the Ancient Mexicans.

II.

There can be little doubt as to the intelligence and civilization of the ancient Mexicans; indeed, all who hav written on the subject admit it either openly or by implication. Acosta devotes much space to proving it, cites many instances, and concludes by saying: "For my part, I think they surpass us (Spaniards) in those things whereunto they do apply themselvs." Zurita, an eminent jurist, who lived among them nineteen years, is indignant at the epithet "barbarians" being applied to them, which, he says, "would come from no one who had personal knowledge of the capacity of the people or their institutions."

But it was obligatory on all the earlier writers to picture them in conformity with the behests of the "church," and even Prescott felt constrained to follow in the same path and failed to render justice when it was in his power to do so. Few, if any, hav had his facilities, as various unpublished MSS. were freely loaned him, and gratitude for these favors may possibly account for the eminently Christian view he takes of the subject; or perhaps it paid better. But, as in the former article on their religion, by gathering an admission here, and a concession there, together with the fact that many of their monuments still exist, having defied both time and the "church," enough may be gleaned to prove the second part of my proposition.

The government was an electiv monarchy—"The scheme of election, howevér defectiv, argues a more refined and calculating policy than was to hav been expected from a barbarous (?) nation;" and one of England's great claims to civilization, "the law of entail," was recognized as one of the bulwarks of their constitution.

They had a council devoted to the "encouragement of science and art." Works on astronomy, chronology, history, or any science, had to be submitted to its judgment; and wilful perversion of the truth was a capital offense. This council was drawn from the best instructed men in the kingdom, and they decided on the qualification of the various professors and the fidelity of their instructions to their pupils. On stated days, historical compositions and poems on moral and traditional topics were recited. Seats were provided for eminent persons, who distributed prizes to the successful competitors.

One academy in particular was, par excellence, the nursery of all their sciences and various useful and ornamental arts, and its archives were stored with the records of primitiv ages. Clavigero mentions four of its historians. Even kings appeared as competitors for its prizes, and Prescott mentions one essay in particular which "reminds one of the rich breathings of Spanish-Arab poetry, in which an ardent imagination is tempered by a not unpleasing and moral melancholy." Sahagun has furnished translations of their more elaborate prose, "consisting of prayers and public discourses, which giv a favorable idea of their eloquence, showing that they paid much attention to rhetorical effect." A collection of sixty odes, composed by one of their kings, and consisting of prayers and thankgivings, written in Iambic meter, were destroyed, because the missionaries "might hav feared the possibility of parallel being made between them and the Psalms of David." "Such," says Prescott, "are the marvelous accounts transmitted to us of this institution; an institution certainly not to hav been expected among the aborigines of America."

Of the education of the priests, Dr. Brinton says: "It was completed at the Calmecac, a sort of ecclesiastical college where instruction was given in all the wisdom of their ancients, and the esoteric lore of their craft. The art of mixing colors and tracing designs; the ideographic writing and phonetic hieroglyphs; the songs and prayers used in public worship; the national traditions; principles of astronomy; hidden meaning of symbols and the use of musical instruments, all formed parts of the really extensiv course of instruction they there received." The boys were likewise instructed, and the girls learned to weave and embroider and practice other feminin accomplishments. Torquemada admits that the youth were taught "to abstain from wrath, to offer violence and do wrong to no man; in short, to perform the duties plainly pointed out by natural religion."

Their MSS. were of four kinds — cotton cloth, leather, a composition of silk and gum, and a sort of paper much resembling the Egyptian papyrus. Some of the specimens of the latter even now "exhibit their original freshness, and the paintings on them retain their brilliancy of color." The books closed like a folding screen, with a leaf of wood at each end, and had the appearance of "one of our bound books." Martyr says they gave evidence of a "positiv civilization," and we are informed that their method of computation was "a more simple arrangement, probably, than any existing among Europeans." Humboldt claims that the few annals he saw, "exhibit the greatest method and astonishing minuteness," which differs from the methods of the monkish historians of the Middle Ages, who "often dispose of years in a few brief sentences."

The Mexicans divided their year into eighteen months of twenty days each and then added five days. A month was four weeks of five days each, and as the year has nearly six hours more than three hundred and sixty-five days, they provided for it by intercalation, adding twelve days at the expiration of fifty-two years and carrying the odd half day over to the next cycle of fifty-two years, "which brought them within an almost inappreciable fraction to the exact length of the tropical year, as established by the most accurate observations. Indeed the intercalation of twenty-five days in every one hundred and four years shows a nicer adjustment of civil to solar time than is presented by any European calendar. Such was the astonishing precision displayed by the Mexicans in these computations so difficult as to hav baffled till a comparativly recent period the most enlightened nations of Christendom." Humboldt claims that they lost only one minute and twenty-six seconds every year. So, when the Spaniards, who had adopted the Julian reform, landed in Mexico, their reckoning was eleven days in advance of the exact time, the time of these barbarous (?) Mexicans.

Humboldt says they knew "the real causes of the eclipses," and Professor Draper that "they had sundials for determining the hour and also instruments for the solstices and equinoxes, and had ascertained the globular form of the earth and the obliquity of the ecliptic." Representations on their maps show the disk of the moon projected on that of the sun and an immense circular block of carved stone which was disinterred in 1790 "shows from the calendar engraved on it that they had the means of settling the hours of the day with precision; the periods of the solstices and of the equinoxes and the transit of the sun over the zenith of Mexico."

Kingsborough remarks: "It can hardly be doubted that they were acquainted with many scientific instruments of strange invention, compared with our own; whether the telescope may not hav been of the number is uncertain; but the thirteenth plate of M. Dupaix's 'Monuments,' which represents a man holding something of a similar nature to his eye, affords reason for supposing that they knew how to improve the power of vision. Torquemada admits that Montezuma was a skilled astronomer, and several others mention that observatories were built on the palaces and public buildings; and Dr. McCullogh allows their superiority to the Europeans in this science.

Their code of laws were simple and well administered. Over each of the principal cities was placed a supreme judge, appointed by the crown, and he was endowed with "original and final jurisdiction in both civil and criminal cases." They were independent of the king, and there is no record of any conflict between the crown and them. Below these superior judges were lower courts, from whose decision an appeal could be made to the higher. These lower magistrates were elected by the people. All the judges were hedged around by very severe laws. A bribe was death. Just prior to the conquest, one of them was put to death "for deciding a case in his own house." Great crimes were punished by death —even the murder of a slave. The penalty of thieving was slavery; yet they could hav been under no great apprehension of this crime, since "the entrances to their dwellings were not secured by bolts or fastenings of any kind."

All the judges, presided over by the king, met every eighty days. Officials attended to preserve order. There were no lawyers. Under no pretext was a case allowed to go over for more than one term. Each party stated his case, supported by witnesses, and the testimony was taken down by a clerk in hieroglyphics. These were executed with so much accuracy that in suits respecting real property they were allowed to be produced as good testimony in the Spanish tribunals, very long after the conquest.

Their palaces and public buildings were numerous. One is described as 1,224 yards long and 978 yards wide; surrounded by a wall of unburnt bricks and cement six feet wide and nine feet high. Within it were two courts, which contained the great market of the city, and the council chambers and halls of justice. The walls of the rooms were incrusted with alabasters and richly tinted stucco and hung with gorgeous tapestry of variegated feather-work. Aquariums and aviaries abounded, and many birds and animals which could not be obtained alive were represented in gold and silver so skilfully as "to hav furnished the naturalist Hernandez with models for his work." This lordly pile contained three hundred apartments, and it was pulled down and utilized for the building of churches by the Spaniards.

A summer retreat is described as being laid out in terraces or hanging gardens, with 520 steps reaching to them, many hewn in natural porphyry. It had three reservoirs which distributed water through the gardens. The baths were excavated in solid porphyry, and are still shown as the "baths of Montezuma."

Their gardens were subjects of great wonderment to the conquerors; and in describing the city of Huaxtepu it is stated that "Sandoval took up his quarters in the dwelling of the lord of the place, surrounded by gardens which rivaled those of Iztapalapan in magnificence and surpassed them in extent. They are said to hav been two leagues in circumference, having pleasure-houses and numerous tanks stocked with various kinds of fish, and they were embellished with trees, shrubs, and plants, nativ and exotic, some selected for their beauty and fragrance, others for their medicinal properties. They were scientifically arranged, and the whole establishment displayed a degree of horticultural taste and knowledge of which it would not hav been easy to find a counterpart, at that day, in the most scientific communities of Europe. Such is the testimony, not only of the conquerors, but of men of science who visited these beautiful repositories in the day of their glory." "But a generation had scarcely passed away after the conquest, before a change came over these scenes so beautiful. The town itself was deserted, and the shore of the lake was strewed with the wrecks of buildings which were once its ornament and glory. The gardens shared the fate of the city. The retreating waters withdrew the means of nourishment, converting the flourishing plains into a foul and unsightly morass, the haunt of loathsome reptils; and the waterfowl built her nest in what had once been the palaces of princes."

The kingdom of Mexico was over 1,200 miles long, and contained about twenty millions of people. Its breadth is a disputed point. The collection of Mendoza gives the tribute roll or revenue of the government, as paid by each city. It is too lengthy to enter into here, and should be examined to be appreciated. But the wealth of the country must hav been enormous.

There were thirty high officers under the crown; and as each had his district, and one vied with the other to beautify his immediate surroundings, it resulted in a scene of picturesque beauty which, if only a fraction of the records be true, far surpassed Moorish Granada, which was despoiled only a few years previously by Ferdinand and Isabella. Clavigero says that besides the three principal cities, Mexico, Acolhuacan, and Tlacopan, there were "forty eminent cities in the valley of Mexico alone." In describing a minor city, one writer remarks, "The Spaniards were particularly struck with the style and commodious structure of the houses, built chiefly of stone, and with the general aspect of wealth and even elegance which prevailed there;" and that all the houses, except those of the extremely poor, were large, and attached to each "were a chapel, a vapor bath, and a granary."

Having read the description which Cortez gave Charles V. of the city of Tlascala, in which he pictured it as larger, more populous, and better built than Granada, Humboldt paid it a visit and found it dwindled to "a miserable village of 3,400 inhabitants."

Every city had police to provide for its health and cleanliness; the streets were watered and swept daily, and pure water was conducted to the most convenient places by earthen pipes. Hospitals were established at given points, for the cure of the sick and permanent refuge of disabled soldiers; "and surgeons were placed over them who were so far better than those in Europe that they did not protract the cure in order to increase the pay."

Their public works were on a scale of grand magnificence, and their canals and aqueducts of stone were subjects of surprise to the Spaniard. The pyramid at Cholula was 177 feet high and 1,423 feet square at its base, covering 44 acres, and on the summit stood a sumptuous temple dedicated to Quetzalcoatl. This pyramid was twice as long as the great one at Cheops. Another, dedicated to Tonatiuh, was 682 feet square at the base and 180 feet high. As they were built of large stones, sometimes of over 50 tons weight, and as the Mexicans had no beasts of burden, it has been a serious question as to what extent their mechanical ingenuity was developed, in view of the fact that they were quarried, in some instances, many leagues from where they were used, and had to be transported over streams and rivers. Of their antiquity there can be no doubt, and the orthodox Siguenza, having all the proofs before him, feels that if it were not a matter of faith to believe the Bible stories he would allow that these monuments were contemporaneous with the deluge.

Several years ago I inspected a ruin which at that time was much commented on. The two walls were supported by a solid piece of masonry, about a foot square, fifty feet long, and perfectly level—no arch being used. Colonel Totten, who built the Panama railroad after it had been decided as impracticable by the best English, French, and German engineers, declared that it could not be duplicated by any modern contrivance, except a beam of wood. Yet the Mexicans knew the use of an arch, also, and had four different words to express its various shapes.

Speaking of their manufactures and commerce, one writer says: "The circumstance of the Mexicans having an extensiv internal commerce among themselvs presents their state of civilization in a strong light." But Prof. J. W. Draper, than whom it is impossible to find a more painstaking and conscientious investigator, givs in his inimitable style the result of his researches, and I can do no better than giv the quotation in extenso: "They practiced with no inconsiderable skill the more delicate mechanical arts, such as those of jeweler and enameler. From the aloe they obtained pins and needles, thread, cord, paper, food, and an intoxicating drink. They made earthenware, knew how to lacquer wood, employed cochineal as a scarlet dye. They were skilled weavers of fine cloth, and excelled in the production of feather-work, their gorgeous humming-birds furnishing materials for that purpose. In metallurgy they were behind the old world, not having the use of iron; but, as the old world had formerly done, they employed bronze in its stead. They knew how to move immense masses of rock; their great calendar stone, of porphyry, weighed more than fifty tons, and was brought a distance of many miles. Their trade was carried on, not in shops, but by markets, or fairs, held on the fifth day. They employed a currency of gold dust, pieces of tin, and bags of cocoa. The women did not work abroad, but occupied themselvs in spinning, embroidering, feather-work, music. Ablution was resorted to both before and after meals; perfumes were used at the toilet. The Mexicans gave to Europe tobacco, snuff, the turkey, chocolate, cochineal. Like us, they had in their entertainments solid dishes, with suitable condiments, gravies, sauces, and desserts of pastries, confections, fruits, both fresh and preserved. They had chafing-dishes of silver or gold. Like us, they knew the use of intoxicating drinks; like us, they not unfrequently took them to excess; like us, they hightened their festivities with dancing and music. They had theatrical and pantomimic shows. At Tezcuco there was a council of music, which, moreover, exercised a censorship on philosophical works, as well as those of astronomy and history."

Their trades were divided into guilds, and the merchants reminded Sahagun of the "merchant princes of an Italian republic." Clavigero says their cotton cloths were as fine as the linen of Holland; that they wove them with various-colored pictures, and by intermixing feathers made a serviceable carpet; and from the maguey they made a strong hempen cloth, and a fine one, like linen. They also interwove the delicate hair of rabbits with the cotton, and embroidered it with birds and flowers. Count Carli, speaking of their work in feathers, says: "Never did I behold anything so exqisit for brilliancy and nice gradation of color, and for beauty of design. No European artist could hav made such a thing."

They manufactured silk from the thread of a caterpillar indigenous to their soil, and Humboldt has collected many interesting facts in regard to it, but for political causes the rearing of the worm was prohibited after the conquest. From obsidian they made mirrors, knives, lancets, etc., and their culinary utensils and agricultural implements from an alloy of tin and copper. They could harden it, for Herrero says "it cuts like steel." With tools made of it they could cut any metal, by the use of a siliceous dust, "even basalt, porphyry, amethysts, and emeralds." They had both mineral and vegetable paints and dyes, and their cups and vases of lacquered wood were impervious to water. "Some of their silver vases were so large that a man could not encircle them with his arms. They imitated very nicely the figures of animals, and, what was extraordinary, could mix the metals in such a manner that the feathers of a bird or the scales of a fish should be alternately of gold or silver. The Spanish goldsmiths admitted their superiority." Humboldt had in his collection "a well-cast brass bell, dug from one of their graves."

They understood surveying, as Cortez says that a map of the city of Mexico was prepared expressly for him by Montezuma, which was perfectly correct in every respect, and equal to any he had ever seen, and Martyr describes the "great map of the city of Tennstitan, containing all its temples, bridges, and lakes." Humboldt says that, though not deemed very civilized, "yet they had executed drawings the just proportions of which hav been admired by English navigators."

They also painted, for Cortez relates that while he was interviewing one of the nobles he noticed an attendant busy with a brush, and on loooking at the work, "found that it was a sketch on canvas of the Spaniards, their costumes, arms, and, in short, different objects of interest, giving to each its appropriate form and color." And in a letter to Charles V. he also states that Montezuma presented him with a hunting tube which was so exquisitly painted with birds and flowers that "language fails to describe their beauty of finish and accuracy." Martyr, Camargo, and Oviedo agree "that they pecuilarly excelled in pottery, which was considered as equal to the best in Europe," and Acosta mentions approvingly some of their works of basso-relievo in stone.

As the Mexicans are admitted to hav been a religious people, their customs were of necessity interwoven with their religion, of which we hav the counterpart in the church of Rome. Yet, as the basis of a true civilization rests on the relations of the sexes, enough has been preserved to enable us to form a fair estimate of their character, which, I think, will compare favorably with that of the average Christian of the present day. I hav already shown that the marriage tie was considered so sacred that a special tribunal was instituted to determin all matters relating to it, and all the early writers agree that the Mexican women were treated with consideration, "partook equally with the men in social festivities and entertainments," and that "when she had come to a mature age, the maiden was treated by her parents with a tenderness from which all reserve seemed banished." She was taught to preserve "simplicity in her manners and conversation, neatness in her attire, with strict attention to personal cleanliness, and modesty was inculcated as the greatest ornament of a woman." Cousins were allowed to marry, but none of a nearer degree; thus they were more enlightened in this respect than the English of today, as a man could marry his deceased wife's sister. Sahagun (a monk) says that polygamy was not practiced, and givs in detail the advice of a father to his son, about to marry, in which the one-wife principle is distinctly laid down.

They are accused of being intemperate, but "intemperance, which was the burthen of their religious homilies, was visited with severe penalties, and Zurita, who lived among them nineteen years, "bears testimony that those Spaniards who thought they were addicted to it, greatly erred."

They had several kinds of slaves; prisoners of war, public debtors, and persons who, from extreme poverty, sold themselvs. But the contract of sale, in order to be binding, was executed "in the presence of at least four persons, and the services to be exacted were limited with great precision." The slave was allowed to hav his own family and hold property, and his children were free. No one could be born to slavery, "an honorable distinction not known in any civilized community where slavery has been sanctioned."

Agriculture was encouraged, and "there was scarcely a spot so rude, or a strip so inaccessible, as not to confess the power of cultivation;" and Cortez tells us "there is not a hand's breadth of land that is not cultivated." Draper remarks, "Their agriculture was superior to that of Europe; there was nothing in the Old World to compare with their menageries and botanical gardens." The description given of their haciendas reminds one of a well-stocked and well-cared-for farm of a thrifty New Englander—except they had no cattle. But every farmer had large droves of turkeys, which fowl, so it seems, was introduced into Europe from Mexico. Humboldt informs us that they made syrups and sugar from the maize stalks, and Cortez mentions that both these articles were sold in their markets.

One could go on indefinitly describing their products, but enough has been given to prove that they were as civilized as their conquerors, and I hav entered thus in detail to disprove the charge that they were barbarous, and at the same time to compare the civilizations of the two countries.

Cortez givs three reasons why they were barbarians: "They do not know the use of iron or milk, and hav no written language like ours." Yet their alloy of tin and copper would perform work that tried the best iron of Europe. In regard to the second charge, we can take it home to ourselvs, as within a decade Mrs. Stowe, writing from her Florida home, said that, with thousands of cattle in her immediate neighborhood she could not obtain a pint of fresh milk, and depended on the condensed article put up for exportation. As for the third, I refer to the signature of Cortez in the third volume of Prescott, which, in order to prevent mistakes, is very properly labeled "this is the signature of Don Hernando Cortez." No sane man would hesitate between that signature and the Mexican phonetics, a system we hav engrafted on our civilization, and consider an art, and which enables many thousands of our citizens to earn an honorable livelihood.

It has often been queried how a handful of Spaniards could hav conquered this populous and wealthy kingdom, and this fact is cited by the Spanish historians as a "direct interposition of God in their favor." This might answer for the times in which it was written, but our intelligence revolts at the idea of a Catholic archbishop, in enlightened America, using these same arguments to prove the care his God has always had for the church. Archbishop Spaulding believed it, so he says. He is entitled to his belief, but I prefer facts.

The Mexicans were surrounded by many uncivilized nations, who banded themselvs with the invaders, one tribe alone furnishing 100,000 warriors. The use of horses and firearms, together with men clad in steel, all novelties to the Mexicans, performed the work; and if God had any hand in the business, I think he might hav been better engaged. Whoever it was that did it, God or the Spaniard, the brutality is unquestioned, as the pages of history teem with recitals which vie in horror with anything recorded to hav happened in any other part of the world. But two instances will serve to illustrate. Describing one scene, the historian says: "The struggle was short but desperate. Most of the Mexicans were put to the sword. Some were thrown headlong over the battlements, and others, letting themselvs down the precipice, were killed on the borders of a stream that wound round its base, the waters of which were so polluted with blood that the victors were unable to slake their thirst with them for a full hour." On another occasion a large number were lured into the Spanish camps, ostensibly to carry the baggage, but in reality to be murdered, so as to strike terror into the balance. After charging the chiefs with conspiracy, "the fatal signal, the discharge of an arquebuse, was then given. In an instant every musket and cross-bow was leveled at the unfortunate Mexicans in the court-yard and a frightful volley poured into them as they stood together like a herd of deer in the center. They made scarcely any resistance to the Spaniards, who followed up the discharge of their pieces by rushing on them with their swords; and, as the unprotected bodies of the nativs afforded no protection, they hewed them down with as much ease as the reaper mows down the ripe corn." All were killed except a few who hid under the heaps of slain.

This was most certainly a war of extermination, and it had the sanction of the "church," for "there was a Dominican friar who brought a quantity of pontifical 'bulls,' offering indulgences to those engaged in the war against the Infidel." He drove a prosperous trade with his wares and returned home "well freighted, in exchange, with the more substantial treasures of Mexico;" and "his holiness, the pope, who, it may be added, received at the same time from Cortez a substantial donation of gold and jewels, publicly testified, by prayers and solemn processions, his great sense of the services rendered to Christianity by the conquerors of Mexico, and generously requited them by bulls granting plenary absolution for their sins." This gentleman is known in history as Alexander VI., the father of Cæsar and Lucretia Borgia. These "bulls" were a merchantable article, and the price fluctuated according to the needs of the papal treasury. During the reign of Elizabeth, Capt. Thos. White, a Londoner, captured two Spanish ships having on board two millions of "bulls." They had cost the Spanish king 300,000 florins, and were marked to sell at such prices as would hav netted him a profit of 5,000,000 of florins. The profits on such a transaction leave the realm of simple interest and enter that of larceny.

Wondrous tales are told of the exploits and providential escapes of the Spaniards, who are always engaged against from ten to one hundred times their number, the principal authority being one Cabeza de Vaca (cow's head). Why not ass's head? Prescott says that "more than one grave historian refers the preservation of the Spaniards to the watchful care of their patron apostle, St. James, who in these dreadful conflicts was beheld careering on his milk-white steed [possibly like Lord Lovell in the old song] at the head of the Christian squadrons, with his sword flashing lightning, while a lady, robed in white, supposed to be the Virgin, was distinctly seen by his side throwing dust in the eyes of the Infidel. The fact is attested both by Spaniards and Mexicans—by the latter, after their conversion to Christianity." This St. Jago, or James, made his first well-authenticated appearance at the battle of Clavijo, A.D. 844, and in honor of it the "church" was allowed, by King Ramiro I. an extra annual tribute of corn and wine from every town. He was the patron of the Franciscans, and from the amount of tribute they drew from the conquered country, I shrewdly suspect that, like Joe Bagstock, they were "sly, devilish sly."

Well, Mexico was conquered, "and the conqueror, as he strode among the smoking embers on the summit, calmly surveyed the scene of desolation below. The palaces, the temples, the busy marts of industry and trade, the glittering canals covered with their rich freights from the surrounding country, the royal pomp of groves and gardens, all the splendors of the imperial city, the capital of the western world, forever gone, and in their place a barren wilderness."

I had made an extract of Spanish civilization, to be used as a comparison with the Mexican, but as it is mislaid, I will substitute Draper's description of the condition of the English. It will answer equally as well to illustrate my point. "The peasant's cabin," says he, "was made of reeds and sticks plastered over with mud. His fire was chimneyless; often it was made of peat. In the objects and manner of his existence he was but a step above the industrious beaver who was building his dam in the adjacent stream. There were highwaymen on the road, pirates on the rivers, vermin in abundance in the clothing and beds. The common food was peas, vetches, fern roots, and even the bark of trees. . . . . Nor was the state of the townsman better than that of the rustic; his bed was a bag of straw, with a fair round log for his pillow. If he were in easy circumstances, his clothing was of leather; if poor, a wisp of straw wrapped round his limbs kept off the cold." It is a well conceded fact that the majority of the intelligence of the Spanish Peninsula was centered in the Moors and Jews. The Spaniard wasted his time in disputing whether "promises made to an Infidel were obligatory on a Christian." Although the art of printing was invented in 1440, it was thirty-four years before it was taken to Spain, and the first book ever printed in that country was on "The Immaculate Conception of the Virgin." At all their academic celebrations the principal topics were praises to that lady; and as late as 1771 the "University of Salamanca, being urged to teach physical science, refused, and this was its answer: 'Newton teaches nothing that would make a good logician or metaphysician, and Gassendi and Descartes do not agree so well with revealed truth as Aristotle does.'"

Prescott says that lawlessness was in full sway: "Every man's hand seemed to be lifted against his neighbor. Property was plundered; persons were violated; the most holy sanctuaries profaned, and the numerous sanctuaries scattered throughout the country, instead of sheltering the weak, were converted into dens of robbers." The penalties for theft were literally written in blood. "The most petty larceny was punished with stripes, the loss of a member, or of life itself, and the law was admin stered with an unsparing rigor. Capital executions were conducted by shooting the criminals with arrows. The enactment relating to this provides that 'the convict shall receive the sacrament like a Catholic Christian,' and after that be executed as speedily as possible, in order that his soul may pass the more easily." Speaking of the execution of Alvaro de Luna, constable of Spain, the highest officer under the crown, the historian says: "As he ascended the scaffold he surveyed the apparatus of death with composure, and calmly submitted himself to the stroke of the executioner, who, in the savage style of the executions of that day, plunged his knife into the throat of his victim, and deliberately severed his head from his body." The rich paid no taxes. The workingman supplied everything, and the church received her tithes. The papal bulls of indulgences were sold for two hundred maravedis each, and in four years Castile alone spent four million maravedis for these luxuries. As some doubted their efficacy, it was decided by a council that "as the holy father possessed plenary power of absolution of all offenses committed upon earth, and as purgatory is situated upon the earth, it properly fell within his jurisdiction." One painting made after the conquest, by special request, I suppose, represents the Virgin appearing to a Franciscan monk living in Rome, ordering him to go to Mexico and place her image on the pyramid of Cholula, and Humboldt was solemnly assured that a certain extinct volcano had formerly been in flames, "but that a very pious man, vicar of the village, had succeeded by his frequent aspersions of holy water in extinguishing the subterraneous fire." The present liberal government does not place much importance on these monkish stories, as, under the law, all the property of the church, which cost so many millions of lives, has been confiscated to the state, and, unfortunate to relate, neither Archbishop Spaulding's deity, nor St. Jago, nor the Virgin, after all their trouble, and exposure, and throwing dust, has been able to prevent it. I cannot close this already too long article better than by quoting from a letter of Fannie Brigham Ward, published in the Springfield Republican, March 11, 1884. It will giv the reader an insight into the true character of these divinely protected gentlemen.

She says: "The other day, in removing a portion of the old wall in this church for the purpose of putting in side-lights, the workmen came upon several skeletons embedded in a standing position, each blackened skull showing a small round hole above the left eye. I hav one of these skulls now on my desk before me, with a few of the slender bones belonging to it, this smallness indicating that the owner must hav been a woman or a very slight young man. The theory, gleaned from the ancient records of San Augustine (the name of the church) is this: In the days of the Inquisition one mode of punishment for certain offenses against the church was to wall the victims up to the chin, and keep them as horrid examples, in full view of the congregation, till death by starvation was at hand. Then the torture was concluded by driving a small nail into the forehead, and the wall was closed up, hiding the crime, as it was supposed, forever. Other things hav been discovered within the walls of this same San Augustine, which do not tally well with the tale of the pious monks who tore up the pavements because a woman's feet had touched them. For example, when the great high altar was removed to make place for a Protestant pulpit, a square aperture, evidently prepared with care, was discovered piled to the brim with hundreds of tiny skeletons, 'infants bones not a span long,' like those old-time orthodoxy used to describe as the accepted flooring material of hell. What crimes that mysterious vault concealed, by whom committed, and why the evidences were hidden beneath the very holy of holies, instead of being destroyed by fire or acids, none can tell, since both sinned against and sinners hav been dead these many years. But the opinion is beginning to prevail in Zacatecas that these early Frailies were rather jolly old fellows after all, despite the rigors which they exacted from the uninitiated."

The Liberal Club.

Whereas, on sundry boughs and sprays
Now divers birds are heard to sing;
And sundry flowers their heads upraise—
Hail to the coming of the spring.
The songs of the said birds arouse
The memory of our youthful years,
As young and green as the said boughs,
As fresh and fair as the said flowers.
The birds aforesaid, happy pairs,
Love 'midst the aforesaid boughs enshrines
In household nests, themselvs, their heirs,
Administrators and assigns.
Oh, busiest term of Cupid's court!
When tender plaintiffs actions bring,
Season of frolic and of sport,
Hail, as aforesaid, coming spring!

The above, attributed to a prominent legal member of the club, is called out by the fact that Friday evening, the 8th inst., was fair, and gave promis of spring-like weather. As the clock on St. George's Episcopal church was striking eight, the man with the badge pin handed Treasurer Morris ten cents and passed into the hall, where the Three Hundred and Seventy-eighth Regular Meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was about to be held. The hall was crowded, and President Wakeman was reading some notices to the large and intelligent audience. Among other things he said the report in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the last meeting was a remarkable one, and deserved careful consideration. He then introduced Mr. S. E. Shevitch, editor of Volks Zeitung, who was to be the speaker of the evening, and who would speak as one having authority. The subject was "Socialism in the United States." It was feared that the relations between the lecturer and the American language would be dissevered, discordant, and belligerent, but when Mr. Shevitch began to speak it was at once seen that the contest was to be a friendly one. The speaker said that the representations of Socialism that had sometimes been presented to the club were made from the standpoint of blissful and absolute ignorance. This remark was understood to be aimed at Dr. Eccles, and was received with much satisfaction by many persons in the hall. Mr. Shevitch then proceeded to examin the many remedies recommended for the troubles of the world. Competition, co-operation, religion, charity, and trades unions were all condemned as inefficacious. Socialism alone offered an adequate refuge. Mr. Shevitch called clerk "clark," and used the words fool and liar, which, together with their synonyms, had been decided to be unparliamentary at the last meeting of the club. The lecture was very long, and if printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER would fill this paper and reach far into next week.

Dr. Eccles was called for to reply to the lecture, but he was not in the room. Mr. Cohen was there, however, and having attained the platform, he made the greatest effort of his life. He said something was wrong. Things must be changed as they are. The laborer is worthy of his hire. If any one knew of something better than Socialism, they were invited to bring it out for examination. Mr. Cohen's speech was spoken of by a lady visitor as somewhat staccato.

Madam Delescluze followed and made a fierce attack upon Mr. Shevitch. His reference to the church and the board of New York alderman had excited her sympathy for these two honored institutions. She accused the lecturer, in effect, of being a foreigner—aye, a German. He was merely a guest of the American people, and he had outraged the hospitality which they had so generously extended to him

Mr. Sutherland said it took a foreigner to point out the defects of this country. Americans were pretty well satisfied with America, but it didn't seem to suit the gentlemen from Europe. He did not think the lecture had been consistent, and proceeded to call attention to some of the portions wherein it did not consist.

Mrs. Norton spoke by invitation. She said she had come there that evening full of great thoughts, but the lecturer had expressed them. She would therefore only say that people must be born right in order to be happy. Preliminary to this, women must be cared for and made wards of the state.

At the close of Mrs. Norton's observations, somebody said "King!" Then everybody else said King also. This was to convey to Mr. Edward King, there present, the intimation that a speech by him would be appreciated. Borne on a blast of applause that nearly swept him off his feet Mr. King reached the platform, made his manners, and followed them up with the liveliest series of remarks of the evening. He supported Mr. Shevitch in his strictures on the church, and said that Madam Delescluze rushed to the defense of Christianity without pausing to consider whether the charges against it were true or false. Mr. King thought that religion and economics should be kept separate.

Mrs. Leonard arose to say that, speaking of foreigners, we were all foreigners except the North American Indians. Mr. Shevitch then closed the discussion. The lecture is the last one on Socialism for this season. The subject has proved prolific, because it includes all the various economic reforms; and there are very few persons so far behind the age as not to hav some scheme for the reconstruction of society. Next Friday night Courtlandt Palmer will talk about "The New Education: Manual Training an Indispensable Department of It," and everybody knows without being so informed that the lecture will be interesting and valuable.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain.

To the Members of the Executiv Committee, National Liberal League,

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The Congress of the National Liberal League will probably be held at Cleveland, Ohio, in October. It is very necessary that the Executiv Committee at once proceed to devise and carefully consider plans and methods for carrying on the work, and be ready to submit such plans to the consideration of the Congress at its coming sessions.

The need of this work being done by our committee is threefold:

1. Because such plans or methods may require to be advertised with the call of the Congress, in accordance with Article XVIII. of the Constitution;

2. Because members of the Executiv Committee, being representativs of their respectiv states or provinces thus officially invited to make suggestions, propose plans and methods, and being afforded opportunity to consider, criticise, amend, object to, or approve, all plans offered by others, would inspire mutual confidence, prompt mutual forbearance and concessions. And the plans, finally so agreed on, would be sure of hearty co-operation and approval of all sections;

3. Because, if the Congress convenes and then appoints committee for this work, there will not be time to consult all interests—there is liability of grave mistakes from undue haste. And if no practical plans are laid before the Congress at its early sessions, all opportunity for calm consideration will be lost.

You will doubtless agree with me as to the imperativ necessity that the Congress should take such action, and adopt such plans, as shall meet the views and needs, and, as far as possible, unite in harmonious action, the Liberals of all sections, alike in the United States and Canada. We must adopt practical plans to expedite efficient organization; popularize Secularism; decide best methods to raise propaganda fund, to be devoted to extensiv, yet judicious, circulation of Liberal literature and periodicals; open up new fields, and supply needed lecturers; provide facilities for all—especially the women and children—to attain more thorough and scientific education; increase sociability; publish the facts so extensivly that the general public shall realize the necessity of vigilance, and persistent and wisely-directed endeavors to defeat the efforts of the God in-the-Constitution party, calling themselvs the National Reform Association.

A party embracing leading ministers, and the most wealthy and zealous fanatics of the Protestant churches, at their recent convention held at Pittsburgh, Pa., most solemnly pledged themselvs to devote time and means to enforce rigid religious observance of Sunday, which they boldly avowed they "regard as the entering-wedge to secure enforcement of other religious observances, and would help in their great work of making the government entirely subservient to the church."

How shall the aims and objects of the American Secular Union be most speedily accomplished? Your earnest consideration and suggestions are solicited. Too long hav we tamely submitted to oppression, ostracism, and denunciation by religious intolerants—too long tamely sanctioned, by our lack of real, vigorous, united opposition, legislation in favor of special religion. If we believe in the justice of the Nine Demands, if we really desire the secularization of our government, securing equal rights and privileges to all, regardless of religious faith, or the lack of it, then it behooves us to do something more than quietly wish for it, or simply vote "Aye" to high-sounding, euphonious resolutions. We must up and to work. Our adoption of well-expressed resolutions must be backed up by united endeavor.

Will each of you, at your very earliest convenience, write me your suggestions, plans, methods, etc., for carrying on the work?

I will send copies of all suggestions or plans received to each member of the committee, for each one to carefully consider and then return to me with their criticism, objection, or amendments. And such plans or methods as finally meet the approval of the majority, the Executiv Committee will lay before the Congress for its consideration—thus greatly facilitating its work, insuring perfect harmony and consequent triumphant success.

I giv a list of the names and post-office addresses of the members of the Executiv Committee, and respectfully urge your corresponding with each other in regard to this most important matter, and remain Your faithful co-worker,

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

News and Notes from the Field.

KANSAS CITY AND CHICAGO.

Both at Kansas City and Chicago, in spite of many difficulties, the outlook is exceedingly favorable. An organization has been formed at Kansas City in which many prominent citizens will take an activ part. Our earnest, hard-working, and gifted vice-president, Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, with her husband, Judge Arnold Krekel, Dr. Bowker, Dr. Hayden, and others, make success assured. Judge Krekel will deliver from Sunday to Sunday lectures upon civil government, which will be of surpassing interest to all those who desire to see an interpretation of our laws in the light of a real American democracy. Judge Krekel has been for half a century a most painstaking student; his information is wide and accurate, his judgment keen, and his ideas philosophical. He is not warped by precedent. Law to his mind is not the arbitrary creation of the majority, but the just expression of a natural right and custom. The judge is about to publish a student's manual for use in schools, etc., concerning the Constitution, government, and legislation, which will be a most valuable addition to legal literature. Our movement is fortunate in having the aid of such a well-furnished and progressiv representativ of law and order, for certainly no problem is so vast, so interesting, as that of the relation of the individual and society. We must recognize the limitations of freedom, but just what those limitations shall be is the question. The answer requires not only wonderful insight, but patient investigation and adaptation of the wealth of human experience.

Our cause will suffer no defeat in the West while we hav such a standard bearer as Mrs. Krekel. She is not simply an eloquent speaker, but a sagacious and undaunted worker. She has a comprehensiv view of what should now be accomplished for human progress. She is not a dreamer, but a woman whose battle with life has made her strong and independent, yet most tender in feeling, and wise and generous in her judgments. The visit of Mr. Watts and myself in this beautiful, bright, cheery Liberal home, where ten or a dozen gathered daily about the table, and thought flowed in varied contact like sparkling light, will not soon pass from our memory. It givs courage, zeal, and faith in the happy future. Surely the whole race will some time come to this hight of excellence. If one home can be so free from superstition, and yet so gracious, a thousand, a million, will rejoice in the same glory of humanity.

Mr. Watts and myself gave several lectures at Kansas City, and though the weather was stormy, good audiences greeted us at the last. Over thirty names were enrolled for the new organization. The daily papers gave favorable notices, and a wide interest has been created. Both Mr. and Mrs. Krekel made addresses which added greatly to the practical result of the meetings.

We are now in Chicago, and a live League we find, and noble Liberals. Our meetings on Sunday were quite successful; in the evening especially the hall was filled, and Mr. Watts made one of his most eloquent addresses, which was greeted with most enthusiastic applause. Some came from fifty to seventy-five miles to hear these lectures. There was a representativ assembly of thoughtful men and women. Chicago cannot fail to do nobly in the work of the future. All the daily papers gave good reports of the lectures, and thus they reached hundreds of thousands of readers.

Mr. E. A. Stevens, the president of the League, is well known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is one of our ablest workers. I am sorry that he feels the necessity of declining the presidency of the League after this year on account of private business. His aid has been invaluable. He is persevering, self-sacrificing, and ardent. He is thoroughly loyal to his own convictions, and is heartily in favor of the present method of national work. I trust that he will still see his way clear to remain an officer of the League, for though he has noble co-workers, he himself has an admirable capacity for leadership. However, even if he chooses to be a private in the ranks, we know he has too much energy, and too much generosity of spirit, not to be still a most efficient laborer for human advancement.

Mrs. M. A Freeman made a brilliant and eloquent address of welcome and introduction on Sunday evening. She is a gifted lady, and only her modesty has hitherto prevented her from being better known to the Liberal world. She is author of many stories and dramas, and has a rare facility for literary expression. She has been presented recently, by the Chicago Liberal League, with a beautiful gold watch and chain in appreciation of her generous services. She always has crowded houses when she lectures. Mrs. Freeman is, indeed, a graceful orator. I hope the brilliancy of this star will not always be confined even to the mighty city of Chicago. We need her in the national field.

General Trumbull, General Stiles, Van Buren Denslow, Dr. Randall, and others, are able and interesting speakers, and the Chicago League has rich material for its Sunday lectures, which are kept up all the year round, both summer and winter, with full and sometimes overflowing houses.

The thanks of the Liberals of Chicago are due to Messrs. Hannah and Hogg for the generous manner in which they gave the use of Hershey's Hall for the lectures. These gentlemen are in sympathy, I believe, with advanced thought, and so they themselvs will appreciate the value of the gift to our work in this city.

I had the pleasure of meeting with Mr. Otis Favor, one of the prominent members of the Ethical Society in this place, but who is heartily in sympathy with what he deems the somewhat different method and work of the National League. Like Mr. Adler's Society in New York, the Ethical Society here is doing valuable service in the domain of practical morality, but the impression among some of its members seems to be that the National Liberal League is entirely negativ; but there is not a principle or method in the Ethical Society that is not emphasized by the League, and, in every respect, the latter is as constructiv as the former. Therefore, there can be only harmony between these advance movements, for surely scientific ethics are one, and what is based upon human reason and experience cannot lead to diversity, but to unity.

Mr. D. A. Blodgett, of Grand Rapids, came to Chicago to attend the meeting and to complete arrangements for lectures to be given at Grand Rapids next Sunday. Mr. Blodgett is one of the most enthusiastic of Liberals, and is ready with both time and money to advance the interests of the National League.

A Rev. Mr. Gilbert, of Grand Rapids, has taken it upon himself to attack Ingersoll, for which effort he has received many compliments from the friends of the church. His lecture has been published. Mr. Watts will review it next Monday evening, and it is to be hoped that the reverend gentleman and his friends will be present. Mr. Watts has also challenged Mr. Gilbert to a three nights' debate. If I were a believer in prayer, I should certainly pray that this preacher may hav the courage of his convictions and meet his foe in all the brightness of his Christian armor. There can be no better way of spreading the gospel.

Besides our engagements at Grand Rapids on Sunday and Monday, Mr. Watts and myself lecture at Springport Mich., May 12th and 13th; Auburn, Ind., May 15th and 16th; at Louisville, May 24th, and near this date at New Albany, Ind., and Nashville, Tenn.; May 31st, at Cleveland, O.; June 7th, at Canton (the engagement for June 14th is not definitly fixed); June 21st, at Pittsburgh and vicinity; June 28th, at Salamanca. I wish all friends along the route who desire any lectures during this season to make arrangements at the earliest possible moment.

W. S. Bell, who has been laboring in the lecture field this winter, is now in Chicago, and we had the pleasure of meeting him. Like ourselvs, he finds plenty of difficulties, but his courage does not desert him. He still rings for liberty.

Mr. Watts and myself expect to meet our president, Robert G. Ingersoll, to-day, and confer in regard to the future work of Liberalism, and the Conventions of September and October. Fraternally yours,

Chicago, May 6th. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Encouraging Items.

When will Mr. Watts and the activ secretary of the League be able to visit California for a course of lectures? If they can make a tour so far West they shall hav a hearty reception. —B. FORD.

Colonel Ingersoll's letter to Mr. Watts, accepting the office of president to the League, should fill all Liberals with hope for the future. The noble colonel having done his duty, let us do ours and render the League all support possible.—J. WILSON.

SANTA ANA, CAL., May 3, 1885.—At the annual meeting of the Santa Ana Liberal League (268), held to-day, Wm. Chestnut was chosen president, and D. Edson Smith secretary and treasurer for the ensuing year. The meetings of this society will be held the first Sunday of each month.—D. EDSON SMITH.

CHICAGO, May 11th.—Yesterday (Sunday), passing through this city, I happened to see a lecture announced by Charles Watts, of England. I attended and was delighted with the large audience and the excellent lecture, with its powerful delivery and the marked influence it had on those present. To me, an old Liberal, it was really gratifying to see our movement in such a flourishing condition. I shall certainly make an effort to be present at the Cleveland Convention in October next.—A. JACKSON, Prescott, Iowa.

John Wilson writes: "The work being done by Mr. Charles Watts and Samuel Putnam in the lecturing field is, to my mind, truly grand. Never before do I remember so much activity being displayed in the Liberal ranks of America. Mr. Watts seems fitted in every particular for the important position he fills. He is as amiable in private as he is ready and powerful in public, while Mr. Putnam's gentle and kind manner wins for him general respect. With such gentlemen on the platform, and such able papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, our grand cause must triumph."

CATHLAMET, W. T., April 28, 1885.—The Wahkiakum Liberal League held its first meeting the 26th of April, 1885, and the following officers were chosen: President, S. F. Albert; vice-president, W. Y. Thornberg; secretary, Mrs. Lida I. Albert; treasurer, W. Andrews; trustees, J. J. Foster, Charles Stannard, H. M. Bownan. Think we shall adopt the constitution and by-laws as given in the "Truth Seeker Collection." We start with twenty members, but think we shall get nearly all in the place, as there is a strong Liberal element here. Wishing you every success in spreading Freethought over the country.—LIDA I. ALBERT, Secretary.

The following is from Mr. Goodmond, Buffalo: "I am delighted that Colonel Ingersoll has accepted the presidency of our Liberal organization and that he has promised Mr. Watts to be present at the coming Conventions. This is good news, and ought to giv an impetus to our movement. It is to be expected that all friends will do their best to be present, and those who can subscribe to the Campaign Fund should do so at once and thereby show an appreciation of the extensiv work which is being done by that able lecturer and debater, Charles Watts, and by our genial and efficient secretary, S. P. Putnam, to whom I shall shortly send my mite."

Lectures and Meetings.

COLONEL INGERSOLL is delivering his lecture on "Blasphemy" throughout the West. He has lectured at Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, and will lecture on Sunday next in St. Louis, afternoon and evening.

J. E. REMSBURG is still at work in northern Kansas. Friday evening, May 1st, he spoke in Concordia to an audience of five hundred. Saturday evening and Sunday morning he addressed large audiences at Centralia; Sunday afternoon he spoke to a good house in Seneca, and again in the evening to an audience of six hundred. Monday night he lectured at Axtell.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged by the Liberals of Alexandria, Minn., to deliver a course of lectures on the Sundays of May 17th, 24th, and 31st. Other towns in that part of the state, St. Cloud, Sauk Rapids, Fergus Falls, Breckenridge, Moorhead, Glyndon, Herman, Morris, and intermediate points, can secure lectures by Mr. Jamieson by writing to him at Lake City, Minn.

SPEAKING of the approaching publication of the revised Old Testament, and comparing the influence it is likely to exert with the influence of the revised New Testament, the Sun says of the latter: "So far as the doctrins of the church in all its branches are concerned, the revised New Testament has produced no change whatever, and it seems to hav had little or no effect in spreading the faith in the religion it proclaims. Perhaps it has rather tended to increase the modern disposition to weigh and criticize the teachings of Christ, not as the utterances of divinity, but as the words of a religious enthusiast, excited by the contemplation of the sorrows and inequalities of human existence and the awful mysteries of life and destiny. The reader of the revised New Testament approached it with a very different feeling from that with which he opened the pages of the old version. His mood was no longer reverential, but critical."

THE first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER is graced with a well executed cut of the "Modern Balaam," who is confronted by the angel of truth, with the sword of reason in one hand and a scroll of Freethought in the other, while the quill feathers of the wings each represent one of the leading Freethought papers. The ass is a human form with an ass's head, the face of which wears a very tired expression, and is mounted by a dominie who guides it with the rein of credulity and, unconscious of truth's presence, with spurs and the club of hell attempts to drive it past the angel. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a success at the picture business and promises to follow it up. If any more as good as this are to follow, it will pay to take it for this alone, to say nothing of its other excellent qualities.—Missouri Liberal.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1885. A pamphlet of 120 large octavo pages, filled with useful, interesting, and instructiv information, and illustrated with portraits of prominent Liberals. It should be on the table of every Freethinker, as a reference for dates. This useful work will be found in our list of advertised books, and can be had through our agency. It is all that it purports to be, and the price is only 25 cents. The Truth Seeker Company hav displayed commendable enterprise in the publication of such a work. Every Liberal family ought to hav a copy. The engravings are worth the money.—Independent Pulpit.

"Social Problems.—No. III."

Shows, mermaid like, the bust of a fair maiden, but which tapers off below into the fish-tail of our old enemy—government. Certainly, the evil of lands lying idle, while starving labor is kept off of them either by individual or corporate speculators, or by government itself, as now at Oklahoma, is a symptom of social disease that he that runs may read; but the fallacy of expecting the cure of it at the hands of its creator and maintainer, the very axis of all privileges, the power whose betrayal of the people's trust is the sole efficient cause of this disease, is a curious folly, not original with Mr. Malcolm, but which almost confounds him with the George school. Suppose government were, like "existence, though a great misfortune, yet too late to be helped." Why need you ask of its authority more than to make the industrial occupation and use of land essential to titles of proprietorship? Unless, to be still nearer the ideal of justice, you exclude hireling labor from the title of property by use; thus limiting this to small farmers who work it themselvs. Waving the consideration that the privilege to levy taxes lies at the root of others, and of government itself, and pauperizes labor all over the world, let us confine our study to the bearings of a land tax. As a friend of labor, who would leave the "house and barn, clothing and food," untaxed, why do you not exempt also the land within a homestead limitation? Otherwise, your aim will be frustrated by the fact that capitalists owning machinery, as well as land, and employing skilled labor with the steam-plow, reaper, etc., can distance the competition of small farmers and pay much higher rents. Long before our thick-headed clodhoppers could learn to co-operate with machinery, they would be outbidden, exiled, or enslaved, so that the adoption by government of Mr. Malcolm's plan would hasten the advent and intensify the evil of that monopoly which he deplores. Face the figures, will you? Twenty-five acres is the largest average of culture by a man and horse; while, twelve years ago, machinery had reached the point at which three men and a horse plowed two hundred acres per week. Reduce the difference, in consideration of other works incidental to crops, in which such machinery cannot intervene, still the balance in favor of the capitalist employer remains enormous, and will suffice, under a tax of so much per acre, to expel small farmers from the arable surface of the globe. A few of them only may pick up a living among rocks, or where natural obstacles prevent the introduction of machinery, which a few more may tend as hirelings.

Friends of labor, by the help of government and taxes, you draw water like the Danaides, in buckets full of holes. Economic reformers, your wrigglings, within the grasp of the governmental eagle, only serve to bury his talons deeper in your quivering flesh.

What a fine thing, and how superior to the censorship of despotisms, is this freedom of a press, which spontaneously employs itself, under guise of Liberalism, in advocating the measures most favorable to capitalist tyranny!

Monopolists hav swindled labor out of its inventions and machinery for great production by their own cunning, but it is through their willing tool, government, that they wrest the soil from labor, and by a faith currency tax it upon every exchange of productions, in addition to the ostensible revenue. So long as political schemers amuse themselvs with belaboring the national banks, which are paid to grin and bear it, without changing aught in the current superstition that government is a sort of gland whose proper function is to secrete money, they leave us, in our poverty, the consolation of a livelihood by labor independent of money. But when they would vest in the same government, identified with moneyed privilege, the title of proprietorship in the soil, they strike at the laborer's very life. And a high tax on land amounts to the same thing as rent. Either will force him into debt, which, with interest, or even without it in some cases, is ruin and slavery.

Local taxes, for the support of schools, for roads and other public uses, farmers freely contribute without government. A local autonomy, like its component farms, is self-fertilizing; for its local taxes supply local wants, and generally return a profit to the payer, as manure does to the soil. But when local autonomies cede to general governments the taxing power, they commit moral suicide, which is not seldom followed by physical ruin. For here no physiological circuit is formed. Farms and farmers are drained of their substance to glut the insatiable maw of parasites.

But for government taxation any able-bodied man and woman, with common farm tools, dog, and gun, can liv comfortably by moderate labor, without money or merchants, and all the wholesomer for lack of store goods. This I know by experience and observation. But make this primitiv and self-reliant couple tributary to a civil army of chatterboxes and quill-drivers, the pick of the country for knavery, set on them your state hounds, the land agent and the tax collector, and you shall presently hav, as in Europe, a pauperized peasantry with crime for its amusement.

Canadian Notes.

Nearly every family in Toronto hav relativs and friends among the troops who hav marched to the Northwest to fight the rebel half-breeds and Indians. To relieve the anxiety of loving mothers and sisters, the Toronto daily papers issued Sunday editions when any particular telegrams arrived with important news—these issues being frequently gratuitous. Our modern pharisees, the Christian clergy of Toronto, in honor of the imaginary fiend which they nickname God, arrested the poor little helpless newsboys and put them in jail. Edmund E. Sheppard, of the Toronto News, has published "A Sermon to the Preachers." He says:

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN: It seems to me eminently proper that you who preach so much, and express so freely your opinion of other people, should occasionally be preached to yourselvs and hear other people's opinion of you. Permit me to use as a text a passage from the sacred word, though I do not make my living by expounding it, and, perhaps, may interpret more liberally than you do: Matt. xviii, 15-16, "Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." In view of these teachings, and the divine method of remonstrating with an erring brother, it seems to me that you hav made a grave mistake in denouncing the publishers of Sunday newspapers as beyond redemption. Hav you done as your master did when he went about doing good, healing the sick, and opening the eyes of the blind? Did you come to us as to other offenders and reason with us, and, with charity for our mistakes and a desire for our well-doing, ask us to to desist from practices which you deemed sinful and likely to do harm to the people? Never! No Christian word of remonstrance was ever spoken to the offending publishers as far as I know. At once you set the police upon us, and by the might of law you sought to crush what you claim is wrong. You had reasonable and fairly intelligent men to deal with, men whose every interest is allied with the good conduct of the people, and who hav no profit which does not come from the support of the best citizens. You knew this, and yet you preferred to set the dogs of war loose, rather than personally, or collectivly, ask us to desist. "Rev." "Dr." Rose, who is presumably a Christian minister, but who is wearing carnal titles and asking "reverence" which is due alone to the one above, said it would be humiliating to remonstrate with the publishers. In those days when thousands were converted in one day by the preaching of an apostle, the ministers did not hesitate to humble themselvs that the cause of Christ might be exalted. Yet you, who would not humble yourselvs by making a simple request which, as far as I am concerned, would hav been granted, seek to teach us the humility and self-abnegation which you refuse to practice.

Ye preachers of glorious tidings of love to God and good-will toward men, take heed lest in your pride you hav the fall which in Satan's case was from heaven into the deep and gloom-clad valley of darkness! Ye who follow the meek and lowly Nazarene at so much per annum, hav a care! Mind ye that in this wide and so-called wicked world there are men who follow the master afar off, and do deeds far grander than yours.

Those who preach from paneled pulpits to the sinners in cushioned pews hav no monopoly of grace and no mortgage on heaven. Ye who hold fast to forms, and forget to raise the fallen or to strengthen the weak or comfort the suffering, look you that though with flowing diction you speak, with tongues of men and of angels, that, lacking charity, you become as a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

It is possible for even "reverend" gentlemen to go too far. It is possible that people may dread the return of a time when priestcraft ruled the world. Elated with victories over the anti-temperance people, some of the clergy hav become a little too overbearing for their own good. Are you sure you are not like Demetrius the silversmith, who, alarmed lest his craft was in danger, persecuted a great teacher, and cried, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians?" "Sirs, ye know by this craft we hav our wealth." Are you afraid that Sunday newspapers will ruin your congregations and deplete your collections? If not, why this bitter crusade? You know that the newspapers are the great teachers of the present age, and you hav no reason to think that they are not actuated by as noble motivs as your own. If, then, you recognize the power of the press for evil or for good, why do you not seek to lead the publishers aright instead of trying to drive them? You are manifesting the same spirit which in olden times consigned men to the dungeons of the Inquisition and stretched agonized sufferers on the rack. You know right well, "reverend" sirs, that you hav lost both the methods and the power of the apostolic faith. You know that your business is as secular as that of the editor, your efforts as mercenary, your lives as cold, and your hearts as unwarmed by divine grace. You know that the tinsel of the show, the carpets and the cushions, the fashionable ushers, and the costly choir, repel the poor worshiper, and the poor no longer hav the gospel preached to them except in shabby missions by volunteer evangelists, who, unlike you, giv their toil as a love offering to the master, while you in riches, and often in comparativ idleness, seek to appear busy, faithful, and zealous by a noisy clamor and a pursuit of Sunday newspapers, knowing that the world will hear of your "Society for the Suppression of Vice," though it never learns that you are possessed of that charity that envieth not, charity which vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, is not easily provoked, and thinketh no evil.

You draw your salaries and preach, but you convert few sinners; you do not pay taxes, and yet seek to dictate the taxes of others; you toil less than the painstaking editor, and are paid better though you do less good; you say, "Let brotherly love continue," and yet you count all that are not with you as an enemy, and refuse to admonish him as a brother; you can manipulate the dead languages, but you cannot manipulate live human hearts unless behind your oratory there shines the light of a manly heart which burns with zeal, and is warmed with love. You preach for money, and you know it. If your salaries were stopped your sermons would cease, even though you know "ye were not redeemed with corruptible things such as silver and gold."

Remember these things, reverend sirs. You should in future conduct yourselvs more scripturally; resign your salaries and fat livings, and liv the life of self-abnegation, the noble example of which was set you by the master, or else be less violent in your intolerant bigotry.

Reverend sirs, you hav much to reform within yourselvs and your churches, where the flesh and pride of life are of rank growth. If the good work is never retarded by more serious stumbling-blocks than Sunday newspapers, you will hav reason to be happy, and your flocks will no longer need your services.

EDMUND E. SHEPPARD,
Editor Toronto Daily News.

On Sunday evening last Mr. J. Ick Evans lectured in Albert Hall on the subject, "What is Christianity, and Who are Christians?" Applause and laughter were loud and frequent from the crowded audience. A piano solo, "The Mermaid's Song," from the opera "Oberon," by Carl Muria Von Weber, was played by a little girl nine years of age. A reading was given, "A Sermon to Preachers," by Edmund E. Sheppard, the editor of the Toronto Daily News. The entertainment was a most successful one.

Toronto, Can., May 6, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

"Only Wait a Little Longer."

That is what is being repeated to woman suffragists on all sides, by all parties.

That was the admonition of the old Antislavery veterans, when the Republican party was formed. When at last victorious, did it fulfil its promis?

No. Pre-eminently a party of a broken pledge, it went on its highhanded way to defeat.

Had it kept its pledge at the time of Grant's second nomination, he might hav held a third term, and the party hav still been in power.

Woman suffragists all over the country fought for Grant's election by every means in their power (thus helping to bring him an overwhelming victory) as valiantly as ever he fought for the country. Alas! to what purpose?

Now the Prohibition party hav arisen to re-repeat, "Only wait a little longer."

They hav remanded woman back to the states for suffrage while they are attempting to "steal our thunder"—our sixteenth amendment.

"Only wait a little longer, till we hav scotched the whisky-demon, then We [with a big W] will giv you the ballot."

Do you believe them? Are men so magnanimous in politics that they do not find some ready excuse, some apology better than none, for not keeping their promis?

Now a bomb has exploded in their camp. Miss Willard has had "a divine revelation" that all women are to work especially for suffrage, this "revelation" undoubtedly originating from the conviction which the suffragists hav all along entertained that Prohibition will never become national without the ballot in woman's hand.

Of this the liquor-dealers, also, hav all along been convicted; hence their bitter hostility to woman's political freedom.

Could not the new party in their blindness see that ere the end they might, like the old party, hav to make a "military necessity" of the emancipation of woman?

And the Liberalists. "What has been done?" Dr. Juliet Severance pertinently asks in THE TRUTH SEEKER for April 25th. They hav made "Nine Demands" for the secularization of the government. Supposing they had included a Tenth Demand for the enfranchisment of woman. You think they would hav been "overloaded?" The "perfect love" of liberty, like the perfect love of anything else, "casts out all fear." Do you expect the majority of intelligent, liberty-loving, long-suffering women to do aught else but let you work out your own salvation, with fear and trembling? Hav not the white-haired veterans in the cause "possessed their souls in patience" for lo! these many years?

How many dollars more do you suppose you would get for that much-coveted tent if you had a woman suffrage plank in your platform? How many more glad voices would be heard by tongue and pen for your party. Just imagin all the woman suffragists on your side! Perhaps you would be scared. Perhaps that is why these wondrous Liberals never so much as thought or dreamed of a Tenth Demand.

But no; "woman should not invade man's domain." Poor man! What a helpless being he is! He cannot liv without invading woman's domain, as man-milliner, dressmaker, corset-mender, tape-measurer, teacher of A B C's, etc. Well, let him. The more the merrier. Woman cares to invade his domain only to put things to rights, to clear up the filth and purify the atmosphere.

LEWISE OLIVER.

What Mr. Bell Has Been Doing.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I regret to report that Liberals are not activ in this state in organizing new Leagues or in reviving old ones. It is with great difficulty that the Freethought lecturer finds opportunities to talk about liberty and justice. However, I hav found a few chances to giv public lessons on these grand themes. On the 20th inst. I spoke twice in Elgin, Ill., where some years ago there was a very flourishing League. As in other places, the Elgin Liberals, or rather half-liberals, hav ceased to take any interest in carrying on the League work, and hav left the burden to fall upon a few who are not able to shoulder it alone. I find in many places the very best Liberals saddled with the expenses, while scores of others, calling themselvs Liberals, will do nothing. The man who has not enthusiasm enough to support the Liberal papers and occasionally do his share in defraying the expenses of a Liberal lecture, is not much of a Liberal. I stopped with our good friends I. W. Archibald and wife, who are Liberals of the right stripe. Mrs. Archibald is an artist, and paints very handsome oil pictures. Mr. Archibald deals in sewing machines and organs, and the Liberals who can will find it to their advantage to deal with him.

Yesterday I returned from Rochelle, Ill., where I gave three lectures. The people of that city had never had the tranquil air of their town disturbed by such teaching, and consequently to some of them it was not so delectable as the glorious gospel, which so cheers the heart of God and man by the sweet doctrin of total depravity, that hell is crammed with infants damned, without a day of grace—the good news which informs us that the whole race deserves to roll in the eternal fires of hell; the glad tidings that assure us that nine-tenths of the human family will get there. My audiences were, however, on the whole pleased with the lectures, and as an evidence of the fact, I am happy to say that on the 24th of May I am to go there again to giv my lecture on Anti-Prohibition.

I was very kindly entertained by our well-known Liberal writer, Otto Wettstein, who is certainly a man of large and Liberal ideas, having a head which measures twenty-six inches, in good working order.

Mr. Wettstein is a jeweler, and carries a large stock of excellent goods, and I can confidently recommend the Liberals of the country to trade with him, not only on the ground of his being an honorable man, but because I am quite confident that he sells genuin, first-class goods at lowest possible rates. His new badge pin is something any Liberal may be proud to wear, as it is a gem of art. Mrs. Wettstein was ill, temporarily I trust, and I was much disappointed in not having the pleasure of meeting her.

Chicago, Ill., April 27, 1885. W. S. Bell.

The Michigan State Association.

The State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists concluded its nineteenth annual meeting at this place yesterday. All things considered, it was one of the most successful ever held. At the closing exercises last evening an audience of fully 500 was present. The exercises throughout were marked by harmony, earnestness, and determination. The speakers from the state were J. H. Burnham and Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, while Mr. Babcock, as a citizen of St. Johns, was cordially and enthusiastically received, and attentivly listened to, by his fellow-townsmen and those from other parts of the state. The addresses were all of the high order characteristic of the speakers. W. A. Mansfield, the state writing medium, was present, and gave good satisfaction by his tests. Mr. Garnsey, editor of the New Era, the new Spiritualist and Liberal paper at Grand Rapids, together with the Misses Shaw and others, rendered excellent music. The friends in St. Johns entertained with a most cordial hospitality, and nothing was wanting to round out the general satisfaction of the occasion. The expenses were all liberally met, and the Association has no financial obligation hanging over it.

The following officers were elected: President, J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw; secretary, Mrs. M. Babcock, St. Johns; treasurer, Mrs. M. A. Jewett, Lyons; director, Mrs. Ida A. McLin, Battle Creek. S. L. Shaw, of Saranac, was chosen director to fill the vacancy caused by the advancement of Mr. Burnham to the presidency. Acting Secretary.

Christianity and Business.

The Christian church relies but little upon argument for victory over the Freethought movement of our day. Its methods are becoming more Jesuitical every year. At my home here, Lake City, Minn., I attended a Congregational conference of ministers. One "divine" insisted that it is the duty of Christians to see to it that none but Christian men and women should be permitted to teach in our common schools or higher institutions of learning. Even if the teacher does not teach Infidelity, it is enough that he or she is an Infidel. The influence is bad.

That is an indication of how the church respects honest conviction.

Last Monday the Congregational Club met in the Pilgrim church, Minneapolis, and the Tribune reports the following:

"Rev. M. W. Montgomery presented certain statistics as to the religious attitude of Minneapolis business men which elicited some surprise. Inquiries had been made at his instance in regard to the church membership of the proprietors and official heads of various leading business houses of this city. The first line of manufacture investigated included 20 proprietors and officers, so far as the inquiry went, 18 of whom were church-members, and the other 2 nominal Christians, i.e., believers in the Christian religion. Of 23 proprietors and officers of sash, door, and blind manufactories, 20 are Christian men (i.e., members of churches), and 3 are nominally Christian. Of 30 proprietors and heads of sawmills, 25 are professing Christians, and five nominal Christians. Of 47 proprietors and officers of 17 flour mills, 32 are professed Christians, 14 nominal Christians, and 1 opposed to Christianity. The millers' association thus proves to be almost as religious a body as the Monday ministers' meeting. The wholesale men make an excellent showing also. Of 46 proprietors and managers of 18 wholesale houses, 37 are professing Christians, 7 are nominal Christians, and 2 are opposed to Christianity. Of 182 directors and officers of 15 banks, 127 are professed Christians, 47 are nominal Christians, and 8 are opposed to Christianity. Summing up these figures, a total of 82 of the largest business establishments of Minneapolis hav 391 proprietors and leading officers, 286 of whom are church members (all Protestant), 94 are nominally Christian, and 11 are not believers in the Christian religion. A member of the club interposed a query as to the religious condition of the real estate men; but the gentleman who had gleaned the figures had not ventured to look up the dealers in Minneapolis dirt. It was understood that in making his figures he had not attempted to cull out the religious firms."

Like nearly all Jesuitic maneuvers, it is harmless in appearance to the casual observer. The list of pious firms is not published, but who will say that the list is not preserved for the use of the saints? It is surprising, if the Rev. Mr. Montgomery's statistics are designed to show the general drift of thought among Minneapolis manufacturers, that nearly all of them are Christians, nominal or actual. Antichristians cut a very small figure. Materialists and Spiritualists are not mentioned. Yet, strange to say, Minneapolis, above any city on the continent, according to size, is saturated with Spiritualism and scientific Materialism.

Why was that clerical tour of inquiry made? Has it no bearing on trade? Why should the investigation of manufacturers stop with "twenty proprietors and officers?" He confesses this is as far as the inquiry went. Does the Congregational Club mean nothing by its investigation into the piety of business men? The church already has its thumb on the free school system of this nation. The shepherds notify their sheep to hire no Freethinking wolf to teach their children. I hav met with several instances where excellent teachers were denounced and discharged on no other ground than because they are Freethinkers. Some of those Liberals stood high in state universities. I know an able teacher who was compelled to adopt the law as his profession. I know another who was forced out of a university (he was one of its most gifted professors) into insurance business. All because those teachers are not loving Christians.

When all Infidels are quietly weeded out of our institutions of learning, it will giv Christianity prestige as its devotees proudly inquire, "Where are your Infidel schools, colleges, teachers?" It will soon be supplemented with the Congregational Club chorus, "Where are the Freethinking merchants?" Piety and profit, friends.

Well, let them whistle their courage up. They will need it. W. F. Jamieson.

Mr. Perry—Mr. Truesdell.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: When I first read in your paper Mr. J. R. Perry's statement that members of the Seybert Commission had expressed an opinion favorable to the Spiritualistic theory regarding the exhibitions of Dr. Henry Slade, I was charitable enough to believe that when corrected, Mr. Perry would hav the fairness to acknowledge his error; but I was mistaken in my estimate of the man.

In your issue of the 18th inst. Mr. Perry not only fails to do this simple act of justice to those he has traduced, but adds insult to injury by repeating the slander, and further stating that he has "direct information from those who know," in substance, that members of the commission hav privately violated their pledge to themselvs and to the public. On the 23d instant I addressed a copy of the inclosed letter to the various members of the commission, and received in every case a reply denying most emphatically the truth of the charges made by Mr. Perry. Among these letters is one written on a postal card, which I feel at liberty to publish. Below is the correspondence:

Syracuse, April 23, 1885.

Dr. Joseph Leidy, My Dear Sir: Various statements hav recently appeared in Spiritual and Secular papers, to the effect that members of the "Seybert Commission" hav acknowledged their inability to account for certain phenomena exhibited through Dr. Henry Slade, except upon the hypothesis of spirit power. I had supposed that no intimation of an opinion would be made, either pro or con, by any member of the commission until their official report is rendered. Will you kindly inform me if there is any truth whatever in the reports referred to? Respectfully, John W. Truesdell.

Philadelphia, April 25, 1885.

John W. Truesdell, Dear Sir: In answer to your letter of yesterday, there is no truth in the report that the Seybert Commission hav given expression to their opinion as to the exhibitions of Dr. Henry Slade or any other professed Spiritual medium. As you hav supposed, all that is learned by the commission in relation to Spiritualism will be reserved for a final report. Respectfully, Joseph Leidy.

Unless Mr. Perry can giv to the public the name of one member of the commission who has expressed an opinion that Dr. Slade's tricks are of spiritual origin, let him at this late day apologize, or stand convicted in the eyes of the people of circulating a report which he knows to be untruthful in every particular.

After explicitly stating that he has never read "Bottom Facts," and has no intention to do so, Mr. Perry at once proceeds to unequivocally condemn the work and ventilate his entire ignorance of its contents.

Regarding the $500 reward offered in said book, Mr. Perry says: "If John W. had offered $500 for any writing upon a closed slate of his own selection, without the contact of any part of the medium's body in the manipulation of the slate, that would be a fair proposition, but he knows better than that."

If Mr. Perry had read the book which he so bitterly denounces, he would hav discovered that this "fair proposition" made by him is in substance the very one I hav had standing—unaccepted by Spiritual mediums—before the public during the last two years. As he has been pleased to change the wording without destroying the substance, I will accept his proposition verbatim. If Mr. Perry will bring any medium in the world to this city and cause writing to appear in my presence as worded by himself above, I will reward him with $500.

Again Mr. Perry says, "Mr. Truesdell bets on his own game and is sure to win." This I deny. I am not a betting man, and I defy Mr. Perry to point out a single statement in all my writings upon the subject of Spiritualism which can be tortured into the nature of a bet. It is a hard thing to tell any man that "he knows better," but if Mr. Perry does not know better than to thus misrepresent me, he has read press notices of my book, and my own writings during the last two years, to little purpose. One of his own correspondents writes me that she has repeatedly informed him that my offer is not in the nature of a bet, but a reward.

To show that Mr. Perry is not so ignorant of the nature of my offer as appears, also his unfairness as an investigator, I quote—with permission—from his autograph letter before me, dated Nov. 4, 1884, in which, after stating that "Mr. Truesdell must not be present at the sitting" (!), he continues, "In this way, free from all mental and magnetic and spiritual excitement and opposition, Mr. Truesdell can be relieved of his $500 as easily 'as a piece of greasy pork will slide down a lightning rod.'"

Again Mr. Perry says: "Then the writing must be from the dead. Here is his loophole of escape. If a dozen spirits should write as many words upon a slate, he could easily insist that they were not written by the dead." I most certainly should deny that spirits of the dead did the writing, provided I detected—as I hav repeatedly upon similar occasions—spirits of the living in the act of producing the phenomena through the physical hand of the so-called medium.

No one will deny that the living can write upon a slate. It is the dead that skeptics want to hear from. If Mr. Perry is willing to admit that slate-writing is not executed by the dead, then further argument upon the subject is useless.

I do not believe that spirits of the dead can communicate by writing with the living, because I hav never witnessed any genuin phenomena of the kind during more than thirty years of careful investigation.

I am called by hundreds of people a slate-writing medium myself. I hav "developed" (!) a good many slate-writers—jugglers—like Watkins and Caffray, who now sell their tricks to the credulous as genuin spirit phenomena. Since the appearance of "Bottom Facts," in which is explained how slate-writing is done, I hav received letters by the score from prominent mediums and laymen asking to be "developed" for slate-writing. Nevertheless, if our dead friends can write, I am willing and anxious to be convinced of the fact.

Is it reasonable to suppose that I would, if I could, exert any "will-power" over the spirit world to defeat the object of my offer? Is there a person in the world who would not be happy to know for a certainty that life continues beyond the cold, cheerless grave? Is it fair to insinuate that any sane individual can be found who would refuse to part with any number of paltry dollars he might possess for proof positiv that he would sometime inherit that immeasurable boon called immortality?

We all want to believe in future life, but we are not willing to quietly shut our eyes and ears to fraud, and, "lamb-like," innocently swallow with a relish all the senseless gush and sickening "Lily Dove" twaddle prepared for the credulous by professional sharpers. As I hav before written upon this point, I may be pardoned for rewriting the following: Thers is hardly one among us who does not crave positiv proof of continued existence and identity of loved ones gone before; but when evidence is offered to us in the dark circle, or in very dim light, surrounded by such conditions—invariably exacted—as preclude fair investigation; when our pure and loving mothers, our fair daughters, or guiltless babes, appear at the cabinet window and regale us with mixed odors of onions and tobacco, unclean teeth and poor whisky, we should, at least, be treated courteously by our opponents if we are skeptical as to the identity of our friends. John W. Truesdell.

A Bill To Be Defeated.

Mr. Daggett, commonly known as "Al.," has introduced in the Senate of this state a bill to set aside three-one-hundredths of the annual expenses of the city of Brooklyn to form a charity fund to be divided among the institutions of that city.

This is another attempted church steal. The attempt is made in the interest of Catholics, who, from the fact that they furnish the most paupers, possess the greatest number of charities. Though progressed to the third reading, the bill should be defeated. Brooklyn can support her poor in her own institutions cheaper than in those of any of the churches.

"I Came Not to Bring Peace but a Sword."

The distressing spectacle of two of the mightiest nations of the world plunging at each other's throat will probably be witnessed within a year. Russia and England seem bound to fight, and the fight will be desperate and bloody. Hundreds of thousands of men will be arrayed in the field, and in every battle thousands will die. Heaven will be filled up fast.

It is noticeable in this case that the parties are all Christians, and that the more orthodox nation—the one closer to the primitiv barbarity called Christianity—is the more eager for the contest. Russian piety takes the form of Greek Catholicism, the oldest of the Christian divisions, and for several centuries the chief supporter of its claims. The Greek church produced the first Christian literature, the first apologies of the Christian faith, the first refutations of heretics, the earliest commentaries of the Bible, sermons, homilies, and ascetic treatises. Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Constantine the Great, and all the great lights of the early church belonged to the Greek communion. The Greek church elaborated the dogma of the trinity, and ruled the first seven ecumenical councils of the church. There can be no question of the soundness of its orthodoxy. The czar is the head of the church as well as of the empire.

England, too, has a state religion, established, say the Catholics, through Henry the Eighth's desire to marry Annie Boleyn. The Church of England's Thirty-Nine Articles are the essence of Christianity, "except which a man believe he cannot be saved." England has, it is true, a large amount of religious heresy within her borders, and a large number of Secularists, but these with one accord cry for peace and the submission of national differences to arbitration. But peace societies and advocates are powerless before the Christian thirst for Christian blood in response to Russia's challenge to fight or lose the practical protectorate over territory the occupation of which might be dangerous to English supremacy in India. Russia is a country of some eighty millions of Christians, England of some thirty-five millions, with a vast province of some three hundred millions of Mohammedans, Parsees, Buddhists, and other sects as a tributary.

We are told that God is love, that Christ is the very apostle of peace, that all men are brethren, but yet the very nations loudest in these professions, and supporting thousands upon thousands of priests and ministers to iterate and reiterate them, are the promptest to threaten a resort to the sword when affronted. Though the Chinese may hav invented gunpowder, the Christians hav improved vastly in its use. Krupp cannon, Gattling guns, repeating rifles, torpedoes, and all the horrible instruments of modern warfare are Christian inventions, and are used by Christian nations. The Infidels who are protesting against their use are laughed at, and their doctrins sneeringly termed "uncanny" and too good for this world. And so they may be for the present attainment of Christians to civilization. But it is a curious and not very flattering commentary upon some seventeen centuries of Christian preaching, and would seem to indicate that an enormous mistake had been made in the claims for the "only divine religion."

The Foolishness of Methodism.

"In 1729 two young men in England, reading the Bible, saw they could not be saved without holiness; followed after it; and incited others so to do. In 1737 they saw, likewise, that men are justified before they are sanctified; but still holiness was their object. God then thrust them out to raise a holy people."

From these words of John and Charles Wesley and their subsequent labors sprang the Methodist Episcopal church. The Methodists hav "ten doctrins of grace," the first of which is,

"I believe that all men are sinners."

Supposing this to be so, whose fault is it? Holding, as the Methodists do, that the condition of man, "after the fall of Adam," is such that he cannot redeem himself from the charge of being a sinner, but must hav the "grace of God by Christ" in his heart, we fail to see how men are in any way censurable for being sinners, because Christ is known to but a very small proportion of the human world. If every man is corrupt in his nature, and very far gone from original righteousness, inclined to evil and that continually, God must hav made him so, and this first doctrin of grace is a reflection upon God. If the second doctrin is true, that

"God loves all men and hates all sin,"

Why did he make all men sinners? It would hav been as easy for a "God of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness" to hav kept man up to the highwater mark of original righteousness, as to make him corrupt in his very nature, and thus eternally damn him for what is in no wise his fault. Would it not hav been more just for this God to hav damned himself?

The third "doctrin of grace" is:

"I believe that Jesus Christ died for all men, to make possible their salvation from sin, and to make sure the salvation of all who believe in him."

How can Christ's death make possible the salvation of the two-thirds of the human race who never heard of him? If their salvation from sin depends upon the "grace of God by Christ," as we are assured it does, was it not an act of injustice upon God's part not to hav informed the people of that fact? He might at least hav started a newspaper, printed in all the languages chattered since the fall of the tower of Babel, to let the heathen know of it. If Christ can take upon himself the sins of those who believe in him, they thus escaping hell; if God loves all men and wishes to meet them in heaven, why was Christ's visit to the earth cut short before he had time to take the trip around the world? And if his suffering redeems men, why should he not go to the lower regions, take the sins of the occupants upon himself, and suffer in their stead? He would benefit a billion times more souls than he did in his short career upon the earth.

The fourth doctrin of grace affirms:

"That the holy spirit is given to all men to enlighten and to incline them to repent of their sins and to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ."

How can the holy spirit be given to all men when "all men" never saw, felt, or heard of such a thing? Do the Methodists think that all men are Christians?

The fifth doctrin also affirms that:

"All who repent of their sins and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ receive the forgivness of sin."

The technical term for this is "justification." In following this out we must come to the inevitable conclusion that all who do not believe in the "Lord Jesus Christ" are not forgiven, and the consequences of such unbelief are unhealthy, and dangerous to their future welfare. But what injustice lurks here! God made man, and gave him a brain. To operate upon this brain requires certain phenomena, or evidences, which God withholds, and consequently the man is damned. Then who is to blame? Surely not the man. No matter how hard he may try, he cannot believe unless something takes place to convince him. But the holy spirit, we are told, is given to all men to incline them to believe. Then why does the holy spirit not make itself manifest?

But this fifth doctrin is the beginning of a line of reasoning which seems to shut the holy spirit out from all. Although the holy spirit is given to all men, yet by implication only those can receive assurance of its presence who hav first been made children of God.

The sixth doctrin goes on to say that,

"All who receive the forgivness of sin are at the same time made new creatures in Christ Jesus."

And then,

"All who are made new creatures in Christ Jesus are accepted as the children of God."

And then,

"All who are accepted as the children of God may receive the inward assurance of the holy spirit to that fact."

First we are told that the holy spirit is given to incline men to God, but at last, that in order to receive assurance of the presence of the holy spirit we must be children of God. This is reasoning in a circle, and to most people the difficulty is to know how to get into that circle. Where is the beginning of this golden thread?

The ninth doctrin is:

"That all who truly desire and seek it may love God with all their heart and soul, mind and strength, and their neighbors as themselvs."

We think we see in this doctrin the reason why so many Methodist parsons adorn our penitentiaries. A man and his wife are one. This, we believe, there is scripture for. The ministers truly desire and seek to love their neighbors as themselves. The man being away from home a good deal, the minister is unable to love him, and so loves the wife, which, according to scripture, is all the same. This leads to trouble, and trouble of a certain kind leads to the penitentiary.

But why should this doctrin be necessary? Does everybody in the world naturally hate God, and hav to make a strenuous effort to abate their hatred? Then there must be some good reason for it, and perhaps the reason is found in this very idea of total depravity. Ought not people to hate the God that made them totally depraved, inclined continually to evil, when he could just as easily hav made them perfect? If their wills were free, they certainly should choose to hate him; and if their wills are not free, and their minds controled by the strongest influences, God's action in this respect would be strong grounds for enmity.

But the crowning "doctrin" is the tenth. If the nine are foolish, the tenth is fiendish. It is eternal damnation for all but the saints:

"I believe that all who persevere to the end, and only those, shall be saved in heaven forever."

Presbyterians call this doctrin "perseverance of the saints." In Methodist nomenclature, it is "the true final perseverance." About the only real difference between the two is that in Presbyterianism the saints are entitled to no credit for persevering, God ordaining who shall and who shall not attain celestial bliss, while the Methodists maintain that a man can be sanctified through his own efforts, and that those attaining sanctification stand a chance of persevering to the end. But if they backslide, they are lost, for only those who so persevere shall be saved in heaven forever. This doctrin is a premium on late repentance. Suppose a man gets converted at twenty. He perseveres for a few years, and then backslides from grace; though he may liv a life worthy of all praise, yet he is condemned. On the other hand, a man leads the wickedest kind of a life till he comes finally to the edge of the grave. Then he repents, and, being too weak to be wicked, he perseveres to the end. He is saved in heaven forever. If this doctrin be true, a very small proportion of the people of the world will get to heaven—principally murderers who are hung, and others passing away without time to fall from grace. Late repentance should be the rule, for very few can hold out for a term of years against the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil. This trinity is altogether too much for the average person, and even frequent revivals are inadequate to attract from the broad road that leadeth to destruction. What an impotent or a wicked God that cannot, or will not, keep his children out of hell! What a foolish scheme that depends upon impossibilities for its success! What a humbug is the church that sells tickets to heaven, and leaves ninety-nine of every hundred passengers a million miles from the gates! Presbyterianism has no chance for the failure of the elect. Methodism has stolen the retributiv terrors of Presbyterianism, but has made the possibility of avoiding them infinitly smaller.

More Information for a Contemporary.

To our revealment for its benefit of the sources of the Freethought literature circulated so extensivly in Asia as to cause the missionaries alarm, the Independent replies:

"We are informed by THE TRUTH SEEKER that the translation, publication, and circulation of Infidel literature in Asia, to which we referred recently, is done by Asiatic Freethinkers, chiefly at their own expense. We could hardly credit such benevolence to English and American Infidels. But the organ of Infidelity assures us that 'thousands of people are willing to giv of their substance' to save those nations which are not Christian from the 'blight and curse' of Christianity. It evidently prefers the civilization of India and China to that of the United States and Great Britain."

With whatever sense or nonsense there may be in the first part of this paragraph, we hav no concern at present. In the last sentence, however, there is a glaring non sequitur. Only on the assumption that the civilization of the United States and Great Britain is the result solely of Christianity can our contemporary say that we prefer the civilization of India and China. But civilization is in no manner the result of Christianity. On the contrary, it has taken centuries for the civilized people to get Christianity up to their own level, and the task is scarcely complete.

Christianity, for decades upon decades, dragged Great Britain through the blood and flame of religious persecutions, and the early settlers of this country, though a good deal nearer being orthodox Christians than the editor of the Independent, were not half so civilized as that gentleman. Christianity has been, and is, an obstacle to civilization. Leaving out of sight for a moment the wars it has waged, the inquisitions and star chambers it has established, the thousands of autos-da-fé its priests hav held—letting all these go, yet history's indictment against the church is terrible in its compact showing of her opposition to progress in every science and in almost every art. Priestly opposers hav barricaded with Bibles the path of almost every special science from Bruno to Lyell, from Servetus to Darwin. And even to-day, in our own city, when it is proposed to further civilize the laboring people by opening to them new sources of inspiration, instruction, and delight, the church is the one opponent.

India and China can hav carried to them whatever is good in the civilization of the western world unburdened by an irrational and absurd theology—infinitly more irrational and absurd than their own—which the best and most civilized people of the Western world are struggling against and endeavoring to shake off. The Independent itself is a protest against the Christianity of John Wesley and Jonathan Edwards, and in their time would hav been considered as heterodox to simon-pure, hell-fire Christianity as the pantheistic Bruno was to Catholicism. Universalism, Unitarianism, Beecherism, Newtonism, the recent split in New England Congregationalism over matters of eschatology, are all endeavors to civilize the very Christianity whose advocates, in intemperate moments, claim it as the source of all civilization. A great many absurd, irrational, and ridiculous dogmas hav been civilized out of it already—many more must be. As fast as people grow in the grace of knowledge they backslide in the "grace of God" as contained in the Christian church. It is a most fallacious idea that Christianity is the parent of civilization, or that the Christianizing of "heathen" nations must precede their elevation. The climate of a country has more to do with the welfare of its people than all the sermons or prayer-meetings that could be preached or held between now and the crack of doom. And our esteemed contemporary should not forget to store that fact away among the gray matter of its brain. It will be handy to know.

The Opening of Our City Museums

The Park Commissioners of this city hav passed a resolution to open the Museums of Art and Natural History in Central Park to the free use of the public on Sundays. But there is to be the usual fight on the matter. As soon as the action of the commissioners became publicly known the church people made it their business to see the Board of Trustees of the Art and Natural History Museums, and hav since been exerting their utmost influence to get the trustees to refuse to allow the request of the Park Commissioners for the opening of the buildings on Sunday. Among the trustees of the art building are Soapfatman Colgate, who livs in Orange, N. J Morris K. Jessup, Colgate's right bower in bigotry; Dr. John Hall, ministerial supporter of both, and others equally set in their determination to prescribe what other people may do. Against them are Benjamin H. Field, James M. Constable, of the well-known firm of Arnold, Constable & Co., and a majority of the Park Commissioners. The city pays $5,000 a year to support the Art Museum, and certainly the people hav some right to see the treasures contained therein. But if the church can prevent it they will not be allowed to do so. Even one of the gentlemen in favor of opening the building on Sundays wishes the hours restricted to between two P.M. and sunset, "so all who desire to attend church can do so in the morning, and can spend the evening as they see fit." One would suppose by this that the opening of the museum would be accompanied by the enacting of an ordinance compelling people to visit it. Or is Mr. Field, who expressed these sentiments, painfully aware that, as between the church and museums as attractions, the former would hav no chance? Park Commissioner Crimmins's sentiments are more worthy of a New Yorker. When appealed to for his opinion on this subject he said:

"There is no doubt about this thing meeting with success, I think. Of course, it may encounter some opposition, but in the end popular opinion will prevail. Just as when Sunday music was first broached, some church people were up and in arms against it, but so soon as it was allowed they came over, and besides some of the most prominent members of the clergy applauding the idea, our leading citizens were only too willing to follow in the same line and approve of all. So with the opening of the museums, just as soon as the benefits are seen, just so soon will these straitlaced fellows come over, and be glad the resolution was carried out. In England, it is true, the opposition to the opening of the museums on Sunday was carried to almost serious consequences, but even with this the masses were successful in their demands after all. I hav always thought it a pity the working people of this city were not given the chance to visit the museums, and now that the opportunity has come, if the trustees of the museum of Art hav any consideration for humanity and justice they will grant our request."

One of the objections that the trustees advance is that the additional expense would seriously embarrass them. This can easily be overcome by the city appropriating the money needed, and it would undoubtedly be done with alacrity. Another objection is that many bequests hav been made to the museums on condition that they shall not be opened on Sundays. This objection is hardly worthy of consideration. Such bequests constitute but an infinitesimal part of the exhibit, and might safely be returned to the donors or their heirs. The value of the museum is measured solely by the use that is made of it. Accessibility on Sunday would certainly increase its value to the people who pay for it, and far outweigh the value of the specially-conditioned bequests. And an exhibit not fit to be seen on Sunday is not fit to be seen any day, and might, advantageously to the morals of the visitors, be immediately withdrawn.

Another thing the straitlaced fanatics of the church may well consider, and that is that the closing of these instructiv places of resort drives the people to beer saloons, which in this city can no more be closed than miracles can be performed by ministers. Are they willing to take the responsibility of making drunkards for the sake of "respecting" a Sabbath for the appointing of which a pagan politician is responsible?

Editorial Notes.

THE attitude of Catholicism toward our public schools—a problem of grave concern at the present time—is to be discussed from opposit premises in the June number of the North American Review, by M. C. O'Byrne, of North Carolina, against the Roman Catholic church, and Bishop Keane, of Virginia, in defense of its policy.

A SAN FRANCISCO Chinaman remarked to a Christian the other day that the church sent thousands of dollars to China to "prepare her people for a home in heaven, but refused them a home in the United States." This indicates that the Christians consider the United States a better country than heaven. They are right for once.

Our neighbor Truth, of Pittsburgh, has done a good thing in copying from the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC FOR 1885 Dr. J. L. York's article on Liberalism. We mention this to assure those who read the article, and do not know where Truth got it, that the ANNUAL contains other contributions of equal value. Everybody should hav the ANNUAL.

WE hav received a number of papers containing Clark Braden's fulminations against the town of Liberal, and hav forwarded a copy to Mr. Walser, who is the proper person to prosecute the parties. Every paper publishing the stuff should be made co-respondent in a suit for libel. As for the fellow Braden, he is just out of jail for swindling, and should be sent back for slander.

A CHURCH congress is in session at Hartford, Conn., the avowed object of which is to unite all Protestant Christendom upon some common basis. It is hoped that before this congress adjourns it will see its way clear to appoint a few champions of the cause to meet in debate the advocates of Freethought. Just now there seems to be a dearth of representativ Christians of this sort.

WE regret the death of James D. Wait, of Antwerp, N. Y., which occurred May 1st, after a short illness. Mr. Wait was a warm friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S founder. No man in his town had more friends than Mr. Wait, and his funeral was a large gathering of the prominent citizens of Antwerp. Mr. Wait was quite wealthy. He leaves three children and several grandchildren. He will long be mourned by them, and remembered by all who became acquainted with him.

THERE is a Christian down in Waco, Texas, who is praying for the "removal" of Mr. Shaw. On a former occasion when a minister prayed for the removal of all Liberals in Waco the object was apparent, the minister being in debt to some of them. Just now, however, Mr. Shaw says he is unable to fathom the Christian's motiv. It occurs to us that it may be that the glory of God may more abound, for Mr. Shaw's persistent fight against Christianity is making that commodity scarce in Waco.

A GREAT number of letters commending our picture of "The Modern Balaam" hav been received, and many of them ask for copies printed separately. The difficulty of complying with these requests is great, inasmuch as some wish the picture as a chromo, some just enlarged, others want something added, and so on. We cannot change the picture without making a new one at large expense, and we are afraid enough would not be sold to defray the cost. We can, however, print the picture, just as it is, on heavy paper, and in that form can mail it for 10 cents—the principal expense in that shape being the cost of mailing tube and postage. If our friends wish it in that form and will immediately notify us, it will be furnished.

DR. A. A. BELL asks in Light for Thinkers: "I see Mr. Hanson in the last issue of Light for Thinkers, in reply to Mr. Brown, quotes Mr. Darwin as saying: 'That God miraculously formed the first organism and breathed into it the vital spark, which constituted it a living creature.' Did Darwin say so? I think the writer has been led into error by using a second-hand quotation." Not having Darwin's works by him, the editor of Light for Thinkers sends the inquiry along. As it always givs us pleasure to help as good a friend as Dr. Bell and enlighten as well-meaning a paper as Light for Thinkers, we refer both to Darwin's "Origin of Species," of the last sentence of which the above is a gross distortion. Darwin's sentence is: "There is a grandeur in this view of life [Natural Selection], with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one; and that, whilst this planet has gone cycling on according to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a beginning endless forms most beautiful and most wonderful hav been and are being evolved." Since writing this, Darwin avowed himself an Agnostic.

JOHN SWINTON has been hearing some hard reports from the Bible House of this city, where Bibles are manufactured. He is told "of women working there on wages that won't even moisten their bones, and of some who can't earn over $1.25 a week. At the same time it appears from the annual accounts of the Bible society that the managers of the Bible House enjoy incomes that compare with these as the Nova Scotia giant compares with the living skeleton." Mr. Swinton expresses no surprise at this. He is probably old enough to know that Christianity makes little claim to consistency. The men who "grind the faces of the poor" are always Christian capitalists, and the manufacture of Bibles affords as good an opportunity for this grinding as does the manufacture of bricks. And, for the heathen, the glories of heaven are in nowise dimmed by the fact that the people who set the type, print and bind the Bibles brought to them by self-seeking missionaries, are slowly starving to death. Besides, if the working women in the Bible House believe all they read in the book they make, they ought to be thankful to the managers of the Bible Society for speeding their journey to the blissful shore.

AFTER months of patient and persistent work the Albany Liberal Association is enabled to meet in commodious quarters. The removal to their new place (No. 69 No. Pearl street) was celebrated, May 3d, by an entertainment of a miscellaneous but exceedingly entertaining character. The association is now prosperous, and proposes to repeat these entertainments every month. Mr. McDonough delivered the inaugural address, welcoming those present and congratulating the members upon the prosperity that enabled them to so greatly improve upon their place of meeting. Mr. McDonough invited all to join the association who were earnestly inquiring for the means of human progress. He did not believe that men and women should be bound by creeds invented by our ignorant ancestors. The effort spent in appealing to the clouds he considered misdirected, when there were so many questions that needed the entire energies of all. A most interesting branch of this association, and one that ought to be imitated by every League in the country, is the Sunday-school. This was started a short time ago by Mrs. Iliohan with but three or four scholars, and now numbers over thirty, with constant accessions, the young people of Albany coming out in large numbers, some deserting church Sunday-schools for this of the Liberal Association. Mrs. Iliohan attracts children by her lovable character, and the association is most fortunate in having her services as superintendent of the school. When first begun the association obtained no recognition from the Albany press, but the papers are slowly coming over to the Secular side, and the Albany Express of the day after the entertainment contained a very good and encouraging report. The Albany Liberals are anticipating a grand time at the New York State Freethought Convention, to be held there in September, and at which Colonel Ingersoll and Elizabeth Cady Stanton will be present. The visiting friends will do well to attend Mrs. Iliohan's Sunday-school, and then go home and found one just like it.

Letters from Friends.

ST. CATHARINE'S, ONT. CAN., May 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, "Bible Morals," a couple of "What Liberalism Offers in Place of Christianity," and Ingersoll's answer to his critics.

I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Reynolds lecture in Thorold last March. In my opinion he is the best missionary that ever came into Canada. He not only shows up the shams and absurdities of Christianity in the most amusing style, but points out very clearly how something better can be adopted in its place. The churches got up tea meetings and socials and other attractions, but in spite of all this Mr. Reynolds had the pleasure of addressing a full house. Upon closing, Mr. Reynolds invited any clergyman, or other representativ of the church, to reply. After waiting about five minutes, one arose, who appeared to me a cross between a Salvation Army crank and a Methodist preacher. He rose up bold as a lion, exclaiming, "Well, my good fellow, if no one else will tackle you, I'm your man!" Whereupon the audience began to call him to the platform. After a great deal of encouragement he got there. His nerves began to weaken about this time, and, scratching his head, he announced that he was not in the habit of speaking. After gaping around for some time he managed to ask this question, "How did evil get into this world?" Then he began to grow very weak, and, reaching for a chair, dropped into it, wiping the cold sweat from his forehead and looking around with a sickening smile, as much as to say "Ain't I brave?" Mr. Reynolds explained in a very plain and so-that-any-one-might-understand sort of a way how science accounted for the evil spoken of, but this did not satisfy Mr. Christian, who shouted, "I've been in this world and every other world and never found out yet." The audience by this time were tired of his nonsense, and made a rush for the platform to secure some of the books Mr. Reynolds had for sale. If he had had twice as many of "Bible Morals" and Paine's "Age of Reason," he would hav sold them all. Mr. Christian did not seem to like this, and began to shout, "All he wants is your money." As the lecture was free some gentleman asked him how much it cost him to come in. This had the effect of stopping his mouth. About the middle of the lecture, as Mr. Reynolds was giving a quotation from the Bible, some Christian, moved by the Holy Ghost probably, shouted out, "You're a liar!" No one paid any attention to him, however, and everything ended quietly. Mr. Reynolds invited all Liberals to meet him at the hotel, where he organized a Secular Society, electing Mr. McPherson president.

I had the pleasure of hearing three sessions of the Watts and Walker debate. It has done more good for Freethought than a dozen lectures would hav done. It has started local discussions here, and, in fact, everywhere around Welland. The only fault that I could find is that the debating was all one-sided, Mr. Walker taking up a greater part of his time in telling little anecdotes about the love of Jesus that can be heard from any pulpit every Sunday, and giving quotations from Voltaire to show that Mr. Watts differed in some things from him. In fact, if he had not been surrounded with four clergymen writing up something for him to say, together with a small book that he had to continually refer to, he would hav been completely lost. As it was, between dodging and quibbling and misrepresenting, he managed to worry through. The general verdict is that he had no business with Mr. Watts. The Liberals of Welland are more than satisfied with the result, while the Christians do not like to say anything about it. I hav just finished reading Mr. Ingersoll's "Which Way?" and I think that if I was not already decided that would settle it. Yours truly, J. LOVELL.

FRENCH CREEK, IA., March 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I was somewhat amused at John McCrory's remarks about a school-teacher drawing pay for legal holidays on which he did not teach, hence these few remarks.

Last winter, finding I had a few leisure months before me, I engaged a four months' term of school. I do not know the law regarding holidays in this state, but the contract does not exempt them, therefore I think they should be taught. I offered to teach on those days if the scholars would come, who, with an air of "What do you take us for?" said they would not; and since I did not want to spend my time making up for those days after the expiration of the term, I drew my pay in full; nor do I find my conscience troubling me for having received pay for days I did not teach. It was not my fault that we hav "legal holidays." JOHN H. HIRT.

DIAMOND, MO., May 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: After much delay and rash promises, I send this Janus-faced inclosure. The term seems appropriate, inasmuch as it looks into the past as well as the future. Send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1885, and credit the balance on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Money is exceedingly coy, uncertain, hard to corner in this occidental retreat. Like the Irishman's flea, when I get my thumb on it, it is not there. Like an ignis-fatuus, it has led me many a weary, fruitless chase during the past year. A few minutes tardy in catching that "tide that leads on to fortune," leaves a man everlastingly in the lurch. I hav been on the most intimate, confidential, sub-rosa terms with destitution. Being a bachelor, and prone to help "the dog that's down," my solicitude for other people's welfare has quite submerged my own interest, while others, for equal services at the same time and place, hav received full compensation. Jozif has had to use his wonted patience and wait; and he's waiting yet, and liable to wait till doom's-day in the afternoon, and his due-bill on the world is assuming vast proportions. Ah! well, T. B. Wakeman, in nis noble lecture, "Liberalism—Its mission," "points to the glorious goal of Infidel aspiration as that of utter abnegation, and the merging of our own interests in the happiness of others." Accept my thanks, Brother Wakeman, for that splendid admonition. It is grand! Would do honor to Mohammed or Lord Buddha. It reminds me of Goldsmith's preacher who "allured to brighter worlds and led the way." It is certain to redound to your honor. It is a great solace to a man's declining years to know that through no act of his has a pang been added to the woes of poverty; that the widow and the orphan remember him with kindness and gratitude; that the gentle horse and patient ox hav not fled at his approach; and that he has interposed between the persecutor and the oppressed, the extortioner and his victim. Well, this is beginning to look devilishly like a sermon. Whistle! down brakes. Yours truly, JOSEPH TOWSLEY.

WICHITA, KAN., April 25, 285.

MR. EDITOR: The renowned Watts and Putnam lectured at Turner's Opera House, in this Christian city, on last Wednesday evening, and in spite of the combined opposition of the elements, and open, lighted gospel-shops, there was a good audience of ladies and gentlemen, who seemed more than pleased with these energetic workers.

Mr. Watts spoke with a wonderful force, and his logic swept everything pell-mell before it. His closing prayer to nature was simply grand, and elicited a hearty "Amen" from every listener.

Mr. Putnam, the poet-orator, is a perfect poem of himself. His form is symmetrical, his voice his musical, and his words are thoughtful and wise. The audience was delighted and gave rapt attention to his discourse. He is as clever a speaker as I ever heard.

There was not a "defender of the faith" in all that audience. Christ's mission was to save sinners, and his chosen leaders stayed cautiously back to preach to the saints. Why? May be for fear "that at anytime they might be converted and their sins be forgiven them." And the "Eds.," oh, where were they? Go ask of the night wind and "Deacon Smith." But I forget. There was one. Out of a round baker's dozen, there was just one. His soul was a little larger than the latest approved and adopted spring style of editor's soul.

Liberals are in a fine minority here, and before the opportune coming of the great organizer, they were "without form and void." Now there is a League here. I did not learn the number of members, as I was not able to join, and I hurried away that I might feel my misfortune less keenly. It is the old story. Those who will, cannot; and those who can, will not. Nevertheless, I say, with a full heart, Success to the newly-formed League, and success to the gallant workers who are so earnestly and zealously spreading the gospel of liberty and light. Fraternally yours, S. V. M.

WELLAND, ONT., CAN., April 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: All systems of religion that I know anything of are founded upon the worship of some mythical or imaginary being they call God, and some hav many gods—a god for every special object; and one religious body knows just as much about their god or gods as the other, and that in reality is nothing, All we know about gods is what has been conveyed or told from one generation to another to children in their infancy, before their minds had developed to know the difference between truth and untruth, and accepted as truth all that was told us by our dear parents, whom we knew loved us, as we loved them, and had full confidence in them that they would not deceive us. And so far we were right; they would not had they known better; but they, like ourselvs, had been trained in an ignorant superstition from a time when ignorance was supreme. And those false teachings were taken up by a class of men more cunning than the rest, who assumed to know something about gods and the wills of gods, and got up religious creeds and doctrins to blind the people and keep them in a state of mental darkness, so that they could be the more easily controled and made to contribute to their support, and in this they hav been very successful. Every religious order can see the folly and absurdity of every other, but none of them can see their own. But those whose minds hav became illuminated by a knowledge of nature's laws, as revealed by the sciences, are enabled to rise to an eminence above all religious creeds, and look down upon them all, and see they were founded in ignorance and superstition, and advocated and perpetuated by this class of cunning priests, and made to contribute its millions of money to support in luxury this godly aristocracy of popes, bishops, cardinals, and priests of every grade and description, down to the very Amen man who, in response to the prayers of the clerk or white-surpliced pri est, drawls out "Glory be to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." How long is this silly cant and nonsense to be indulged in? Are we to remain children, or even worse, idiots, for all time to come?

Is it not degrading to the human intellect to be so easily gulled? There is much said about this personal God and his designs. Now, if this God is what Christianity claims for him, infinit in power, wisdom, mercy, and other good attributes, how is it that his design plan is such a failure? See the amount of cruelty and suffering that millions of his poor and helpless children hav to endure from disease, starvation, and untold miseries.

Which of us, if we had the power, would not relieve the sufferings of our brothers and sisters? And if we did not, would we deserve to be called good or God? No, but the whole God pretense is a myth, and if brothers and sisters are helped, it is brothers and sisters must do the helping.

Prayers are ineffectual, and it is well they are so, for, among so many conflicting interests, a God would be sorely puzzled to know how to act, and would be likely to arrive at the sensible conclusion to say: "I hav given you the world and endowed you with the faculty of reason to enable you to investigate into nature's laws, into cause and effect, and if you do so to the extent you are able you hav no need to call upon me for any special act or favor. My laws are the same to all; if you hav got into a jangle among yourselves, that is your doing, not mine, and I would advise you to seek for more light and try to introduce a better state of things for the general good of your race. And from this time forward my laws are fixed, and will not change. The earth will continue to yield its increase when properly attended to. I shall hold everyone responsible for his own acts. I do not want to hear any more complaints, or to be solicited for any more special favors from any of you; so take this, my last advice, this 12th day of April, 1885." JOHN RAY.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The 1st of May is near at hand. The date on the tab of The TRUTH SEEKER to my address needs to be changed from May 1, 1885, to May 1, 1886, for which change you will find inclosed the necessary paper. Please send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL to my address for the balance.

It amuses me to see how Liberal some people are who would like to be called or do call themselvs Liberals. Why, bless you, they are so Liberal they are perfectly willing everybody should believe just as they want to believe on any and all subjects. But, mind you, everybody must believe as they do, or friendship is withdrawn, and the poor unbeliever is cast away as rubbish of the earth. Can you tell me the difference between these Liberals and the Christians whom these Liberals call bigoted and superstitious? I pity such Liberals, for I know they cannot enjoy life. A man or woman who is so narrow-minded as to want all people to believe as he or she does on any subject, has failed to learn the lessons taught by nature. Why not hav flowers, animals, people all one color? Why not all one size? Trace to the cause all this great variety in color, size, etc., then I think we all will be willing to let others think and believe as they can, and feel glad that there is variety in thoughts and beliefs. If the time comes when all think and believe alike, what will become of progress? Shall we hav arrived at perfection? It seems to me that through all the endless eternity progression will be the law of nature. Eternal change of forms; perfection only in the whole. Let all try to find a grain of truth in every thought expressed by others, and treat them as we would hav them treat us for the difference in thought and belief. I fear no one of us holds all truth, or believes all that would be best for us to believe. Shall I condemn one for believing in Spiritualism, another for being a Materialist, another for being a Christian? No; our bodies are formed of the same elements, but in different proportions in the different bodies, resulting in the different sizes, forms, colors, etc. The surroundings of each person hav much to do with the difference in our thoughts and beliefs. I read articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER which are not in harmony with my mind, but I cannot afford to say "Stop my paper!" That would be putting out my eyes to hide a hideous object from view. Better turn the eyes from the object.

Let us try to be honest with ourselves, then we shall find little to condemn in others. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and to all truth seekers. If there is a thought in this that is worth sending over the world, by clothing it in better language, start it on its mission. If not, trot it to the yawning waste basket. Yours for more Liberality in Liberals,

J. F. MACOMBER.

A LETTER FROM AN OLD FRIEND.

ORTONVILLE, MICH.

MR. EDITOR: We old stagers are becoming mute. I hav felt discouraged for a long time about ever offering another note for your columns, and am not now sure that you will publish this. But the fact is, Mrs. Severance's noble, ringing article that appears in your columns April 25th, entitled, "What has been Done?" which I hav just perused with deepest interest, inspires me to grasp right hold of pencil and say to her, Grand! noble! and to thank her from my heart for thus stirring the live coals of the earlier inspirations of true Liberalism. You are just right, Mrs. Dr. Severance—thirty years ago the workers in the cause went by their own inspirations, like Bennett, and leading-strings and leaders were unknown. I recollect visiting the flourishing village of McHenry, Ill., twenty-five or thirty years ago, to giv lectures on physiology, health, and human character, and upon my arrival at the town I learned there was a Universalist church there, and it made me feel hopeful, for I felt that I could not only get use of the church but get hearers also. I inquired out the trustee—there was but one—and he said, "Oh, yes, you can hav that or any of the other churches of the place for that purpose." I was surprised at his reply, and thought him jesting, for I had gloomily peered at two or three tall church spires as I had passed along. "Why, sir," inquired I, "what do you mean?" "Oh," said he, "Mrs. Britt, Spiritualist, of St. Louis, has been here lecturing and converted all the people of the town, including all of the preachers, to Spiritualism, and all is free to you." And, sure enough, I had crowded houses, and they invited me to each of the churches to speak, and the three converted orthodox ministers were among my very best listeners. "But, oh! that was Spiritualism!" Yes, sir; and I want to assure you younger workers of to-day that it was Spiritualism, with its noble humanitarian doctrins, that compassed all the needs of the people, and the reform which made the way possible for the more conservativ Material teachers of to-day. I miss the inspiration, I miss the sparkling articles of T. C. Leland and H. L. Green that we used to hav in Mr. Bennett's time, while the space is used up with praise of the leaders and new workers in the Liberal field. I went with Mr. Bennett to call upon Mr. Charles Watts, at his little publishing house on the Strand in London, the first time Mr. Bennett saw him, and we found Mr. Watts all tinctured full of the conservativ Abbot-Underwood prejudice against Mr. Bennett and the acts of the League against the Comstock laws. But Mr. Bennett made it up with him after great patience, explaining the whole matter. We were then on our way to the Brussells convention, to which Mr. Watts was also a delegate, and put in good work. This article I fear will be too long, but I don't plague you with them often, and so let me ooze off a little more of my pent-up impulse, and if it goes to the waste-basket, all right.

But I want a word about your great enterprise, the beautiful TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. It's "just nice," and the likenesses of the grand workers in the cause are a prize. What a privilege to look and see what manner of physical make-up they possess, after reading about them! Mrs. Severance, to me, is very like Mrs. D. M. Bennett in her picture, and John Peck very like old John Brown of Ossowatomie. The likeness of Mr. Bennett is perfection. But it amazed me to read a discourse upon the general make-up of those characters by a physiognomist in your columns not very long since. He made Thomas Paine's mouth everything that bespoke courtesy and agreeableness, while I see in that face sarcastic shrewdness, an expression as if to say, "I've got 'em." But in the mouth, and especially the upper lip, I see the eagle and vulture combined, but happily the tearing nature all under control of an absolute benevolence which would tear to pieces thrones and all false, tyrannical powers which oppress humanity, not even sparing the hell-hound structures of ecclesiasticism. His analogy (comparison), memory, and language (use of words) are his three greatest mental talents, while his nose indicates a great fearless leader of men. But Mrs. Severance is right. The great old genial and thoroughly intellectual Colonel Ingersoll is not adapted for a leader. Contrast the "bridge" of his nose (as seen by side-view in the ANNUAL) with that of Paine, or better, John Peck, who is a natural leader, only too much so, as his nose indicates rashness. Colonel Ingersoll's nose is too much like Kossuth's—a thinker, scholar, orator, or statesman, but not a leader. But enough. Let us pray. That is, pray for the fearless, non-speculativ inspirations of the earlier workers in Liberalism, DR. T. S. ANDREWS.

P.S.—I must just say right here that I like Mr. Somerby's likeness in the ANNUAL tip-top, also that yours, Eugene, makes you look like an old liner. I wish I could exhibit to your readers a likeness I hav of you a few years ago when a boy. You're a regular singed cat. Can jump farther than anybody ever thought, save D. M. Bennett. He knew, and kept his hold on you. T. S. A.

CLIFTON, KAN., April 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since the second year of its birth, and of other reform papers as well. The motiv that prompts me to write at present is the agitation of the Liberal Tent Army of Music and Reform. To show you that I hav been in the field with the same incentiv before I heard it spoken of in THE TRUTH SEEKER or elsewhere, I will inclose copies of my bills. I am a teacher of vocal music, but cannot consistently produce any more music that will serve to draw people to an intellectual dungeon. Should such a troupe be formed it must be of first-class timber in many respects—those who do not use tobacco or liquor and those who feel within their souls the necessity of a correct understanding of the principles of vocal and instrumental harmony. I would be pleased to open a personal correspondence with those who feel favorable to the movement.

Respectfully, FRANK HANAN.

PAINTED POST, N. Y., April 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a draft for $3.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and for the ANNUAL. I hav tried to get some subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but find it impossible. In this little town of eight or nine hundred inhabitants there are but three or four of my way of thinking, and they are too cowardly to think aloud. I count them worth nothing in the cause of Secularism.

We hav three churches here. Some of the members are good, honest people, and some are as great hypocrits as I know of. The ministers treat me with respect and appear to be friendly, though one of them, a Presbyterian D.D., took me to task for my attendance at the last state League meeting that was held at Hornellsville. We talked about two hours; the main subject, the truth and inspiration of the Bible. I think the doctor had more conundrums to solve than hard words to spell when a pupil at school. The doctor finally concluded that our arguments were of no use, for neither of us could convince the other; so we would drop the argument and be friends as usual. I thought if he was as little interested financially as I, and had the moral courage, he would hav owned up convinced.

The worst conflict I ever had with a minister was about six years ago. There was located here an ignorant, bigoted Methodist minister. He was a stranger here, and I suppose wanted to do something to bring himself into notice. So nearly every Sunday he would bring up the Infidel and (figurativly speaking) knock him down, mop the floor with him, etc. The Infidel bore it patiently until "patience ceased to be a virtue." Finally, one Sunday evening he brought up the case of the Infidel again, and said the Infidel kept a Bible in his shop, and was in the habit of reading and ridiculing it to anyone that would listen to him (there he lied), and that hell was not hot enough for him. It was reported to the Infidel, and I think the Infidel got somewhat wroth, but not so much so as Moses when he broke all the Commandments. The Infidel lay in wait for him till he caught him in the store with a number of others. He was then asked if he had made such assertions, or similar ones, about the complainant. He, putting on much holy indignation, denied making any such or similar assertions. After being informed that there could be ample proof brought that he did, he then admitted that he did say something like this, that there was a man in town that kept a Bible in his shop and would read and ridicule it, etc., and if there was one corner in hell hotter than the rest, he would find his way there. The Infidel told him he had better get conversant with some of the first principles of Christianity before attempting to preach the gospel. He would find where Christ said, "Judge not." He had judged and condemned me to the hottest corner in hell. He had likewise lied in making the statement he did, and again lied in denying it; and if I had no more charity than he, I should condemn him to the place where the Bible says all liars go. He had something more to say about ridiculing God's holy word. He was informed by the Infidel that he would be glad to meet him and discuss the question from the Bible standpoint whether or no it was God's holy word. He promised to do so, but never kept his word. He shunned the Infidel for some time, but afterward began to speak on meeting him, and to shake hands, and from that time for a year, as long as he stayed here, he treated the Infidel with all the respect he could hav asked.

Mr. Editor, I hav written the above simple statement of facts merely to show that my treatment of the minister was beneficial to him. Some ministers, especially young ones, outgrow their clothes. They think nobody must contradict them. Their hearers mostly think the same, and, having a good deal of egotism, they get to be almost unbearable. They should be let to know sometimes that truth will not die with them.

I am now an old man of sixty-seven, and last summer I lost half of my life's hard earnings by fire; but as long as I can raise enough to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER I must hav it.

Yours for Secularism, etc., B. C. WOOD.

OCCULTISM.

BISHOP CREEK, CAL., April 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: This occult or hidden force, called in the East Akaz, and Odic in the West, is the means by which its adepts prove that man has a soul that survives the dissolution of the bodily form.

Modern philosopby deals only with the material or visible side of nature, while the occultist is, and has been for ages, studying the forces that underlie all life and its phenomena.

As Mr. Beck prefers to hav this subject discussed publicly, I will throw what light I can upon it, as no knowledge is more needed than the demonstration of whether or not we liv after death.

I know not if Occultism can sustain its claims to the solution of this momentous subject, but I will quote from Sinnett, who seems to be well versed on the powers of its adepts. He says: "The importance of occult knowledge turns on the manner in which it affords exact and experimental facts concerning spiritual things, which, under all other systems, must remain the subject of speculation or blind religious faith; and who can realize the bearing on ethics of certain knowledge concerning man's survival after death? Ordinary science knows nothing of that power by which those versed in Occultism can hold converse with other adepts, no matter what distance may lie between them. The whole science is so utterly strange to ordinary conceptions that it is difficult to know how to make explanations. It proves that man has a soul as clearly as that he has an overcoat, and it is substance, but when he projects it from his body—which he is able to do and sometimes for others—his soul is the man and his body the overcoat; he can go out at will and return even from distant planets with lessons of wisdom not expedient to utter. If there is ever to be a science of religion or knowledge of a future state, it must come through Occultism. The majority of civilized people believe that man has a soul which will somehow survive the dissolution of the body, but they hav to confess that they do not know very much about it."

The whole burden of Christian teachings are:

"A charge to keep I hav;
A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky;"

While the proof is wanting, and cannot, from their standpoint, be given, that we hav a soul, or who, what, and where is God or heaven.

The secrecy Mr. Beck objects to is nothing more than the waiting for the fitness of minds to receive the light, as we do not think it wise to explain to children the mysteries of generation until they hav reached mature years.

The tree of life has been symbolically guarded by a flaming sword, and few hav had the courage to pluck its leaves and know that they would liv forever. But the time is fast approaching when these leaves for the healing of the nations will be freely gathered from both sides of the river of life, and its twelve kinds of fruits banish disease and death from the world. Light is in the world, but the people choose darkness because they love evil, or are not yet ready for the new day. When the light of Occultism or spirit power shall shine brightly on the cloudy mists of Materialism and religious faith, then will shine forth the rainbow of hope, spanning the dark gulf of death, and the morning stars—children of the light—sing the anthem of a new creation and revelation.

SNOWVILLE, VA., April 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 25th, Dr. Dillingham accuses Elmina of untruthfulness, or words to that effect. Perhaps he does not liv in a "glass house." Anyhow, I do not think I should better my own standing by trying to lower his, nor do I believe in people needlessly aspersing one another. Yet he has placed me where I am compelled to say a few things in self-defense.

The doctor did invite me to make his house my home while I was in Boston the first time, and I went directly there from the railroad depot, and met with a cordial reception from him and his kind little wife.

I found them living in grand style, and supposed that, as the doctor was such an enthusiastic Spiritualist, he would introduce me into some of the mysteries of the ism, or take me where I could see something of the wonderful phenomena. He assured me he had been lifted in his chair to the ceiling of the room by spirits many times, and set down hard or lightly, just as he willed it. I asked to see something of this, but he said he had long ago given up experimenting. I hinted to him strongly my desire to see some medium. He simply advised me to go into his office and read A. J. Davis's works. But I had read them, and had read piles and piles of similar things, and I now wanted to see something. I had no money to pay a medium then, but supposed, as he seemed so wealthy, he would at least take me once, out of courtesy. I waited for days, but found I was wasting time, so when I saw I was to see nothing of phenomena or of spirits I gave it up, and visited my Materialistic friends. Then Dr. Dillingham wrote me he had intended having a seance for me had I stayed a day or two longer! Why did he not tell me so before I left? He is mistaken about saying "he would giv me an opportunity as soon as he had time to make arrangements." I had intended calling on him again before I left, but my other friends were so kind in taking me to see the "lions" that my time was up, and I had to leave before getting around to the doctor's again. When I got home he wrote me very huffily because I did not mention him in the report of my trip. It was an oversight in me; but really he merely gave me food and shelter, and a few moments now and then, of his society, and walked with me once to Paine Hall, so I had nothing to say of him that I thought would interest the public. I wrote him several times afterward, but not a line hav I ever received in return; so is it strange I did not call there on my last trip?

I seldom reply to such personalities. We hav a more important work to do than to bicker among one another. I would not hav noticed this attack at all only I hav had several similar experiences, till I begin to wonder if believers are all talk and no do, or if it only happens so that I meet most with this class whose experience is all in the past, and who hav nothing new to show. Respectfully, ELMINA.

ONEIDA, N. Y., May 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed twenty cents, for which please send me two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, No. 18, dated May 2, 1885. The illustration on the first page is the most appropriate thing I hav seen. I would like a lithograph picture of it to frame and hang up in the parlor. I received the TRUTH SEEKER ANEUAL all right, and "Bible Morals also. I am very much pleased with both. G. BEEBEE.

MARYVILLE, MO., May 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal note for one dollar, for which you will please send me publications as ordered. I send for some of these to giv to my friends. Your ANNUAL I consider a gem of the first water, and your copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 2d inst., with picture, is unsurpassed. I sent my copy to a friend in Colorado. JOSEPH E. ALEXANDER.

WHITELAND, IND., May 5, 285.

MR. EDITOR: "The Modern Balaam" in the last TRUTH SEEKER is decidedly the best hit in the way of a cartoon I ever saw. It is to be hoped the ass, like his mythical prototype, will see the angel of reason, crush the foot of his rider against the wall of superstition with which he has been hedged in, and turn aside into the green fields of truth. Giv us more pictures like this, they speak more forcibly than words.

S. E. BREWER.

CENTRALIA, ILL., May 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The picture representing priestcraft seated on the people is the truest likeness that has ever been got up. It is simply immense. It speaks volumes. If ever there was a man inspired of God to giv a faithful representation of his servants, it was the fellow that got up that picture. If it were a little larger, and the letters showing plainer, so as to be read when the picture was framed, it would sell fast. Some four or five persons (all so far who hav seen it) said they wanted it. I want one ranging in price from fifty cents to one dollar or more, if larger and well executed, with this addition: I want "justice" in plain letters on the bare arm holding the sword of reason. It needs that to make it complete.

G. W. BIDDLE.

KOMOFFDERUFF, April 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept the money you find in this letter, be thankful, and giv me credit for the same.

Allow me to say I appreciate and enjoyed your criticism on Mrs. Severance's article. The car of Liberalism is moving; don't let the boulders and landslides remain on the track. If we will not lend a helping, we certainly must not be allowed to convert ourselvs into a pull-back. And will you giv me permission to run my nimble fingers over the cranium of "Fair Play," and I'll tell you that I find conscientiousness and benevolence not quite as prominent as could be desired. If you don't believe it, look over the article "Fair Play" in the Investigator of the 22d. She has borrowed a boomerang from Australia, and gone after the majestic Putnam and our friend Miss Gardener.

Envy and jealousy are words that should be uprooted from the hearts of Liberals. Miss Helen had the good luck to be introduced to the world by our worthy president, Robert G. Ingersoll. It was certainly a send-off, a protection that few receive. But as Miss Helen is good and true, a friend and advocate of women, a star of the first magnitude, brilliant and fascinating, and admired by our Liberal lords, let us not throw missils of vengeance to drive her from the hights, but send up a fresh bouquet from nature's bowers, with messages of love and kindness, for there's no telling the great good she yet may do.

Hav charity for our worthy secretary if he blundered. For there are stars that dazzle and bewilder us with their mystery and beauty, and if in this spiritual condition he erred, I hardly think it human to wake him from this blissful dream with such a double-headed arrow dipped in gall. He may hav been studying that interesting but horrible unity question just to get rid of the monotony of gods and devils. Let the scintillating diamonds send forth their sparks of fire, and we of the leaden hue must be content with existence as it is, knowing that the fates hav willed it so.

We cannot all be stars in this Liberal sky, or presidents, or secretaries, or even conductors on this great Liberal railroad. But to be even a track-man, yard-master, anything that comes within our capacity, is honorable, and each and every place must hav some worthy and trusty hand.

Fraternally your friend, THERESA SOBIESKI.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Baby.

Oh! what art thou thinking of, darling,
That thine eyes look so far away
From 'neath the soft fringe of their lashes?
Why is baby so thoughtful to-day?

Thine eyes are like soft woodland shadows,
So thoughtful and pensiv are they,
And gone is their bright, eager sparkle;
Oh! what art thou thinking of, pray?

Thy hands, like a breeze-startled blossom,
Were fluttering a moment ago,
Thy face was all flushing and smiling,
Thy cheeks were all dimpling aglow.

What sweet, solemn thoughts stealeth o'er thee
And changes thy bonny face so?
Why motionless lieth thy wee hands?
What caused thine eyes' laughter to go?

What sweet baby-thoughts art thou thinking,
That leave on thy features their trace?
Thou'lt forget, when thou'st power to tell us
What made so divine thy sweet face.

Peppercorn Stories.

WHAT ARE WE MADE OF.

The children were gathered in a semicircle in front of Polly Peppercorn, who had just deposited a basket upon the table at her side. Tommy Clovertop stood on tiptoe trying to see what the basket contained, and they all whispered together, and wondered if Polly was intending to giv them a treat.

"She always does that," said Daisy Dewdrop. "She says things in such a way that we learn, my mamma says, when we don't know it, and so it is a treat to hear her talk."

"Peggy Primrose!"

"Ma'am!" answered that little lady, looking straight in Polly Peppercorn's eyes.

"What did you say the other day that you were made of?"

"I thed I wath made oth thugar and latheth!"

"Do you believe that, Sammy Stripedgrass?" asked Polly.

"No-sir-ee!"

"Why, Sammy!" and Polly looked at him amazed.

Sammy blushed very red, while he stammered, "No, ma'am, then. If Peggy was all sugar and 'lasses, she wouldn't be around here very long—that's one thing."

"Why not, Sammy?'

"We should eat her up in no time!"

"I'd hav her thumbs!" said Frankie Muttonchops.

"And I'd take a sugar finger," laughed Molly Mulleinleaf.

"I guess I would sop out her molasses eyes!" said Johnny Gotobed, and while they tittered and laughed, Peggy Primrose began to cry.

"Now, you've made Peggy cry, you had better stop," and Polly drew down the corners of her mouth demurely. "Perhaps Master Johnny Gotobed will tell us what he is composed of."

"Dust!" spoke up Johnny very promptly.

"Oho!" said Polly, "coal dust, street dust, or what?"

"No, dust of the earth—all the same kind—black mud, or red clay—one."

"Now, you do not know as much as you think you do, Johnny Gotobed. Perhaps I do not, either, but I think I can enlighten you a little," and Polly proceeded to take several small parcels from the basket on the table. "These are a few specimens of the composition of our bodies. We are of the earth, earthy, that is true, and we can be reduced to a little heap of ashes, or a quart of water, and in either case that would be all there was of the fluids and solids of these bodies of ours."

"Queer, isn't it?" whispered Molly Mulleinleaf to Daisy Dewdrop. "Do you believe it?"

"Daisy made no reply, and Polly proceeded.

"In this paper are some slivers of iron," and she passed them around for inspection.

"Iron is found in the blood—it makes it that beautiful bright-red color."

"Oh-h-h!" exclaimed Tommy Clovertop. "I'm an iron boy, then!"

"Please be quiet, Tommy. In this package is potash. That is found in the blood, too, and in the perspiration, the bile, etc. And here is a little magnesia, real magnesia—you'll find it in the bones and in your brains. Here it is—examin it. And here is some sulphur—see!" and she held up the vial it was in that all might observe. "Sulphur exists in the bones, also in the hair and nails and muscles. This is a piece of lime, and maybe some of you can tell me where that is found in the human system."

"I can," said Harry Coalskuttle. "It is in the bones."

"Right; and I am glad you remember so well our previous talks," and Polly Peppercorn patted his head gently. "Here is a package of saleratus, or soda, and that you may find in the muscles, and in the same fluids where potash is found. This is a box of sand."

"And are we made of sand, too?" inquired Tommy Clovertop, opening his eyes wildly.

"Yes; it is in the hair. Of course it is combined, as are all the substances before named, with gases, like oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen."

"I—jolly! but they're big words," said Sammy Stripedgrass.

"I suppose they sound so to you," remarked Polly. "And of course you don't know what they mean. I'll tell you, briefly. Oxygen is the best part of air, the vital or life part, and we could not breathe without it. Hydrogen is the name of one of the gases contained in water, and nitrogen is the other part of the air; with oxygen it makes the atmosphere. It is a kind of potash or saltpeter—you've all seen saltpeter?"

"I hav never seen Salt Peter," and Molly Mulleinleaf giggled.

"Well, take a look at this, then," and Polly held up a lump of niter," which is another name for the same substance. When we were out for a walk yesterday, what was it we smelled when we went by Farmer Watkins's house.

"Singed hens!" shouted Johnny Gotobed.

"What was the cause of that bad smell?"

"Dunno!"

"What! Which sounds better, 'dunno,' or, 'I do not know?'"

"I do not know."

"Certainly. I will tell you what was the cause of the bad odor. Is was the nitrogen in the animal matter that caused it. And when this same material is decayed, it forms what is known as hartshorn or ammonia. Then there is carbon, another substance found in bodies; in fat people, like Frankie Muttonchops, for instance, there is a lot of it, as it exists in fat, oil, etc. We get it from the food we eat Now, these substances and gases, united, blended in a beautiful manner, make up our bodies. There is phosphorus, too, and some other substances in the make-up of our bodies. As we liv on and on, we shall learn more and more about ourselvs, and you will understand the composition of your little forms, and know much more about the matter than your grandfathers and grandmothers did. What we do not know is a mystery, but just as soon as we know all about a subject it is no mystery at all."

"I am glad I'm not thugar and latheth, any way," said Peggy Primrose, "for I wath afraid I would melt in the thun or the wain!"

"You're a very solid girl," said Polly Peppercorn. "And now let us hav a game of tag."

And such a scramble as there was. "Higglety, pigglety!" "catch me if you can," and away ran Polly as fast as her lame little legs would carry her. Peggy Primrose stumbled and fell, and Sammy Stripedgrass went head over heels on the ground, and Pussy Whitefoot distanced them all. And then they had a merry chase after her, around and around the yard, over fences and hedges, until finally she climbed away up in the wild cherry-tree, and looking down upon them, whisked her tail merrily, and looked as if she would like to laugh if she only knew how.

Wonders of the Ocean.

SPONGE.

How very nice it is to know something about the common things that we see and use every day; often, however, things seem so familiar to us because we hav always used them that we fail to think of their wonderful history.

As an example of this statement, we will take sponge. Perhaps you hav, this very morning, employed one in taking your bath; one so large that it would hold clear, sparkling water enough to giv you a shower bath. And do you not feel, after you hav rubbed yourself all aglow, just like a real new boy or girl? Does it not pay 100 per cent to be good to the covering, or, in other words, the skin, of these magnificent bodies of ours? My word for it, if we take better care of the outside and inside of these pretty houses that our minds liv in, we would not worry about our souls. These, through a healthful body, would grow strong enough to care for themselvs.

There is the small sponge for cleaning the slate, well washed before starting for school, leaving it just moist enough not to drip as you snugly tuck it away in the little oil-cloth pocket fastened to the inside of your book-satchel; I am sure, if you use it carefully, you will not disturb your teacher during the day by saying, "Please, may I wet my sponge?"

Now, I must tell you that sponge is the frame-work or skeleton of an animal. It was, for a long time, a question with naturalists whether this curious substance was of vegetable or animal origin. Some wise persons thought it was a plant; the ancients supposed it to be the connecting link between the two organic kingdoms. Modern students are pretty well agreed as to its animal nature.

As you all know, it is a product of the sea. When undisturbed in its ocean home it is covered with a substance much like the white of an egg in appearance. This is the flesh of the sponge, and is so delicate that drawing it from the water washes it off the skeleton. The strange animal is very sensitiv, and perceivably shrinks from the hand that reaches forth to tear it from the rocks to which it is attached.

The slimy flesh covers the outside of the frame-work and extends into all its curious pores, which givs it its great capacity for moisture. This flesh is made up of little points or cells too minute to be examined without a microscope. Each cell is constantly taking up nourishing particles from the water and appropriating them for the growth and sustenance of the animal.

There are many species of sponge found in different parts of the ocean, but the principal fisheries are in the Mediterranean Sea, around the Grecian Isles, and near the Syrian coast, A fishing boat generally contains a crew of four or five men, who search along the coast under the shelving rock, for sponge. Those found in shallow waters are torn from their rocky dwelling places by three-pronged harpoons. Those found in deep waters are procured by diving. When a great many are gathered, they are cleansed and sent to all parts of the world. I hardly know what children would do without sponge for bathing and cleaning their slates.

LAURA, O., May 3, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little boy ten years old. I go to school most of the time. I cut wood Saturday forenoon, and went a-fishing afternoon, but did not catch any. I hav a little pony; I call her Dolly. My pa bought a house and lot, and we moved into it. I went to the young folks' meeting. The preacher said he could not tell why he could raise his arm. Dear Miss Wixon, can you explain it? And he said (the minister), if you would open your mouth the word would come out. I hav three sisters living and one dead. I like to write to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I go to Sunday-school to learn singing. My pa is a mechanic. We hav a good school. I hav lots of fun with the boys. Miss Wixon, come over and see my pets. OTTIE L. HALL.

P.S.—How will this do for my first?

[All motions of the human body, and, in fact, the movements of all animals, are caused by contraction of the muscles. The act of raising the arm, lifting the foot, bowing the head, etc., are voluntary motions; that is, they are under control of the will, and are produced by contracting or drawing nearer together the muscles of the limbs, neck, etc. Other motions are independent, not only of the will, but also of the consciousness, as, for instance, the motion of the heart and stomach. Our bright correspondent will readily understand this brief explanation of how the arm is raised, and may perhaps explain in turn to the preacher he refers to in his letter above, which is a very good one for the first.—ED. C. C.]

Poetry.

To the Late D. M. Bennett, Freethought's Martyr.

[Died, a victim to Christian tyranny and persecution, Dec. 6, A.S. 282.]

"The founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER; the defender of liberty, and its martyr; the editor tireless and fearless; the enemy of Superstition, as of Ignorance, its mother; the teacher of multitudes; the friend faithful and kind; the man honest and true—rests here. Though dead he still speaks to us and asks that we continue the work he left unfinished.

"'When the innocent is convicted, the court is condemned.'"

—From the inscription upon his monument in Greenwood Cemetery, erected by one thousand friends.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshipers."—Bryant.

We know not where thy soul doth dwell,
O brother brave and true!
Perchance in earth—perchance where waits
Yet grander work to do.

We know not if again our eyes
May see thee, face to face,
Nor if in spangled fields of light
Thou still hast dwelling-place.

If we but knew beyond the tomb
That we should see thy form,
What matter how the tempest smote,
How roared the wintry storm?

We ne'er may know; we can but do
The task thy hand begun,
The plowshare seize that hand forsook,
And guide it grandly on.

Thy hand did sow truth's quickening seed
For all the sons of earth;
'Tis left for us, who loved thee well,
To shield from drouth and dearth.

Then join we, brothers, one and all,
Forgetting each his creed,
Nor let weak discords sap our strength
In this, our time of need.

What matter though a brother's faith
Be other than mine own?
Shall either, for so slight a cause,
Fight the good fight alone?

Oh, shame! Oh, let not Christians point
To us in righteous scorn!
No true reformer of his race
Hath aught of malice borne.

Then rally, brothers, as his soul
Were marching in the van—
Our martyred hero, well beloved,
The steadfast friend of man!

The New Books.

Of Voltaire's Romances, just brought out by Mr. Eckler, the Index says:

"Mr. Eckler seems to be editor as well as publisher of this excellent collection of some of Voltaire's most charming stories; for he givs in the preface a short sketch of the life of the famous wit, author, and politician, has embellished it with sixty-seven fine illustrations, and has added copious notes to enable the reader of to-day to understand more thoroughly the purport of these romances. He has been discriminating in his selection, declaring in his preface that 'the romances and tales in this publication hav been selected for their graceful and sprightly wit, as well as genial humor and keen satire; and, further, because they are free from even a suspicion of impropriety. They each teach a lesson of wisdom and morality; they teach courage, fortitude, and resignation; and, what is perhaps of even greater importance, they also tend to free the mind from the baneful errors of priestcraft and superstition." Among the illustrations are three portraits of Voltaire; one, the frontispiece, is from a bust by Houdon, representing him as he appeared in his eighty-third year; a full-length portrait shows him in his seventieth year; and the third, copied from a French edition of his works published in 1746, was taken in his early manhood. The full-length likeness givs a much kindlier expression to his face, while preserving all its marked characteristics, than any other picture of him we hav ever seen.

Moses Hull's New Thought likes Mr. Babcock's "Religion of Humanity:"

"A cursory perusal of the above mentioned pamphlet satisfies us that it ought to be circulated among Christians as a kind of missionary document. The author says:

"'If I shall ever arrive at heaven's gate, when St. Peter shall open the great book, if he has a correct account of all the facts, it will show that I hav sometimes given a little to the poor, and hav been good to dogs and cats, and hav always been merciful to my cattle and horses, and in my anger never struck my children a blow in my life. And if there is a God, it seems to me that when he examins the book he will say: "Peter, never mind about this man's faith account, but let him in, for the book shows that he has been merciful to animals and merciful to his children. A father who has been merciful to his children shall never hav it said that I hav not been merciful to my children."'

"The author pours his red-hot shot into the Christian castle. To those wanting that kind of reading the book is worth three times the price, which we believe to be 10 cents. To be had of the publishers."

Putnam's "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" also meets Moses's approval:

"This little poetic brochure gets its name from its first poem, which, by the way, is a very good one. In it the author says:

"'Behold, injustice conquers;
Pain curses every hour;
The good and true and beautiful
Are trampled like the flower.
You say he is our father,
That what he wills doth stand;
If he is thus almighty,
Why don't he lend a hand?'"

"In the same poem he says:

"'Alas! I fear he's sleeping,
Or is himself a dream—
A bubble on thought's ocean,
Our fancy's fading gleam.
We look in vain to find him
Upon his throne so grand;
Then turn your vision earthward,
'Tis we must lend a hand.'"

"This is followed by several fine poems, the sweetest of which are "Nature's Gospel" and an "Address to Deity." On the last page is a selection, "Giv us Light," which is worth more than the price of the book. Send to the Truth Seeker Company for it.

Of the same pamphlet Mrs. Slenker writes: The collection of poems embraced in the little pamphlet, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" is excellent. The sentiments are not only beautiful, but the true soul of a poet breathes in every line. The pure philosophy of Nature is dressed in the garb of the Muse, and right royally does she become her robes. The poems are full of enthusiastic romance, and of beauty, light, life, and love. They are materialistic and practical, and are full of golden truths based upon "this word" and its ecstatic joys and sweet delights.

Putnam's poems are always something more and better than mere rhymes. They are the full outpouring of the mind, heart, and spirit of the man. You see hope, love, joy, and bliss everywhere waiting for the earnest laborer in the vinyard of humanity.

I open the book, seeking for a specimen of its gems of thought. They bestrew its pages so thickly, I pause bewildered which to choose where all are so perfect:

"Weave then the golden future of your race,
With heart, hand, hope, and all your actions grace;
In sorrow labor, for the joy will burst;
Still bear the burden, and endure the worst;
For evil passes, while the good remains,
The seed we plant will laugh along the plains."

Isn't that beautiful, hopeful, and jubilant? No one can read Putnam's poems and say there is no poetry in Materialism!

"The poems [in Why Don't He Lend a Hand?] are written in Mr. Putnam's incomparable style, and are exquisit productions."—Pittsburgh Truth.

In "The Religion of Humanity Better than Eternal Punishment" "the writer has thoroughly but concisely dealt with all the principal portions of the Christian religion that are false, and shows the Bible up in its true but horrid light. The book is written in a very pleasing style."—Pittsburgh Truth.

He Will Get Drunk in Hell.

There is a fellow working the evangelizing "racket" in Tennessee named Sam Jones. Here are a few samples of his talk as clipped from a report of one of his harangs at Nashville:

I believe that the whale swallowed Jonah, and the only reason I don't believe that Jonah swallowed the whale is because the Bible don't say so.

You don't believe what you don't understand. Do you understand why some cows hav horns and some are muley?

You don't believe what you don't see. Did you ever see your backbone?

Custom is the law of fools, and is running this country.

God pity the man that can't run his home without a deck of cards. He ought to hav been in hell long before he had children born unto him.

I used to dance, but when I wanted a wife I went to the prayer-meeting, and I beat your sort, too.

You dance with this world and you'll go to hell with this world.

Some men think they hav backbone, but it is nothing but a cotton string run up their backs.

Any man who pretends to be a Christian and drinks whisky is a great big old humbug—a two-legged hypocrit.

Society is a heartless old wretch, and if you don't get out of it you will go to hell with it.

If anyone of you don't like the way these services are going, there are three doors—you are cordially invited to leave now.

Whisky is a good thing in its place, and that place is in hell. If I get there I will drink all I can get.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM
By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. ALL in a LIFETIME,
A ROMANCE.
BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers n the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay.

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

SIGNIFICANT. NEW AND BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIVE.

FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

(Design patented Feb. 24, 1885.)

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

DESCRIPTION:

The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3.00, $3.50, $4.00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

WHY trouble ourselvs about matters of which, however important they may be, we know nothing and can know nothing? We liv in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it. To do this effectually it is necessary to be possessed of only two beliefs—the first is that the order of nature is ascertainable by our faculties to an extent that is practically unlimited; the second, that our volition counts for something as a condition of the course of events.—Huxley.

THE lazy, the dissipated, and the fearful should patiently see the activ and the bold pass them in the course. They must bring down their pretensions to the level of their talents. They who hav not energy to work must learn to be humble and should not vainly hope to unite the incompatible enjoyments of indolence and enterprise, of ambition and self-indulgence.—Sharpe's Letters and Essays.

PAN is avenged! The fair dethroned gods
Whose awful wail, "Great Pan is dead!" proclaimed
The victory of the dying Nazarene—
The gods who, pale with fear and wonderment,
Were stricken on a sudden from their seats—
Who through the years hav seen man slaughter man
For the sweet sake of Pan's great conqueror—
Are all avenged. Their memory has been kept
That men may tell their children how of old
Their ancestors were strangely credulous;
They may go now—their places in the past
Are needed for a mightier form than theirs.
Pan is avenged! The cry, 'Great Pan is dead!"
Was but the prelude to a deeper wail;
For one whose form doth cover half the world,
Whose strength has gathered with the centuries—
Pan's conqueror—hath met a plain-faced foe,
Lacking in subtlety and outward grace,
But with an eye that pierceth through the veil
Of mystery the conqueror holds up
To daze men's sight, and with an arm that makes
A mortal wound at every blow it strikes,
And with a stride that moves but slowly, true,
But never draweth back, and with a heart
That dareth all, so that it find the truth.
Pan is avenged! The veil is rent in twain;
Serene-eyed Science standeth in the breach;
The Holy Place, forbidden unto men,
Unknown and unexplored, yet held in awe,
Proves but a vacant chamber. One step more,
Another blow like that which rent the veil,
And through the very wall light shall come in.
—Overland Monthly.

WHAT think you of St. Athanasius's creed? Is the sense of that so obvious and exposed to everyone who seeks it which so many learned men hav explained so different ways, and which yet a great many profess they cannot understand? Or is it necessary to your or my salvation that you or I should believe and pronounce all those damned who do not believe that creed. That is, every proposition in it?—which I fear would extend to not a few of the Church of England, unless we can think that people believe, that is, assent to the truth of propositions they do not at all understand —Locke on Toleration

COULD the thunders and lightnings of excommunication hav corrected the atmosphere of the church, not one pestilential vapor would hav loaded it for ages. The air of paradise would not hav been more pure, more refreshing. But what does history tell us? It tells us that the spirit of exclusion and denunciation has contributed more than all other causes to the corruption of the church, to the diffusion of error; and has rendered the records of the Christian community as black, as bloody, as revolting to humanity, as the records of empires founded on conquest and guilt.—Dr. Channing on Creeds, Intolerance, etc.

CANDID persons of all creeds may be willing to admit that if a person has an ideal object, his attachment and sense of duty toward which are able to control and disciplin all his other sentiments and propensities, and prescribe to him a rule of life, that person has a religion; and though everyone naturally prefers his own religion to any other, all must admit that if the object of this attachment and of this feeling of duty is the aggregate of our fellow-creatures, this religion of the Infidel cannot, in honesty and conscience, be called an intrinsically bad one.—J. S. Mill.

REFORMS are not so often carried by pitched battles as by an unconscious change of habits, an insensible abandonment of prejudices, a new atmosphere of thought You can no more replace the American woman in the position occupied by the Turkish or Hindoo woman than you can put the bird back into the egg. All that you can do is to recognize that proposition and accept the consequences. —T. W. Higginson.

TO everyone of us the world was once as fresh and as new as to Adam. And then, long before we were susceptible of any other mode of instruction, Nature took us in hand and every minute of waking life brought its educational influence, shaping our actions into rough accordance with Nature's laws so that we might not be ended untimely by too gross disobedience. Nor should I speak of this process of education as past for anyone, be he as old as he may. For every man the world is as fresh as it was at the first day and as full of untold novelties for him who has the eyes to see them. And Nature is still continuing her patient education of us in that great university of which we are all members—Nature having no Test acts.—Huxley.

NO man can giv another man power (and it would be to no purpose if God should) over that over which he has no power himself. Now that a man cannot command his own understanding, or positivly determin to-day which opinion he will be of to morrow, is evident from experience and the nature of the understanding, which cannot more apprehend things otherwise than they appear to it than the eye see other colors in the rainbow than it doth, whether these colors be really there or not.—Locke's Toleration.

Odds and Ends.

"PAT, what time is it?" "Oi don't know, Mike; but let's guess at it and then, begorra, the man as comes furthest off can go out to the kitchen and look."

A RECIPE for lemon pie vaguely adds: "Then sit on a hot stove and stir constantly." Just as if anybody could sit on a hot stove without stirring constantly.

IN the cemetery in the town of Duxbury, Mass., is this inscription on a headstone erected by a loving son in honor of his mother: "The chisel can't help her any."

I LIKE the mild spring air," said Deacon Gilpin as he sat down on Squire McGill's porch floor the other morning for a friendly chat. "How fresh it makes everything seem. Do you know of anything fresher than the gentle spring zephyr?" "No, I don't know as I does," replied the squire, "unless it is that ere paint you'r sitting in. 'Tain't been on the floor over two hours."

THE minister was struggling to put on a new fourply collar, and the perspiration was starting from every pore. "Bless the collar," he ejaculated, "oh, yes, bless it. Bless the blessed collar!" "My dear," said his wife, "what is your text for this morning's sermon?" "F-fourteenth verse, f-fifty-fifth Psalm," he replied in short gasps. "The w-words of his m-mouth were s-smoother than b-butter, but w-war was in his h-heart."

SHE had a voice like a siren when she sang:

"'Mid play sure, sand pal aces, though heam a Rome,
Be it averse, oh wum bull there, snow play sly comb.
H, arm from thesk eyeseam stew wallow a sheer,
Witch seek through the whirl disneerm et twithel swear!"

There wasn't a dry eye in the tabernacle, but if the program hadn't said in clear, unmistakable print that she was going to sing "Sweet Home," a man might hav thought his teeth loose without ever guessing it.

"THERE'S a great difference in people, isn't there?" "Yes; there is that." "Now, there's Deacon Parifer. You know what a mild-maunered man he is. When he asks a blessing, for instance, he does it so quiet and timid like that he seems to beg pardon for venturing to do it at all; but with Elder Rhoret it is altogether different." "How does he do it?" "Why, he humps himself over his plate, and he goes at it as though it was business that couldn't be put off, and he wanted it attended to right away. When he mentions the name of the Lord he don't do it with reverence and timidity, as Deacon Parifer does, but he blurts it out as though he had just hit his thumb with a hammer."

A PREACHER in Southern Missouri, after sending his hat around among the brethren and vainly asking them to contribute, clasped his hands, raised his eyes, and sai l: "Lord, this is the toughest crowd I hav ever found. I hav preached in the Black Jack neighborhood, and hav ridden the Red Range circuit; but this congregation occupies a place a little further removed from the giving spout than any people I ever saw. Amen." Then, turning to the sexton, he said: "I've got two gallons of whisky stored away not far from here. As I don't use liquor myself, I am going to giv it to some worthy man. Carry the hat around once more." The hat came back full of silver. The preacher went into the woods to look for the whisky. Up to a few hours ago he had not returned.

"How queer it is," said Jim to Jack,
"That it should be man's wont
To think things said behind his back
Are meant as an affront."

Jack's answer came quick, sharp, and blunt,
"It's more strange," he replied,
"That man should take as an affront
What's said as an aside."

"Yet you'll concede," said Jim at once,
"Much stranger it appears,
That one should ever get affronts
From debtors in arrears."

"You're right; but, after all, I don't Think that's so queer," said Jack,
"As this—that ever an affront
Should take a man aback."

ELLA WHEELER, describing the meeting of two fond young lovers, sings in her own sweet, wild way, "Love, when we met, 'twas like two planets meeting." I never saw two planets meet, says Bob Burdette, and always had an impression that the ceremony of introduction would be marred by the presence of a large acreage of cold and formal chaos. But if they only smile in a rapturous, over-the-garden-wall sort of a way, and look nervously up and down the street, and then go giggling off to the skating rink, where they can go sliding around on casters and lean up against each other and think—why I believe I don't care to see a whole reception of planets. It would be ten times more exciting to watch a man turn round a crowded corner with a long ladder on his shoulder.

FLIRTATION.

Flirtation is damnation.—Talmage.

Well, if flirtation
Is damnation,
Our fears away we'll fling;
For, if he's right,
Damnation's quite
A pleasing kind of thing.

And, by the way,
We here may say
That past experience teaches
There'll be once more,
Just as of yore,
Damnation at the beaches.

And sad to tell,
He knows full well
Who his experience searches,
There's often been,
Plain to be seen,
Damnation in the churches.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 21. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, May 23, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

BOYD WINCHESTER, the best poker-player in Kentucky, is said to hav purchased four sets of poker chips as a most necessary equipment in connection with the consulship at Nice. He proposes to make some innovations in the "Nicene creed."

OLD Mr. Bently: "I see by the paper that a revised edition of the Old Testament is to be published soon." Old Mrs. Bently: "Does it say who writ it?" Old Mr. Bently: "No." Old Mrs. Bently: "Well, it's perfectly scandalous. I s'pose it was that man Ingersoll."

THE original manuscript of "Tam o' Shanter" was sold in London the other day for $760. This is the highest price ever paid for a manuscript of Burns's. It consists of six leaves, foolscap folio, and on the last page there is also the whole of "Queen Mary's Lament," and a fragment of another poem.

THE following sentences were passed by the Recorder of Liverpool on the same day at the late Sessions: 1. Eugene Quinn, for stealing from his employer £862, eight months' imprisonment. 2. Bridget C. Thompson, for stealing a pair of boots, twelve months' imprisonment. 3. Samuel Purcell, for stealing a fowl, twelve months.

THE elaborate "icing" used on cards where a frosted surface is desired is said by the Midland Medical Miscellany to consist of powdered glass. It is dangerous material to hav about the house, especially where there are children. The girls who manufacture the cards and breathe the sharp particles of glass die early, or soon become helpless invalids.

IT is said that in the criticisms of the revised version of the Old Testament much comment is heard over the new translation of Ecclesiastes ii, 17, which instead of "Vanity and vexation of spirit" reads "Vanity and a striving after wind." This certainly is not a literary improvement. Yet in some pulpits it will be found a truthful and appropriate change.—New York World.

THE story is told that a certain man in Alabama desired to join the Episcopal church. The rector questioned him as to his religious views, and finding that he had no adequate idea of the obligations he was about to assume, advised him to wait until he had more fully studied the subject, whereupon the man turned away with the remark: "Very good; then I'll jine the Free Masons."

A NUMBER of wicked little boys were playing base ball in a vacant lot up town last Sunday morning. "This is scandalous," remarked a gentleman on his way to church. "I wonder there is no policeman about to stop it." "He'll be here purty soon," said a small boy; "I'm watchin' out for him." "Watching out for him!" "Yes, he's over at de beer saloon, playin' seven up wid de boss."

THE immediate publication of the manuscript diary of Shakspere's cousin, the town clerk of Stratford-on-Avon, is announced. The diary extends from 1613 to 1616—the years of Shakspere's residence at Stratford previous to his death on the 5th of May (April 23d, o.s.) of the latter year. From beginning to end it is a record of the attempts made to inclose, and of the resistance offered to the inclosure of, the common fields of Stratford, in which Shakspere was interested, not only as a freeholder, but also as the owner of a moiety of the tithes.

A MINISTER well known by name throughout the land, who has one of the best equipped houses of worship, says the Boston Journal, was showing a friend not long since, through its various rooms, when they came to the kitchen, which was connected by a speaking tube with the pastor's study. On the wall was printed in large letters, "The Lord will provide," while in smaller letters on the wall near the mouthpiece of the tube was the direction, "Blow and wait for an answer." The visitor naturally asked if the two inscriptions had any particular connection with one another; and a change was soon made in the lettering.

A MISSIONARY paper tells us, "It is one of the most hopeful features of our Christianity, at the present day, that she no longer treats the Jew with cold indifference." To which the Aberdeen Standard replies: "Judging from the Jewish homes that hav been destroyed by fire, at the hands of Russian, Hungarian, and Roumanian Christians, we should infer that they take a warm, nay, a burning interest in the Jew."

A LONDON crank, who assumes to be prophetically inspired, predicts that the queen of England will die a violent death, either during a fire, or in consequence of a fire, on the 10th of September, 1889, while the Prince of Wales will lose his life through some revolutionary movement on the 20th of January, 1891. The emperor of Germany will survive till the 10th of July, 1890; Prince Bismarck will probably be assassinated May 30, 1890.

A NEW YORK Sunday-school teacher told her pupils that when they put their pennies into the contribution box she wanted each one to repeat a Bible verse suitable for the occasion. The first boy dropped in his cent, saying, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." The next boy dropped his penny into the box saying, "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." The third and youngest boy dropped in his penny saying, "A fool and his money are soon parted."

THE publication of the "Life" of George Eliot, says the London Truth, has brought forth numerous biographical sketches of her husband, Mr. J. Cross, and in one of them, which has appeared in a great number of newspapers, it is asserted that his relativs "were strongly opposed to his marriage, and used all their influence to prevent it." This is pure fiction; there is not a shadow of foundation for any such allegations, which, of course, are most painful to Mr. Cross and his family.

THE salary of the occupant of the White House is never applied for by the president, but is made out in the form of a voucher at the end of each month and signed by the treasurer of the United States in regular order with hundreds of other vouchers. The private secretary receives the money, but the department requires the receipt to be signed by the president personally. The monthly voucher is $4,166,66; but for March, the month just closed, Mr. Cleveland drew $3,888,87, and Mr. Arthur $277.79.

AFTER communion the minister called a member of the church aside and said to him: "Brother R., a little matter occurred in the course of the communion services this morning to which I think it best to call your attention. I do not think anybody else noticed it, and it's a matter of small importance anyway, but the force of habit is stronger in some men than others, and—and—" "Force of habit?" interrupted Brother R., considerably nonplused. "I am utterly at a loss to know what you mean." "Why—er—I noticed that after sipping the wine you surreptitiously conveyed a clove to your mouth, Brother R."

AN eminent scientific man lately paid a visit to an old college chum, a minister in Perthshire. The minister, being asked about the visit, said: "He came to see me here some time ago, and stayed a day or two. He is terribly unsound." "You had a tough argument, I dare say." "'Deed had we; he is awful clever, and we sat up half the night debating. He is very unsound." "But you felt you had the best of the argument, didn't you?" "Weel, I am not verra sure that I made much impression—he is awful clever; but I was upsides in the mornin'." "How?" "I pat him intil my prayer."

THE Evening Post does not fancy the Ladies' Association undertaking "to help the Rev. R. W. McAll fight Infidelity in France." It does not pretend to know who Mr. McAll is, but it has a "profound conviction" that he cannot show "$20 worth of vanquished Infidelity" for the $20,000 he received from this country last year. It says that "the French Infidels are exceedingly tough customers," and that they hav gone over the ground so often that they are hardly likely to be willing to go over it again with Mr. McAll," who, "if he was the man these good ladies take him to be," would hav a great church somewhere, instead of doing the work he does at Paris.

THE last blast against divorce is by Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and the Diocesan Convention immediately appointed a committee to confer with other committees in the several states to abate "the evils of divorce by public sentiment and legislation." These anti-divorce screamers hav become nuisances. They would practically stop marriages by preventing the application of a ready remedy in cases of unhappiness. The more stringent the divorce laws, and the more ceremonial impediments are thrown in the way of lovers, the fewer weddings. Bishop Stevens should call off his preachers and puritanic laymen.—Sunday Mercury.

FAITH may remove mountains, and make other changes in the landscape, but it can't take the chill out of a Texas norther. Three negroes died at Palestine lately of pneumonia contracted by being baptized during the cold weather. The telegraph editor of the Galveston News consoles himself by heading the dispatch: "They are angels now—perhaps." The doubt expressed in that little "perhaps" is a very reasonable doubt. The only negro about whose condition there can be no doubt, who is absolutely safe, is the one who just before being swung up for some horrible crime "gits 'ligion." Heaven must be crowded with that class of cherubim.—Texas Siftings.

THE Penitentes of New Mexico are said by Birge Harrison, a fresh writer on the subject, to number 20,000. A statue of the Virgin was lately placed in the centre of a church, and the floor in front of it is strewn knee-deep with cactus, whose poisonous spines will sometimes pierce the heaviest soled shoes. Through this bed of thorns the Penitentes march with naked feet or crawl along on bare knees, calling piteously the while to the Virgin for forgivness of their sins. As if this were not sufficient, they scourge themselvs with great bunches of cactus tied together on a thong and slash themselvs with knives. The natural result of these horrible exercises is a death now and then, and many maimed and pitiable creatures who drag out a miserable existence for the remainder of their days.

A JAPANESE superstition has just been brought to light by the working of the conscription law. The head of a certain family was instructed that the time had come for his son, whose name appeared on the census list, to undergo medical examination prior to enlistment. The father lost no time in informing the authorities that the individual referred to, though bearing a male name, was his daughter. He explained that, having lost two daughters, both about one year old, he had been driven to this expedient to keep the third alive. In many districts of Japan people resort, in their anxiety to prolong the lives of their children, to the custom of bestowing upon their offspring names ordinarily given to infants of the opposit sex, whenever death has made frequent visits to their households.

THE Star's "Man About Town" says: There is a terrible break-up imminent in Beecher's congregation. And over what, of all things, do you think it is? Why, the pool-selling on the race course. A great proportion of the church-going Brooklynites are race-goers on the secular days of the week. And they bet their little pile, too, and they insist it is perfectly proper and moral and religious to do so. Beecher's son is counsel for Comstock, who has begun war on the pool selling, and Beecher comes out flat-footed to aid his son win his case. This is not "all in the family," though. It affects the deacons who amuse themselvs by scooping in the dollars of the suckers on the red-hot summer days when the dominie is "taking of his dolce far niente" at Peekskill. They kick against the parson and his forensic kid so vigorously that they threaten to take the roof off Plymouth and knock the salary props from beneath their "beloved pastor." When you touch a Brooklyn deacon on the pool box you hit him in the most vital spot.

News of the Week.

THE "Freedom of Worship" bill is dead.

MOODY and Sankey are at their old tricks in Brooklyn.

THERE were 15,454 immigrants landed at New York last week.

THE skater who won the six-day contest in this city last week made 1,166 miles.

GRANT'S physicians, in their latest report, announced that the patient's "general condition is pretty fair."

THE rebellion in the Northwest is practically ended, Riel, the leader, having been captured by Middleton's scouts.

OUT of the many thousands of persons who broke the law by selling liquor in New York last Sunday, sixteen were arrested.

BEECHER preached last Sunday on the progress of religious change. The sermon will be followed by others on evolution as it affects religion.

THE English war vessels hav left this port, and the Russian corvet will go next week. Her officers say there is no prospect of war this year.

MATILDA AVERECK, a nun, escaped from a convent at Milwaukee, Wis., and drowned herself last Sunday evening. The coroner promises to make a rigid investigation.

SERJEANT CROWLEY, the policeman charged with criminal assault on a sixteen-year-old girl, was found guilty and sentenced to Sing Sing prison for seventeen years and six months.

THE English government will send a medical mission to Spain to test the results of the system of inoculation with cholera microbes, which is claimed to hav proved beneficial where tried.

MILLIONS of feet of lumber were burnt last Sunday in a yard at Oscodo, Mich., and also at Lakeside in the same state. The loss is about $200,000. There are forest fires in parts of Wisconsin.

WHEN the new administration came to count the cash in the United States Treasury at Washington, there were two cents missing out of about $584,000,000. These are said to hav since been found.

BURTON and Cunningham, the Irish dynamiters who made several attempts to destroy government property in London with explosivs, were found guilty on Monday last, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

THE legislature of Tennessee has made it a misdemeanor to preach polygamy in that state. Under the provisions of this act three Mormon elders were arrested on the 16th and held for trial. Mormonism is gaining many proselytes in Tennessee.

NEGRO RUGG, who committed some half-dozen murderous assaults on people of Long Island, and murdered the Maybee women, was hanged last Friday. He had accepted a ticket to heaven by the Catholic route, and died in the hope of a glorious resurrection.

A THIEF has been working the Brooklyn churches for the past two weeks. Last Saturday night he robbed one contribution box in St. Luke's Protestant church, and six in St. Patrick's Catholic church. The name and denomination of the thief are unknown.

LARRY O'BRIEN was once an alderman of New York. George T. Truman was formerly a druggist in Chicago. Both are now toughs and bad men generally. They met each other on Broadway one day last week and had a quarrel. Truman slashed O'Brien across the stomach with a bowie knife, and O'Brien fired two bullets into the person of Truman. It is feared that both will recover.

The Destruction of the Mexicans a Necessity for the Church.

III.

Having, in my previous articles, substantiated by incontrovertible testimony and existing evidence that the religion of the ancient Mexicans was similar in almost every respect to that of the Roman Catholic church, and that a degree of civilization existed among them superior in many respects not only to their conquerors, but to the most enlightened nations of Europe, I propose to consider in this article their antiquity, and the direct necessity the church felt for their complete extinction.

As to the former, no better authority can be found than Humboldt, who observes that their traditions remind him "of others of high and venerable antiquity; that it is impossible to read the descriptions which Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus hav left us of the temple of Jupiter Belus, without being struck with the resemblance of that Babylonian monument to the teocallis of Anahuac;" and in describing one of their ancient pictures, he says: "We distinguish in the relief represented in the eleventh plate, a group of three figures of slender form, and drawn too correctly for the infancy of art." He considers their calendar to be "one of the most ingenious to be found in the history of astronomy," that nothing in the "denominations and hieroglyphics of their months indicates that they hav taken birth in a more northerly clime;" and in regard to their knowledge of the elephant, which is represented in many of their pictures, he wonders if they sprang from Asiatic origin, or if their traditions (burnt by the monks) went back to a period when America was peopled with those animals whose petrified remains are found even on the ridges of the Mexican Cordilleras," and that the analogies which are apparent between the Mexicans and Asiatics "perhaps preceded the present division of Asiatics into Chinese, Moguls, Hindoos, and Tungooses." "It cannot be doubted," says he, "that the greater part of the nations of America belong to a race of men who, isolated ever since the infancy of the world from the rest of mankind, exhibit in the nature and diversity of language, in their features and the conformation of their skulls, incontestable proof of an early and complete separation."

Professor Draper scouts at the monkish stories, and says that the student "will find himself constrained to cast aside such idle assertions as altogether unworthy of con utation, or even of attention." The celebrated Count Galindo, "fired with the contemplation of the Mexican ruins, pronounces that country the true cradle of civilization, whence it passed over to China, thence to Europe."

Prof. John Fiske, in reviewing this subject, says: "Now the Aborigines of this continent were made out to be Kamtchatkans, and now Chinamen, and again they were shown, with quaint erudition, to be remnants of the ten tribes of Israel. Perhaps none of these theories has been exactly disproved, but they hav been superseded and hav lost their interest. We now know that in the earliest post-Pliocene times, if not in the Pliocene age itself, at least four hundred thousand years ago, the American continent was inhabited by human beings."

Some of the early writers take a semi-enlightened view of this matter, but the Inquisition placed its iron hand on all works tending to disprove the Christian theory, and they were prohibited being published.

Boturini spent eight years in his researches, procured many ancient pictures and valuable manuscripts, and his museum was declared to be the most perfect in existence. But just as he was about to commence his work, he fell under the suspicion of the Inquisition, was sent to Spain, and his museum destroyed. He published a simple sketch from memory.

Although thoroughly Catholic, he seems to hav been enthusiastic on this subject, and in his eagerness to make the Mexican and Christian traditions correspond, says: "No pagan nation refers primitiv events to fixed dates like the Mexicans, . . and the first who were converted to Christianity, who were at that time perfectly well aware of their own chronology, and applied themselvs with the utmost diligence to ours, hav transmitted to us the information that from the creation of the world to the happy nativity of Christ, 5,199 years had elapsed, which is the opinion or computation of the committee of seventy." Or, in other words, as the Mexican fixed dates would not fit exactly into the Christian legend, the legend was made to fit the fixed dates, and the barbarous Mexicans, supported by the learned committee of seventy, hav given Christianity a new date for their Mosaic creation. But, as these Catholicized Mexicans were asked to compute from the birth of Quetzalcoatl to the commencement of the Christian era, it is evident that they must hav had a fixed date for the birth of their god, who was supposed by the Spaniards to hav been Adam, but it does not account for their other three periods of time, amounting to over thirteen thousand years, and for which they also had fixed dates. These three periods were pronounced myths by all Christian historians, yet, if one be true, why not the others? But, under the paternal care of the Inquisition, it would not be surprising if the Mexicans had made the date fit any groove demanded.

There seems to hav been some discontent pervading European circles at the awful slaughter of the Mexicans, and, in order to exculpate herself and show that there was a necessity for these severe measures, it was given out by the church that they were cruel to their prisoners, and were also cannibals. These charges were made principally by Torquemada —a very unsavory name. History records three of this family: Juan, a papal theologian who procured the condemnation of Wickliffe and Huss; Tomás, the first inquisitor-general of Spain, a man of bloody memory; and this historian. They were all members of the Dominicans, who sought "to merit heaven by making earth a hell."

Bishop Zumarraga, in a letter written a few years after the conquest, states that "twenty thousand victims were yearly slaughtered in the capital." Torquemada improves on this, and makes it "twenty thousand infants," and Herrera, "that twenty thousand were slaughtered on a specified day in the year." But Bishop las Casas says: "This is the testimony of brigands who wish to find an apology for their own atrocities."

Some of these veracious historians also state that at a dedication of a temple in 1486, the Mexicans sacrificed 70,000 slaves; Torquemada givs the number at exactly 72,344, another at 80,400, and still another rounds it off with an even 100,000; and all claim that the Mexicans feasted on the dead bodies. "But who can believe that so numerous a body would hav suffered themselvs to be led unresistingly like sheep to the slaughter? Or how could their remains, too great for consumption in the ordinary way, be disposed of without breeding a pestilence in the capital?" Yet this statement was accepted as a fact on the testimony of two common soldiers, who claim to hav counted 136,000 skulls in one temple.

In the educational statistics of Spain, published in 1880, it was noted as a lamentable fact that less than one in forty-seven of the population could read and write, and as at the time of the conquest, 365 years ago, this ignorance was even more widely spread, it is hard to credit that two common soldiers of that day could count 136,000 skulls in one heap.

As the Mexicans had all the ceremonies of the "holy church," is it not more probable that these skulls and bones belonged to their saints and holy martyrs? One of the wonders of the cathedral of Cologne is the chapel of the three magi, which contains the skulls of the three wise men who came to worship the infant Jesus; and any historian who will vouch for the genuinness of a "bottle of milk of the Virgin Mary" and "a finger of the Holy Ghost" is not, in my opinion, entitled to credit on any subject, not even his own personal identity.

One writer assures us, as a fact beyond dispute, that the devil introduced himself into the bodies of the idols and persuaded the priests that his only diet was human hearts. "It furnished a very satisfactory solution, to his mind, of the frequency of sacrifices in Mexico." Yet these slaughters and cannibalistic habits are not in keeping with the character of the king, who is recorded by these same historians as a man "of a mild and moderate disposition;" and of whom Diaz says: "On our way home [after the first interview with Montezuma] we could discourse of nothing but the gentle breeding and courtesy of the Mexican monarch;" nor with the account of the siege of the city of Mexico, where all admit that no suffering from famin could induce the Mexicans to eat the flesh of the killed, but is in better keeping with the reports of the siege of Roussillon, a city in Aragon, in 1475, where the Spaniards "did eat their own dead."

The United States hav been dedicated by the church to the "Sacred Heart," and cheap prints, showing the Virgin and Jesus with their exposed hearts pierced with a knife, are for sale in all Catholic book-stores. This custom seems to hav been taken from the Mexicans, as their pictures show that they were particularly fond of bleeding hearts; and the church must hav adopted it, after having condemned it as an emanation from the devil. This is not the only custom which she now indorses that could be traced to a similar source.

As far as the teachings and practices of Christianity are concerned, I hav shown that the Mexicans far antedated the present scheme, differing only in name, and they proudly pointed to their monuments and fixed dates as unquestionable evidences of their acquaintance with these things for thousands of years; so, finding it necessary to Catholicize what were left of them, the conquerors commenced by destroying their symbols and perverting their history. The first archbishop, Juan de Zumarraga, collected all their paintings, etc., from every quarter, piled them in a "mountain heap," and reduced them to ashes. Even the common soldiers destroyed every chart and volume that fell into their hands. McCulloh, possibly the most irrational of the later historians, admits this, and remarks, "But indignation is qualified with contempt when we see them thus ruthlessly trampling out the spark of knowledge, the common boon and property of mankind. We may well doubt which has the stronger claims to civilization, the victor or the vanquished."

Another says: "The war has never ceased against the monuments of the country, and the few that fanaticism has spared hav been nearly all demolished to serve the purposes of utility." From Cogolludo we learn that "the ecclesiastics whose care accelerated the conversion of the Mexicans to our holy Catholic faith, animated with a zeal which they felt for their interests, not only destroyed and burnt all the idols which they worshiped, but likewise all the books which they possessed and whatever else they imagined might furnish occasion for the practice of superstition or any pagan rites." Even those which escaped the hands of the conquerors and were carried to Spain as curiosities suffered in like manner. One valuable MS. belonging to the family of Giustiniani was given to the children as a plaything for the nursery, and on several occasions they tried to burn it, but, being painted on tough deer-skin, it was preserved, though badly scorched. This feeling against the Mexican evidences seems to hav been indulged in up to a recent period, as an attempt was made to erase several passages in the Codex-Telleriano-Remensis, by crossing out some lines with a pen and totally obliterating others.

Kingsborough informs us that in Mexico it is probable that great pains were taken by the monks and clergy to root out all remembrance of Quetzalcoatl, and that legendary tales relating to his life were not allowed to be inserted in books published either in Mexico or in Spain, and adds: "It is very remarkable that Bernal Diaz, who wrote a circumstantial account of the conquest of New Spain (Mexico), and whose memory seems scarcely ever to hav failed him, should, in describing the city of Cholula and its famous temple, hav declared that he had forgotten the name of the idol (Quetzalcoatl) to whom it was dedicated; although it appears, from what he says a few chapters afterward, that he had not forgotten the number of steps of which the staircase leading to the upper area of that temple consisted." The original MSS. of Torquemada's "Indian Monarchy" were mutilated by command of the church, and when the second edition was about to be printed the editor admitted that the entire first chapter of the second book, which he calls "the key," was omitted, and appealed for permission to publish it, saying that "the reasons for secrecy seemed no longer to exist." But this permission was refused, and had it not been for the "preservation of a chance copy of the first edition, from which a second was printed in 1723, the name of Quetzalcoatl would scarcely hav been handed down to us."

Don Martin Fernandez de Navarrette tells us that when the publication of the "last will" of Bishop las Casas was referred to the Academy of History at Madrid their decision was that they did not think it convenient to allow it to be published. This bishop had spent fifty years of his life trying to ameliorate the condition of the Mexicans, and crossed the Atlantic twelve times to plead their cause. In vain had he shown that whole provinces were depopulated for the sake of working the mines; that thousands were perishing in the pearl fisheries, sugar plantations, and other laborious and unaccustomed work, and beg for mercy for the remaining few. The fiat of the church had gone forth; the secret must be kept; legends could not contend with fixed dates, and Europe trembled in the balance so long as one educated, un-Catholicized Mexican lived. Humboldt speaks of a picture painted after the conquest, showing a number of Mexicans being driven to the banks of a river, where they were first baptized and then drowned.

We find a peculiar reason given for the extermination of the Mexicans, in the following: "The clergy who first proceeded to the New World were extremely desirous to discover the fulfilment of the prophecy in the history of the Mexicans; nor did some of them scruple to affirm that they had discovered the beast mentioned in the Revelation, and pious enthusiasts like Rev. Edward Irving easily persuaded themselvs, from the shape of the Mexican lake, that Mexico must be the beast spoken of in the prophecies, since nothing in their opinion could be more clear than that a beast must mean a state or city, and Mexico being situated on the shores of two lakes which presented in their shape a mysterious combination of the seven component parts of an animal, and the sign of the beast was indicated by the licentious (?) manners of the Mexicans, therefore the church should crush this sanguinary monster."

Could fanaticism go further? Simply because the peculiar conformation of their lake, with its outlets and supply streams, could be magnified into something resembling the component parts of a camel—head, neck, body, and four legs—the inhabitants should be slaughtered! What a pity that the "lunatic of Patmos" had visions, was inspired to write Revelation, and left no key for their elucidation!

Another writer justifies the "church" in her conduct and gravely insists that the Mexicans were barbarians and deserved the most extreme measures, because they called their devil "the rational owl;" for, says he, "How can the devil be rational?" Yet he forgot that the Christian devil, their "Prince of Darkness," is called "Lucifer" (light).

But "the business of conversion went on prosperously. It was not difficult to pass from the feasts and festivals of one religion to the feasts and festivals of the other." It was simply a change of name. Drop Quetzalcoatl and insert Jesus. A few years ago, while in South America, on one occasion I attended a public gathering, and being then very orthodox, was greatly shocked at hearing a man, calling for one of his companions, cry out: "Jesus! Jesus!" but I almost had a paralytic stroke when I saw the homeliest negro in the world, as I then thought, come forward and answer to the name. Before many months had elapsed, I found that Jesus was a very common name, and that many a pretty girl delighted in the euphonious title of "Jesucita" —little female Jesus. This was the direct result of the system adopted by the missionaries. If there were a Jesus in every family, there would be no fear of his being forgotten.

Having destroyed, as they thought, everything that could militate against the "Holy Mother," the monks proceeded to make a history for the Mexicans, and it was duly given to the world that they were "the ten lost tribes of Israel."

Acosta devotes several chapters to a description of their wanderings, for it is an unquestioned fact that in remote antiquity the Mexicans had been a nomadic race. He says: "This going forth and perigrination of the Mexicans will happily seem like to that of Egypt, and to the way the children of Israel made, seeing that they, as well as those, were warned to go forth and seek the land of promis, and both the one and the other carried their God for their guide; consulted with the ark and made him a tabernacle; and he advised them, giving them laws and ceremonies, and both the one and the other spoke many years in their voyage to the promised land, where we observe the resemblance of many other things as the histories of the Mexicans do report and the holy scriptures testify of the Israelites." But "the ingenuity of the chronicler was taxed to find out analogies between the Mexican and scripture histories. The migration from Aztlau to Anahuac was made typical of the Jewish exodus. The places where the Mexicans halted on the march were identified with those in the journey of the Israelites, and the name of Mexico itself was found to be nearly identical with the Hebrew name of the Messiah. This parallel was so closely pressed by Torquemada that he was compelled to suppress the chapter containing it on the publication of his book."

While the Dominicans were so busily engaged trying to find Jews in America, the Inquisition in Spain, under the control of the same order, was equally busy in trying to turn Jews out of that kingdom.

This Jewish craze lasted down to the time of Lord Kingsborough, whose work, published in 1830, is devoted to the proving of this hypothesis. It is possibly the most elaborate of its kind in existence, and was so expensiv that the publishers were obliged to ask $875 for the nine volumes. Much midnight oil was wasted and many learned treatises written to sustain the above proposition. The Mexican writings were twisted and turned into every possible shape and position, and some wonderful discoveries were made, as the similarity between Quetzalcoatl and Jesus, and the similar observances in their respectiv religions, had to be accounted for.

Boturini assumes that Quetzalcoatl was Adam, and admits that the Mexican's fixed dates proved that he had been born 5,199 years before the Christian era; another historian, finding in one of the Mexican writings an adjuration commencing, "O Sun and Earth," insists that he was Moses, because Moses is reported, in Deuteronomy xxx, 19, to hav said, "I call the heavens and earth to record this day," etc.; Kingsborough maintains the same opinion and claims that the Mexican Bible, which was called Teoamoxtli, was in reality the "Pentateuch," for, says he, "Teo means divine and amolt is book, and moxli must mean Moses; therefore the true meaning is 'divine book of Moses.'" Bnt Dr. McCulloh brings many labored and equally sane arguments to prove that he was Noah. Another scouts at the rest and claims him to hav been Job, "for the Mexicans having a great predilection for sculpturing figures, Quetzalcoatl must hav been Job, as it is plainly set forth in the nineteenth chapter of his book, 'were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever.'" As one of their paintings represented something like a jaw-bone with grass growing out of it, another enthusiast presents the claims of Isaiah to that honor by triumphantly pointing to chapter lxvi where it says, "Your bones shall flourish like an herb."

Every custom of the Mexicans was closely scanned and, if possible, forced into a Jewish groove. They offered their children in the temple; so did the Jews. They held their naming as an important ceremony; so did the Jews. Cholula, one of their principal cities, had for its symbol "a deer's foot." So it was claimed that the name was originally Churula—and an analogy between that and Jerusalem being arrived at; the song of Solomon, "The voice of my beloved! Behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart," was quoted in connection with the deer-foot symbol, to prove that Cholula was named after Jerusalem. But by far the most ingenious reasoning is to be credited to Boturini. He says that he was able to prove by the Mexican records that the eclipse claimed to hav taken place at the death of Jesus actually did occur, and as the Mexicans divided their time into cycles of fifty-two years, which was nearly the age attained by Christ when he was crucified, they must hav been Jews. Moreover, as Bar Chocoba, the Jewish messiab, came to the front exactly fifty-two years after the death of Christ, they divided their time in cycles of fifty-two years in his honor. This reasoning had such weight with the Dominicans and Franciscans that their authorized representativ, Friar Thomas Ortizius, in addressing the "council of the Indies," urged it as a principal reason why the Mexicans should be made slaves.

Whole columns could be filled with these comparisons, each writer seeming to hav some particular friend whom he wished to nominate for the position; but all agreed that the Mexicans were the "lost ten tribes of Israel," and although no two could agree on any one person to substitute for Quetzalcoatl, yet, because the Mexicans practiced circumcision, did not eat pork, presented their guests with water to wash their feet, and their paintings represented their gods with long noses, it was unanimously conceded that these eastern customs and exhibit of long noses were indubitable evidences of the truth of the Jewish theory. But Garcia, after vainly trying to make the Jew fit into the Mexican groove, givs it up in disgust, and remarks: "There are not wanting those who affirm that the Mexicans feigned their own early history after having heard the early history of the Jews." And Prescott passes over "some remarkable traditions bearing a singular resemblance to those found in the scriptures."

After a while it dawned upon these commentators that as the so-called "lost tribes" were conquered by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, and carried captivs into Mesopotamia in the year 721 B.C., it was not clear how they could be identified with the Mexicans, in vew of the latter possessing a knowledge of all the fundamentals of Christianity; and then the war broke out afresh. "The eye of faith could trace in the Mexican paintings the whole story of the passion, the savior suspended from the cross, and the Virgin Mary with her attendant angels." As all the knowledge of the Mexicans had evidently been imparted to them by the devil, and it was not within the providence of God that the evil one should be allowed to utilize true Christians, it was determined that in some unaccountable manner he managed to transport some of the Manicheans over to Mexico, and thus a perverted knowledge of the truth was spread in America. As, for obvious reasons, it was not stated how the transportation of these early schismatics took place, this theory did not long hold sway, though all conceded the power of levitation to the devil, for he had carried Jesus up to the pinnacle of the temple. But the levitated Manichean would hav equal rights to canonization with the levitated St. Theresa. Therefore they looked further, and it was demonstrated this time, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that Quetzalcoatl and Jesus were the self-same persons.

The former, being described as ugly, was compared with Jesus, according to Isaiah: "His visage was so marred more than any man." And as the same prophet predicted, "Butter and honey shall he eat," accordingly the Mexicans ate cakes of honey at the feast of Quetzalcoatl; and as one of the favorit Mexican dishes was fish and honey, this custom originated in the tradition that Christ ate broiled fish and honeycomb after the resurrection, as recorded in Luke. Their writings were overhauled again, and one historian, having found the following, "Behold the king himself present, whose words thou shouldst receive and store up in thine heart," triumphantly quotes them as proof positiv of this god being Jesus; "for," says he, "the Virgin Mary is said in Luke ii, 51, to hav kept the sayings of her son in her heart."

Notwithstanding the undoubted sanity of the writers, and thorough conclusivness of these arguments, they did not suit all; so another ingenious gentleman discovered that the Mexicans received their knowledge of Christianity from some of the early saints. He informs us that their language did not hav the letters B, D, F, G, R, and S, and that therefore "the approximation in sound of Jesus Christ to Quetzalcoatl will appear as a near attempt at the assimilation of these two proper names." For J they would use Qu, the vowel e necessarily following, and the letter s by an easy transition became tz, and we then hav Quetz for Jes; the Latin termination us being changed into al, as better adapted to the Mexican language, we then hav "Jesus transformed by this easy and simple method into Quetzal." Now, as Christ said to his disciples, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves," therefore the saints who converted the Mexicans called themselvs serpents, which is the meaning of the word coatl"

Kingsborough elaborates many theories, but always keeps in view his Jewish theory. Yet he cannot help wondering at the accuracy displayed by the Mexicans in reporting the actions in the daily life of their god, and compares it with the few accounts transmitted to us of Jesus; for, "deducting the three last gospels, which are simply a repetition of Matthew, his (Jesus's) biography is reduced to a few pages. But possibly the four evangelists were the only primitiv Christians acquainted with the art of writing."

Having ransacked the Bible to find a "type" for Quetzalcoatl, and closely scanned the claims of all the saints from Adam to Jesus, including Judas, the Dominicans, headed by Torquemada, gravely inform us that the missionaries supposed him to hav been an Irishman, because he was called Cuculan in Yutucan, wore a hood and vest covered with red crosses, and ate raw meat. This certainly is a libel, and can only be accounted for by the fact that the missionaries were Spaniards, and presumably at that day, as now, were, like all foreigners, opposed to the Irish.

But Dr. Siguenza, supported by other learned Spaniards, unwilling that all the credit should go to the "Isle of Saints," insists that Quetzalcoatl was St. Thomas, giving the following reason: The Mexican God was named Topiltzin Quetzalcoatl and that of the saint was Thomas Didymus. The "To" in the Mexican name was an abbreviation of Thomas (in Spanish spelled Tomas); piltzin means son or disciple, and Quetzalcoatl corresponds with Didymus, and means a twin. Therefore, as Quetzalcoatl was a twin and St. Thomas also, they must be the same person. I respectfully protest against this style of reasoning, for, if it be allowed, it might be productiv of unpleasant results, as the only escape from canonization I can now see for a modest, retiring man would be to bring evidence that he was a triplet.

The admirers of St. Patrick, however, were not inclined to allow his claims to be disposed of in such a summary manner, so another learned man insists that the Mexican god was the Irish saint, because when in Palenque he (the learned man) saw an idol with three heads, and this was St. Patrick's emblem, for he had converted Ireland by exhibiting the three-leaved clover. This shrewd exhibit of the first recorded patent seems to hav carried the day, and St. Patrick now stands as the patron of Mexico. If I were indulging in surmises I might be led into speculations, but being simply a compiler, I will only add, palmam qui meruit ferat.

The Abbé Clavigero, who wrote a complete history of Mexico, in three volumes, undertakes to defend them from all charges, and at the same time to reconcile the two records. He admits their deluge, and claims the total destruction of all life on this continent. A considerable portion of one volume is devoted to proving that it was possible for animal life to cross the ocean or by way of Asia to repeople America, and he enters into an exhaustiv argument to prove that though a sloth can move only seven feet a day, yet by the assistance of divine providence he would arrive in time. Then, as if dissatisfied with his own premises, he intimates that the angels might hav assisted in the work of transportation. He is careful not to assign any given one to any particular part, but leaves to the imagination of the reader the beautiful sight of Gabriel or Michael flying toward the American shore with a skunk under either wing.

He also defends the Mexicans against the charge of having introduced into Europe a nameless disease, which, if history records truly, "attacked the pope on his throne and the peasant in his cabin"—a sad commentary, by the way, on the vow of "perpetual chastity" of the holy father.

In order not to tire the reader, I will cite only one more instance in respect to the making of a history for the Mexicans.

One Fernando de Alva Ixtlilxochitl, a Mexican, born in 1568, nearly half a century after the conquest, was educated by the priests, and being somewhat precocious, a bright idea took possession of the clergy, and he was set to work to write a history of Mexico. It was duly announced that he was of royal blood, and had every facility for treating the subject in a truthful manner. He estimates the duration of the Mexicans as a nation at 1,417 years; the foundation of their city in A.D. 1325; that they did not begin to wear clothes until A.D. 1390, or just thirty years before the conquest, and differs with Torquemada, who, in order to reconcile the two records, frequently makes a king reign one hundred years, and in one case one hundred and eighty years.

But, taking into consideration his royal blood, the tale runs smoothly enough till he begins to treat of King Nezabualcoytl, whose early history is a perfect romance, and reminds me very forcibly of the various adventures of Alfred the Great of England. Having conquered his enemies, like Alfred, this king mounted the throne, and then we hav the story of David and Uriah, only in this case the woman is simply betrothed; but otherwise it is the scriptural tale verbatim et literatim. Not being blessed with children, the king retired to his country seat and fasted forty days, and was then soothed by a vision showing him that he would hav a son to comfort his old age. When this became a fact, he built a temple and dedicated it to the "unknown god, the cause of causes," and spent the rest of his days in meditation on the future. When on his dying bed he called his son, and besought him not to neglect the worship of the unknown god, and assured him that "the time would shortly come when this God would be known and worshiped throughout the land." This king died 1470, about fifty years before the conquest. The royal historian, being under the direct control of the Dominicans, is thereby shielded from being considered either a plagiarist or a liar, or both.

Had these various historians been better acquainted with church history, or somewhat less of zealots, they might hav found an easier solution to the problem than any of the above theories. "Bible Myths," page 409, givs the key in this one short paragraph: "Melito (a Christian bishop of Sardis), in an apology delivered to the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, in the year 170, claims the patronage of the emperor for the now-called Christian religion, which he calls 'our philosophy,' on account of its high antiquity, as having been imported from countries lying beyond the limits of the Roman empire, in the reign of his ancestor Augustus, who found its importation ominous of good fortune to his government. This is an elaborate demonstration that Christianity did not originate in Judea, which was a Roman province, but really was an exotic oriental fable, imported from India, and that Paul was doing as he claimed, viz., preaching a God, manifest in the flesh, who had been 'believed on in the world' centuries before his time, and a doctrin that had been already preached 'unto every creature under heaven.'"

So the Mexicans were Catholicized, and "under the Spanish domination their numbers hav been silently melted away; their energies are broken. In their faltering step and meek and melancholy aspect we read the sad character of the conquered race." Yet only a short time ago Mgr. Capel informed the American people that "my church" was the only one that had converted and civilized a nation. If he would compare the present state of Mexican civilization with that which obtained under Montezuma, he would see what Roman Catholicizing her has produced. Let him open a telescope before one of the peons of the present day, and he will find that the fellow will hasten before the nearest alcalde and swear out an indictment claiming that Capel had tried to shoot him with a Gatling gun.

In these articles, all my information is derived from what might be termed eminent Christian authority, and I hav quoted but three times from opposers of the church. The inferences are my own, and being given as natural deductions, hav simply the weight of an individual opinion. Much more could hav been said, but lengthy articles are not for newspapers. If inquiry be started, my object will hav been attained, and I hope, in the near future, that some activ, intelligent mind, such as Prof. John Fiske, will become interested in the subject, giv it a thorough investigation, and place the results before the public; in that event, I think I will be supported in my claim that to fully appreciate the true history of the Mexican people, it is necessary to read the various accounts carefully, and not to accept as a fact any statement that is not fully proven, and which does not commend itself to one's intelligence.

I think that the antiquity of this people has been proven; also, that they were kind, gentle, and refined; possessed many of the arts and sciences, and had a thorough knowledge of what we call the Christian religion. That they were annihilated needs no effort on my part to sustain; it rests with each reader to determin for himself the reason why. The Dominicans, who "armed the hand of brother against brother, and, setting their burning seal upon the lip, did more to stay the march of improvement than any other scheme devised by human cunning, and, having branded their victims with infamy in this world, consigned them to everlasting perdition in the next," are no longer a factor, and the inevitable law of compensation will mete out to them their just reward.

To the student of comparativ mythology, the history of Quetzalcoatl is of great importance, as it will enable him, in a measure, to trace the course of the great Trinitarian myth, which was first conceived in the East, and thence spread over the world. He will also be able to determin that this Mexican god, like all of similar description, loses all personal existence and becomes a creation of that primitiv religious sentiment which clothed "the uncomprehended powers of nature with the attributes of divinity."

Some may feel satisfied with the "devil theory;" others that Quetzalcoatl was the "type of Jesus Christ;" few, I hope, that he was either an "Irishman" or a "twin." The many will say:

'Tis strange such difference should be
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee.

If there be any others who really believe that our civilization needs a distinguishing adjectiv, I hope that, before becoming too deeply compromised with any existing form or name, they will carefully consider the claims of Quetzalcoatl. He was a virgin-born crucified savior and Christ; was born, according to the Mexican fixed dates, before that eventful day when the Lord God turned tailor for the benefit of Adam and Eve, and comes to us well vouched for both by the records of his own people and high Christian authority. Moreover, he is, so speak, "to the manner born," having been a nativ of this continent.

McARTHUR.

The Liberal Club.

At the second-story window of a house on Third avenue, on the evening of Friday, the 15th, sat a large and contemplativ German in his shirt-sleeeves, gazing down the street in a dreamy way. He was baldheaded, and was smoking a pipe that had a long stem.

"'Ach!' spricht er, 'die grosste Freud' Ist doch die Zufriedenheit!'"

The match with which the pipe had been lighted fell upon an awning below, which began to burn. The contemplativ German smoked on. Somebody on the street let go the awning halliards and the awning spread itself with a snap. A round hole big as a peck measure was seen to hav been burnt in the cloth, and was surrounded with a narrow rim of fire. A dapper man in a high hat came along and poked at the fire with his cane. Then the contemplativ German aroused himself. Laying down his pipe, he procured a pail of water, brought it to the window, and, taking a careful aim, discharged it at the hole in the awning. The water went through the hole in a solid volume, put out the fire, and struck the dapper man fair in his upturned face. He sat suddenly and unexpectedly down. When he got up he was swearing mad and made derogatory observations about the average intelligence of Germans as a people. Then he walked away, looking savagely back to fire a scathing remark at the contemplativ German. The German relit his pipe, spread a handkerchief upon the top of his bald head to keep off the draft, and still gazed down the avenue in a dreamy and contemplativ way.

With his mind cheered and enlivened by this incident a man wearing a badge pin with a torch on it sought the Three Hundred and Seventy-ninth Regular Meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The hall was full. There were no copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon the secretary's table, as the supply had not been equal to the demand. Numerous people had to go without it, which should impress upon all the fact that now is the time to subscribe. President Wakeman sat on a front seat looking over a proof-slip upon which marks had been made regardless of the sensibilities of the printer. A member near by looked at his watch and saw that it was eight o'clock. He therefore told the president that it was quarter past eight, and that he had better open the meeting.

The lecturer for the evening was Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, whom the chairman introduced with remarks of a flattering character. Mr. Palmer's subject was "The New Education." To avoid any error being made in this report the lecture had been printed and was handed the writer by the secretary.

It appears that in the rear of All Souls' church on East 20th street in this city there is established a school and tool-house where children are given an industrial education along with the common sort. Herr G. von Taube, a member of the Liberal Club, is principal of the school, and this lecture was an explanation of its methods, written at the request of several well-known gentlemen. The primal necessity of life, Mr. Palmer said, was to be a good animal. A sound body must be taken as the desirable basis of a sound mind and of a clear conscience. Therefore they had physical training first at this school. Next, on the theory that it is better to learn things than to learn words, the powers of observation were assiduously cultivated. The speaker went to some extent into the question of sensations and perceptions and the power of the sensory organs, and their susceptibility to improvement. The mode of punishment adopted in this school was to send the refractory pupil home, which usually broke him up completely. The tool-house played an important part in teaching the scholar to apply his knowledge, besides having a good moral influence. Morality Mr. Palmer defined as the science of right living. Education here was strictly secular. But if a secular, in no sense can the school be called an irreligious one. As Mr. Von Taube had eloquently said, "a fully developed and educated mind cannot possibly be irreligious in the higher acceptation of the word." The lecture was attentivly regarded, and everybody said it was a good one.

It was then announced that the able and instructiv discourse to which we had listened was open to discussion in speeches of ten minutes each. Members of the club had the preference.

Mr. Leipsicker said that the present system of schools generated dudes who were fit for bookkeepers and clerks, but were not workers. Our schools are a relic of the past. Teaching has not been reduced to a science as it should be.

Dr. Eccles agreed with the speaker. Education was all there is of life. Education, acquired through superior means of observation, constituted the difference intellectually between the frog and the oyster; and the amount of information which man obtains, as compared with the limited educational advantages enjoyed by the monkey, gave the human individual the bulge on the simian.

Herr von Taube spoke next. Persons at the back part of the hall could not hear what he said. Those forward understood him to recommend manual training as the solution of the labor and social question. Besides this he would hav a friendly feeling of equality cultivated, and the spirit of caste exorcised. It was hoped Herr von Taube would add a word on the subject of religion and education, and dispel the doubts raised by Mr. Palmer's reference to "irreligious in the higher acceptation of the word," but the audience were left to work out the problem unaided. It must be admitted that the phrase contains vast possibilities of construction.

Mr. Blissert inquired fervidly how the waifs of Baxter street were to be benefited by the Gramercy Park School and Tool-house in the rear of All Souls' church. Mr. Blissert is a bloody dynamitard, and doesn't believe any of New York except the Catholic churches and the poorer quarters is worth saving. The rest might as well be loaded with dynamite and fired off.

Mr. Palmer had very little to add in closing the discussion, except to return his acknowledgments for the kindness of his hearers.

It is useless to disguise the fact that the next meeting will be one of absorbing interest. The lecture is to be delivered by Hermon Shook, Esq., of the New York bar. His name has been previously mentioned in these reports, more latterly in order to express regret at his absence from the meetings. His subject is "Wisdom Traps," and those who hav allowed themselvs to be led astray by the allurements of philosophy or the delusions of science will be warned to return to the fold while it is the accepted time and during business hours.

News and Notes from the Field.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The noble generosity of D. A. Blodgett resulted in a splendid series of meetings at Grand Rapids, among the most successful of the campaign. From twelve hundred to sixteen hundred people attended. They were held at the Opera House on Sunday afternoon and evening, May 10th, and Monday evening, May 11th. J. M. Jamieson, a pronounced Liberal and earnest worker, editor of the German-American, and a prominent lawyer, presided.

On Monday evening Mr. Watts reviewed a lecture by the Rev. Mr. Gilbert, who had taken it upon himself to attack Ingersoll, and had proudly vaunted his ability to debate with the Infidels. But when the challenge really came, as usual with his cloth, he pleaded other duties and refused to defend his faith upon a free platform. Evidently he is as wise as the serpent, who knows how to wriggle away when he finds an enemy too strong for his poisonous fang. He was, however, brought squarely to the book by Mr. Watts, before one of the most brilliant audiences of the season, and his absurdities, ignorance, and cowardice were thoroughly shown.

All the local papers spoke in the highest terms of the meetings. Alluding to the Sunday evening meeting the Morning Telegram observes:

"A large audience listened to the lecture, nearly every seat on the two lower floors being occupied, and a number of persons on the third floor. The audience was evidently composed largely of people who think favorably of Liberalism, as shown by the fact that the name of Thomas Paine was received with hearty applause when mentioned. Samuel P. Putnam, of New York, also made a few remarks before Mr. Watts appeared, urging upon Liberalists and Freethinkers the importance of organization.

"Mr. Watts is an orator, and his discourse was interspersed with many anecdotes and witty sayings like Ingersoll's."

The Daily Eagle remarks: "Mr. Charles Watts spoke before a crowded audience in Ponier's Opera House. He is a very eloquent and powerful as well as a pleasing speaker, and the audience manifested their approval by frequent applause."

Referring to the Monday evening lecture the Times says: "Redmond's Opera House was literally packed last evening with an attentiv audience to hear Mr. Charles Watts." The Morning Telegram observes: "Mr. Watts handled his subject in an exhaustiv manner. He is a scholar and orator, and deals with his opponents with fairness. He leaves an impression that he is thoroughly in earnest and anxious to discover truth."

The thanks of Liberals throughout the country are due to Mr. D. A. Blodgett for the energy, the self-sacrifice, and generosity with which he inaugurated and conducted this magnificent enterprise in behalf of Freethought.

An organization has been started, and under the management of such ardent Liberals as Mr. and Mrs. Bayne, Mr. and Mrs. Colestock, Mr. Jamieson, and others, both ladies and gentlemen, no doubt a most successful society will be established.

To our surprise and delight, we met our undaunted coadjutor, C. B. Reynolds, at Grand Rapids. He is busy laying out plans for a snmmer campaign. He has almost concluded arrangements for the purchase of a tent, and soon his banners will be floating in the air and orthodoxy will be attacked in its strongholds. Mr. Reynolds has rare gifts for an undertaking of this sort, and undoubtedly will carry it forward to fruitful results. He has had years of experience; he thoroughly understands what is to be done and the best methods to do it; he is plucky, energetic, enthusiastic, and, above all, he has faith in his work! The manifold life of Liberalism to-day, which touches the highest hights of the intellect and must meet the wants of the humblest toiler, can hav no one particular way by which to unfold its resources and power. The very breadth and importance of our cause demand the trial of different methods in order that all paths of progress may be found. Our movement is thoroughly democratic, and cannot attain its sublimest excellence unless it answers to each form of life. On the broad bosom of nature we recognize not only the glory of the star but of the rock and sod.

Our bright and genial co-worker from Chicago, E. A. Stevens, was again with us, having the good fortune to tarry for a "Sabbath day's journey" at Grand Rapids. We also enjoyed the companionship of Professor Orchardson, the well-known artist and dashing Liberal campaigner who bearded the lion in his den and defied the bishop even in his church and flung the lie back into his face. With all these congenial spirits present, Reynolds, Stevens, the professor, Mr. Blodgett, and others, we might say that we hav had an impromptu Liberal convention of the raciest sort, and it has been a sparkling inspiration indeed. These hav been bright days in the midst of difficult labors; and our heart takes to itself new courage, new hope, and exultation in the progress of mankind.

Not among the least of our delights at Grand Rapids was fellowship and acquaintance with Mr. Powers of the Unitarian church. In common parlance, he is a "Rev.," but as he does not like the handle I shall not giv it to him, for I know by experience what an uncomfortable appendage it is. It always sounded to me as if it were the alias for humbug. Mr. Powers stands, like Mr. Savage and Mr. Chadwick, upon the extremest verge of the Unitarian movement where it almost blends with Liberalism itself, and one can scarcely see the difference. I suppose there is a difference, but, perhaps, more in method than intellectual conception. The question, of course, is a practical one. At what point can this or that radical thinker best advance the cause of humanity? There must be some limitations of course. Absolute freedom is impossible. Therefore each must choose his limitation as well as liberty, only one must choose not for worldly advantage, but for moral power and opportunity to himself.

I recognize the invaluable service of the advanced Unitarian movement of the West, and the manliness of Mr. Powers and others, who, choosing a different point of vantage from ourselvs, labor with such courage, and charity, and wholehearted conviction. Mr. Powers gave us a ringing discourse on Sunday morning on the value of truth. I wish every Liberal could hear it, and read it too. I would like to see it published in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It was an eloquent exposition of the truth as we hold it. It was a trnmpet call to the duty of the hour. The imperishable truth is that truth which we can practice, which we can put into the life of humanity, which is available for its happiness. Buy this truth. Possess it at any sacrifice, and then sell it not, but liv it forth so that it makes more beautiful the path of human endeavor.

The best of friends must part, they say, and the happiest day will come to a close, and change is the law of life; and so, having hung our banners on the outward walls, and driven the clerical fox but would-be lion into his hole, we strike our tents and seek fresh adventure and other fields of conflict.

We cannot complain of our present lot. How delightful it is here at Springport! It is a fresh May morning. The beautiful birds are singing in the sky. The air is balmy with the sweet wings of spring that float and glitter in the azure heavens; the bosom of the earth seems to thrill with a sense of coming glory, and the clouds drop music.

This is a small village of about five hundred inhabitants, but there is a rich and flourishing farming country about it, and material prosperity, of course, makes Liberals. Mr. M. L. Day is the leading Freethinker in this place, and with the like generosity of Mr. Blodgett, planned the series of lectures to be given here, the first Freethought lectures in Springport. From five to ten miles around whole families of Liberals came in last evening, with a sprinkling of Christians, and the Opera House was well filled with an attentiv audience. As Mr. Watts arraigned the errors of Christianity, some who perhaps did not know exactly what might happen, and fearing the wrath of God, took their departure. The majority, however, evidently sympathized with the glowing and bold utterances of the orator.

We lecture here again this evening, May 13th; at Auburn, Ind., 14th and 15th; at Sturgis, Mich., May 17th; at Louisville and vicinity, May 24th; at Alliance, O., May 31st; at Massilon, June 2d and 3d; at Medina June 4th and 5th; at Canton June 7th; at Pittsburgh, Pa., June 14th, and from thence return to New York. There is probability of a debate at Waynesburg, Pa., between June 7th and 14th. We hav been compelled to change our dates on account of unforeseen circumstances, but whether here or there the work will still go on.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The League Executiv Committee.

Mr. C. B. Reynolds, having appointed the Executiv Committee of the League, it may not be amiss to call the attention of the members to the duties attached to the office. Article XI. of the League Constitution is:

The Executiv Committee shall be composed of one member from each state and territory of the Union, and shall act under the instruction of the Board of Directors. It shall be the duty of each member of the Executiv Committee to select and associate with himself four other good citizens of his own state or territory, as the Executiv Sub-Committee for that state or territory, and he shall himself be chairman of the same, and promptly report its organization to the Secretary of the Liberal League. Each Sub-Committee shall appoint a Local Agent in as many of the cities and towns of its own state or territory as possible; it shall be the duty of each Local Agent, with the help and co-operation of the state Sub-Committee, to organize, if possible, a local auxiliary Liberal League in his own city or town; to report its organization promptly to the Chairman of the state Sub-Committee, and to promote by its means the general objects of the National Liberal League.

Mr. Reynolds's Work in the Field.

The indomitable energy and wisely directed enthusiasm and zeal of the trinity, Roman Staley, S. F. DeJones, and Harry Hoover, backed by the ready aid of the band of real workers, preserves for the Pittsburgh League the honor of being the banner League of Pennsylvania.

We lectured before the League on April 5th on "Facts and Fallacies" to a large and attentiv audience; on April 12th on "Biblical Ghostology," and, notwithstanding the bright warm sunshine made outdoors so attractiv, the hall was crowded, and the interest so great that urgent requests were made that the subject be continued next Sunday, which were complied with, and we are encouraged by the conviction that not alone was new and effectiv ammunition supplied our friends that would do good service against the enemy, but the shackles of superstition that bound many honest hearts in the dark dungeons of fear and doubt were shattered.

The work is making good progress in Pittsburgh. It is to be regretted that a more suitable hall cannot be obtained. Many are kept away, especially ladies, on this account. Then, too, there is need of a library and a suitable room for science school, elocution, music, and other classes.

We respectfully suggest to those who most complain of these lacks that they at once go earnestly to work and induce the wealthy members to form a stock company and erect a suitable building for the Pittsburgh Secular Society.

The lower floor could be fitted for stores, the upper front rooms for offices, and would rent for sufficient to pay handsome dividends on the capital invested; while the League would be provided with suitable hall (which could be rented to other societies when not used by the League), library, class rooms, etc., at mere nominal rent.

It must be admitted that the present workers hav all and much more than their share of burden and responsibility to carry. Here is opportunity to supply an urgent need, greatly advance the cause, and erect an enduring monument to the memory of those who will take the initiativ in this work. There are plenty of wealthy members ready and willing to invest if the plan is made feasible and promises profit. An earnest, persistent effort will insure success.

A large number of the members of the Pittsburgh League reside in Allegheny, but are somewhat dilatory in crossing the river to attend the League meetings. In company with the indefatigable Roman Staley ("the noblest Roman of them all"), we waited on Brother J. H. Ebeck, of Ohio street, and found a kindred spirit, who readily entered into our plans, and, regardless of pressing business calls, secured the German Bank Hall for Sunday, April 19th, and so aroused the enthusiasm of the Liberals and people in his vicinity that we were greeted with a crowded hall of most intelligent ladies and gentlemen. We spoke on "Heaven and the Angels." All were deeply interested. And thus was inaugurated what we hope will prove a long-continued series of lectures in Allegheny that cannot fail of most glorious results.

The eloquent, able, and energetic president of the Pennsylvania State League, Prof. Wm. Seymour, will lecture there May 3d and 10th.

There is good prospect of the hall being rented for the year; this will afford opportunity for establishing science school, elocution and music classes on each Sunday evening when no regular lecturer is engaged.

The work in the two cities is booming. A spirit of fraternity, generous hospitality, and deep interest in all that pertains to the advancement of the cause is a marked peculiarity of the Liberals of the Pittsburgh League. May this spirit permeate our ranks and thus lighten the labors of the workers until glorious victory shall crown our endeavors.

On Sunday afternoon, May 3d, we had the honor of making our debut before a Philadelphia audience. The large upper hall had been engaged, and was about two-thirds filled. We were very much pleased to find a large and efficient choir of some fifteen ladies and gentlemen, under the leadership of Brother King. They gave a delightsome concert as prelude to our lecture on "Salvation."

The indefatigable secretary, Geo. Longford, did a thriving business at the book stand. THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its admirable cartoon, was in great demand. Immediately after our lecture the supply was exhausted, much to the chagrin of Brother Longford, and the great disappointment of a large number.

The noble example of Brother Longford in devoting himself to the circulation of Liberal literature is worthy of all commendation and emulation by all League secretaries. Every Liberal publication sold is read by many persons. The ideas and arguments advanced by lecturers are all forgotten or distorted. Those contained in the little publication at every reading repeat and reiterate with the same calm, quiet earnestness, the same plain truths which, at first angrily rejected, are studied, then endured, and finally embraced.

Securing subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER invariably adds honest-hearted, intelligent men and women to our ranks, and paves the way for the lecturer, not alone securing hearers, but inducing contributions to defray the cost.

The Philadelphia League, in addition to its music class, resulting in its accomplished choir, hav instituted a series of social festivals. On the first Sunday of the month they provide not alone a feast of reason, and sweet melodies to exhilarate the mind, but a substantial banquet—under the modest name of supper—so that all can stay through the interval between afternoon and evening lectures and enjoy a social visit.

It is well to cultivate a spirit of sociability and hospitality so that visiting friends will not be so forcibly impressed with the fact that they are strangers in a strange city—the City of Brotherly Love with the love and brotherhood dropped out.

Sunday evening the hall was crowded, extra chairs till there was no spot to crowd another in—standing-room was at a premium. We, by request, told "Why I Left the Pulpit,' and for an hour and thirty minutes, despite the heat and discomfort from their overcrowded condition, the audience gave most earnest attention.

Our sojourn at Philadelphia was rendered most pleasant and enjoyable by the great kindness and genuin whole-hearted hospitality of the family of the energetic and able president of the Philadelphia State League, Prof. Wm. Seymour.

The Philadelphia League is a power for good. We trust one and all will realize in unity there is strength, and that only through efficient organization can we hope for salvation.

The Kansas City, Mo., League

From the Kansas City Journal of May 4th.

The first regular meeting of the Kansas City branch of the National Liberal League took place yesterday afternoon at Turner Hall, 12th and Oak streets. Mr. David Eccles, who filled the position of temporary chairman, opened the meeting. Mrs. Judge Krekel was suggested as the first regular president of the society. She refused to be a candidate for that position. Judge Krekel was then unanimously elected president. Mr. Eccles and Mrs. Krekel were named as candidates for the secretaryship, but Mrs. Krekel, not believing in having too many representativs of the same family among the officers, again declined, and Mr. Eccles was elected. Mr. J. W. Weirt was elected vice-president, and Mr. Ebenold, treasurer. A committee of three, consisting of Mr. Eccles, Mr. Ebenold, and Mrs. Judge Krekel, were appointed to make arrangements for getting a hall. It was decided to meet next Sunday evening.

Mr. Eccles said that they must begin right or the whole undertaking would be a dismal failure. A very little is enough to turn the direction of a stream, and a very little might result very seriously for the society. He stated that it is proposed to form the society on the Nine Demands for humanity.

Judge Krekel delivered a short lecture on "Civil Government." "My lecture," he said, "will be the first of a series showing the objects and benefits of government. I hav found by an experience of many years the great advantage a person gains by knowing something about the government in which he livs. If any one goes to the polls to vote for, say a member of Congress, this candidate being one out of fourteen or fifteen aspirants for similar positions in the state, could he explain the law of his voting for this one candidate? When you see a policeman arresting a man, and claiming him as a prisoner, can you tell why and how he has this right that no ordinary man has? Thus we may run over the whole system of government. If we were asked what rights hav certain men to do certain acts and duties, we should be able to answer intelligently. Men say often that they hav not time to examin into these affairs. Our republican government is made of the smallest links, each one not too large for a child to grasp at. Other countries intend to keep their government a mystery, so that their people will hesitate to act. Here it is desirable that every man should know the workings of the government. Does a man by his vote act directly upon the government itself? For the want of knowledge, men will attribute the shortcomings of the government to others. It is said that rascals liv in Washington. They are, however, our agents. What right hav we to complain when we hav the power to remedy the evil in our hands. I propose, during my course of lectures, to take the government of this country link by link, part by part, and show, when our duty is fully comprehended, the corruption of the government must cease. When we know that we erred in depositing our votes, we see the way to correct our error next time. The family is a government in itself. The parents are the lawgivers. The father says do this or that, and when the child refuses to obey he is punished. In judging if a child has made a mistake the father or mother acts as judge. When a person has examined into family laws he knows the principles of government. In civil society everything may be called government. When there was no law men agreed to do so and so. In small communities then agreements became usages. When two communities come together they compare usages and adopt the best. Finally they become laws."

The following are the names of those who are regular members of the society in this city: Judge and Mrs. Krekel, Mr. S. D. Bowker, Miss Mattie V. Krekel, Mr. L. Wiener, Mr. Louis Ehntich, Miss Mattie Parry, Mr. Z. T. Hulett, Mr. John Hadlon, Mr. Charles C. Morin, Mr. Michael M. Garry, Mr. Henry Ebenold, Mr. A. P. Communications.

The Relocation of Religion; or, Harrison versus Spencer.

This book* is important and interesting, and yet in some respects bad and regrettable. It is made up of the articles with which Messrs. Harrison and Spencer hav of late wildly belabored each other in English magazines and newspapers on the subject of Religion. The editing has been done by Prof. E. L. Youmans in the manifest interest of the Spencerian philosophy.

"The lions were not painters," said the noble brute, when shown the picture of a man slaying the king of the forest. The Spencerian editor has taken equally good care to picture his hero as the victor, and so he is, on the defensiv, but not over his opponent. In this controversy both parties are victors, because each is successful in defending his own position, but each is signally defeated in his attack upon the other. Each, in claiming too much for his own position and rejecting all religious value as to the position of his opponent, has left himself and his cause, and indeed the whole subject, in an unfortunate position. Let us see how and why this is true.

The bottom trouble is that science has swept the foundations from under our old religion and its sentiments and morality. The business of modern philosophy, represented by Comte and Spencer, is to relocate religion and its substitutes and belongings in the new world into which we hav drifted since Copernicus and Bruno, i. e., since A D. 1600. Let us take the question in its simplest form. The original condition of consciousness and of all philosophy is simply that of the two factors: I=not I—that is, myself related to the external world about me. Now, this world was originally identical with god or gods, and is so still with the fetichist or nature-worshiper. The relation of man to these world-deities was therefore the sum and substance of religion. But these gods hav passed from fetichism to astrolatry, to polytheism, and thence to monotheism, and now under Spencer there is no dwelling-place for the last stage of theism but the Infinit or "Unknowable," where God dwells as an "Infinit Eternal Energy." In a word, the Not I, or God, is but another and the last way of construing our World. Now, this world has been divided up or differentiated into five grand divisions by the progress of science, viz:

1. The Unknowable: Infinit absolute existence beyond the relations by which human knowledge is possible. On this Mr. Spencer lays his religious emphasis.

2. The world of Matter extending from each brain to the farthest star. On this world the Materialist lays his religious emphasis.

3. The Vital world of living, organic, growing things, viz., plants, animals, and man. On this world naturalists lay religious emphasis. So that Nature is the God of biologists.

4. The Social organic world of the whole succession of mankind. On this world the Sociologist or Positivist lays his religious emphasis. To him Humanity becomes the Christ-God; to them, the ideal "Son of Man," as we find in Comte, Congreve, and Harrison.

5. The Ideal world of ideas, thoughts, and feelings within men. This becomes to the Positivist a true spiritual world—the "kingdom of heaven within you," and your race, continued and continuing for countless generations.

These five grand departments hav been worked out of the original confused world which was all one confusion to the savage. Now, it must be borne in mind that the religious ideas of the race hav grown and been divided and differentiated so that a part of them has to be found and relocated in each of these grand divisions of the world. Religion is the sum of man's relation to the whole world, including his fellows and race. Therefore, as the world has been divided, these relations, and the consequent sentiments and duties connected with religion, hav been gradually differentiated and distributed to and among these several five grand divisions.

The scientific relocation of religion consists in the truthful recognition of this fact, and the finding of the relations in thought, sentiment, and action which modern life bears to man in each of these five grand departments. Evolution has caused this differentiation of both world and religion to occur as counterparts of each other. All of this immense change of world-viewing has come about as naturally, too, in the sublime progress of humanity as in the unfolding of the petals of a lily.

With this hint we can see plainly how that Spencer and Harrison are both right and both wrong. Spencer lays the religious emphasis on the Unknowable, because it is, and always has been, the source of wonder, awe, and the feeling of dependence and resignation before the Infinit, which is a plenum, back of all conceivable relations and correlations of the knowable world. These overwhelming sentiments hav always been present in religion as its backlog. His doughty assertion of this truth is well, but when he goes, or seems to go, farther, and claims that these ultimate thoughts and sentiments are, and always hav been, the all of religion, he is manifestly in error. The practical part of all religions has rested, and always must rest, upon the knowable, or that which man believes to be knowable and known.

Thus the Materialist is right in his emphasis upon the laws, necessity, order, and grandeur of the material world as the basis of all practical religion and life, as Buechner teaches us. So, too, the Naturalist may claim that man is but the feeder upon plants and animals, through which need he is compelled to cultivate, and to catch and domesticate them, with the consequent enlargement of his intellect and affections. He finally includes the whole world as alive—as Goethe did.

Then the Positivist proves that the whole human race is the sublime organism growing by generations through the centuries, as to which Niagara is nothing, and old ocean hardly worth a comparison. Here, as Comte has shown, the moralities, duties, and spiritual aspirations of man took their rise, and must ever hav their culture and fruition. Therefore the Positivist seizes this flower and fruit of all the world and all men and all time as the practical religion—and why is he not right?

Our modern harp must hav all of these five strings, and all that there was of good in any old religion will be found to echo from one or the other of these strings. The true philosopher and religionist will play them all harmoniously, and instead of losing sight of any, will rejoice that the division into separate strings has given mankind the power to rise to higher integrations of truth and harmony than the past of any religion or philosophy had ever conceived as possible. Nor less true is it that he who keeps harping upon one string only, and especially if in defiance of all the others, will make sad discord, and spoil the religion which is the music of life.

Now, this is just what Spencer and Harrison hav been doing in their foolish and short-sighted quarrel. Spencer should hav known better, for he dares not say that the unknowable will fill the bill of religion, old, or new, or practical. He admits defeat when in this very book he repeatedly refuses to say this. (pp. 162, 163.)

"Awe and wonder" as to the Unknowable make a good foundation of religion, but plainly that is of little use unless followed up by culture, disciplin, and worship necessarily based on the knowable laws of the Cosmos and of Man, and inspired by enthusiasm for an Ideal which will prompt to action, and make life worth living.

Now, as the old creeds fall away or change, the Positivists bring forward the motivs of Altruism based upon the Cosmos and Humanity to inspire, console, and reward. From this point of view Mr. Harrison is not only impregnable, but fitly supplements Mr. Spencer. Could they but see that one is playing upon the bass and the other the alto string of the same harp, how sweet the music! Instead of that, they strike the bitter jangle that rises from this book unworthy of them both.

The effect of the whole book would be bad and regrettable indeed for the reasons above given, but for the insertion in it of the admirable review of this very controversy by Count Goblet D'Alviel'a, the distinguished author of "The Contemporary Religious History of Europe," and the professor of the History of Religions in the University of Brussels. This scholar, from his habit of comparing religions, could not but see that each of our disputants was but emphasizing his own part of the same world story, of The Infinit, The Cosmos, and Man; and that they were doing it so earnestly that they could not take time to listen to and to understand each other. This duty of listening, comparing, and understanding, which our chiefs are too busy in battle to heed, we, as their followers, must all the more carefully attend to. In this regard, Mr. Wm. Frey, a member of the Society of Humanity in the city of New York, has worthily led the way in some articles, entitled "The Religion of Humanity," which were originally published in the Index of Boston. Count D'Alviella refers to these articles as noteworthy and coming from a Positivist of the Liberal school. Could they be largely read, as they should be, we should hav no more of this blind work of setting up one part of the world as excluding the other, or supplying its place in science or religion. The Truth Seeker could not do better than to reprint these articles of Mr. Frey, and send a copy to Mr. Spencer, Mr. Harrison, and, above all, to our friend Professor Youmans. We say to the Professor last named, for he should be, if possible, brought to see that the Positivists hav the flower and fruit of the new scientific Tree of Life, whose roots, indeed, are hidden in the Unknowable, where it is useless to dig after them, or to worry over or to wonder at them. They will take care of themselvs beyond our knowable world. The man concern is to make the human will, in Comte's happy phrase, the complement of the laws of the Cosmos and of Man, so that the estate of mankind shall be constantly increased and bettered on earth. The humblest Positivist who works and aspires and "prays" for this result is not a safe subject for ridicule.

Prof. Youmans has seen fit to close this book with "A Positivist's Religious Service," evidently with the purpose of raising a laugh at all Positivists, and particularly Dr. Congreve, the leader of one of the Societies of English Positivists referred to. This is quite unfair and will not aid the cause for which it was inserted. For, first, it is well-known that Dr. Congreve has separated from Mr. Harrison's society and phase of Positivism expressly on this ground of "formal" religious worship. Mr. Harrison, in this very controversy, declines even to apply the word "holy" to Humanity, and would not, and, therefore, should not, be measured or ridiculed by any doings of Dr. Congreve's society. Then, too, the account itself is evidently the caricature of some sensational visitor or reporter, who knew about as much of the true inwardness of what Dr. Congreve and his fellow-worshipers were about as a Hottentot does of the solar system. No scientist should allow himself or his readers to be imposed upon by such an account, much less use it to excite the mirth of the ignorant, the vulgar, or the prejudiced.

Every sociologist knows that nothing is more absurd than a new religion, except an old one. But veneration and fear of consequences keep him from ridiculing the old theological egoistic religions. The time has come to let curiosity and hope treat with the same respect the first lispings of the only scientific and altruistic religion that has come to voice on our planet. That its infancy will seem meaningless, strange, absurd, and uncouth is to be expected, but only to a surface observer. For if, as Count D'Alviella, the expert critic, intimates, and as Mr. Frey proves, the Infinit, the Cosmos, und Man are back of that simple worship, and can by it console, disciplin, and inspire men into living a truer, better, and higher life than they could without it, the judicious will grieve at this groundling's laugh. No great religion has come to mankind except by upheavals of the human soul that hav to others appeared only as folly, absurdity, and generally insanity. So was it with Buddha, St. Paul, Mohammed, Swedenborg, and George Fox. But the real blessing comes after the volcano and the storm. Read Macaulay's account of the rise of the Quakers—could folly and insanity go further? But what hav not "the Friends" done for philanthropy, science, and humanity?

The time may come when the self-made philosopher, Herbert Spencer, will appear to hav been but little more than a useful scientific critic and commentator of and upon the scientific and religious movement inaugurated by the foolish, absurd, and insane Auguste Comte, who taught Mr. Spencer, and the world, the two new and most "religious" of words, Sociology and Altruism, realizable only by the Religion of Humanity.

We must try to do justice to the founder of this religion, and of the philosophy of science upon which it rests. He first clearly conceived the classification of the sciences on the scientific law of correlation; he first seized the law of progress and evolution in sociology, and taught us the word; he first conceived of the human race as a grand organic being, as the test of law, morals, and of all human conduct—the basis indeed of all human welfare and progress; he first developed the ideal kingdom of heaven out of the hopes and aspirations of the human heart based, upon the truth and the sublimest and purest devotion of altruism. His personal idiosyncrasies, his Utopias and Clothilde-worship, and even his papacy, with all it implies, will fall away before the great truths and impulses for good which he impressed upon his fellow-men by a religious life of singular devotion and eccentricity—eccentricity natural enough, as we hav remarked, in the founder of a new view of life and destiny commonly and properly enough called a practical religion. Out of this new order of human conceptions has begun to grow, and finally out of it the republic of mankind is surely destined to arise, for he builded wiser than he knew—wiser and grander than the papistic dream he thought he was born to realize.

This new view of human lot and fate may, in its intellectual phase, be called the Positiv, the Synthetic, the Cosmic, or the Integral philosophy. The names matter not. They hav a common method, test, and object. They are all varieties of the scientific species of philosophy which came to us three hundred years ago. All who are of it should recognize their brethren as working in different fields of the same great domain, and learn to co-ordinate instead of antagonizing their efforts. May books of controversy, like the one before us, be henceforth of the past!

Inductiv Science and Theology.—The rise of the Baconian philosophy, with its determination to subordinate ancient principles to modern experience, was the heaviest blow which has ever been inflicted on the theologians, whose method is to begin, not with experience, but with principles which are said to be inscrutable, and which we are bound to believe without further difficulty.—Buckle..

Some Christian Superstitions.

[The following article, from the lecture of a Hindoo pundit, apart from its other merits, is valuable as showing something of what the Hindoos hav for a religion as well as what they think of Christianity. It is from the Bengalee, translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Amrita Lal Roy.—ED. T. S.]

Twenty-five miles north of Calcutta, on the river Hugli, is the village of Bhatpara. This place shares with the town of Nuddea the distinction of being one of the two chief seats of Hindoo learning in Bengal. Some time ago Pundit Maheswar Vidyaratna, thereof, delivered a series of lectures on the "Merits of the Different Religions Existing in India," vindicating the superiority of Hindooism over the rest. During this course he made some pertinent remarks on "Certain Christian Superstitions." The lectures were widely noticed in the Hindoo papers, and the following account is taken from one of these reports and put in shape for American readers:

Pundit Vidyaratna (Learning-Gemmed) is fifty years of age, a little over the middle hight, and of light build. His features are sharp and aquiline, his face is clean shaven, and on his shaven head he wears a slight tonsure. He is perfectly healthy in body, and possesses that companion of good health, a fund of good spirits. The pundit's reading is vast and industrious, and has lain specially in the field of exegesis, both of his own and foreign religions. His views are rather optimistic, though he holds that however hopeful and happy human aims and ends may be, our methods should always be serious—not reckless from mere buoyancy. Since the death of his wife, fifteen years ago, Pundit Maheswar has remained a widower, and has taken up the championship of true religion, and the combating of what he calls "western errors" as his vocation for life. "We hav enough of our own old mistakes," says he, "without being deluged by new accessions. Let us be ever on the watch that, duped by gilded titles, we take no tinsel for gold."

"The first fact, my children," said the professor, in one of his lectures, "the first fact that you ought always to bear in mind in connection with this new-fangled nostrum of Christianity is that our wise forefathers hav taught again and again that the principle of 'atonement' is good and useful so far as it goes, but that it does not go all the way; and that 'incarnations' show to deluded mortals only one step farther on the road. This so-called atonement, rightly viewed, is nothing more nor less than the expression—the promis, so to say—of the ultimate reunion of God and man in the lives of men who form, as it were, a link between the higher and the lower world, and whose noble seif-sacrifice cannot fail to make the world cleaner and lift it higher, as all good actions of necessity do. The sacrificed lives of God's true children do, indeed, purchase salvation for the human race, but only in so far as they are the earnest of other good lives among mortals of humbler pretensions.

"The lesson of the life of a Buddha (seer), or of a yogin (devotee) who givs up his life to high meditation and sacrifice for his fellow-men, is that the yearning after the Ideal Being and self-abnegation are the primary stepping-stones towards regeneration. The 'incarnate' is only one after whom, not in whom, we shall liv. The final beatitude of nirvana may be attained only by the continuous efforts of the seeking self toward the Central or Ideal Soul. Good works (karman) and self-culture (jnanam) are the only means for that purpose. The great superiority of our religion over all others is that we do not try to sneak behind a Mediator. Our own selves are our mediators at every stage in the long chain of transmigratory existence from the time when we were incased in the body of a dog to when we shall be one with God; and we are liable to advance or slide back according as we do well or ill in the present life. The great lights of the world only show us the way, but we stand or fall by ourselvs. There is no high morals in escaping upon another's shoulders.

"Yes, my friends," he concluded with a triumphant wave of his right hand, "we hav reason to glory that ours is no passport system to pack off deadheads with a Tract Society's waste papers.

"What a self-contradictory, unintelligible riddle is the triune God of the Christians! Men distinguish persons by their respectiv individualities. The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost must each hav a distinct individuality, otherwise they could not be persons; and so they must hav their wills and affections separate from one another. And how could any sane Hindoo be expected to believe in an absurd confusion of one into three and of three into one, when his own religion offers a trinity far more logically and clearly defined? Our triad of the Creator (Brahma), the Providence or Sustainer (Vishnu), and the Destroyer (Siva), instead of being a trinity of persons, is the trinity of the attributes of the same, one, great being. Perfect equality prevails between these attributes, whose personifications we worship. In our sacred history Brahma offers prayer to Vishnu, Vishnu pays homage to Siva, both Vishnu and Siva worship Brahma, and so on. Whereas, far from there being an equality between the three persons of the Christian godhead, there are numerous places in the New Testament where the subordination of the Son is indisputably and clearly set forth.

"The Christian Bible teaches us that 'God created man in his own image.' In what sense is man the image of God? Clearly, not in his person? If Christians admitted that, they would be guilty of very bad paganism in giving a physical form to God. The only answer is, then, that man is the image of God's nature, spirit, and love; because we recognize glimpses of these godly attributes in him, more or less. And if God's nature is infinitly pure, holy, and perfect, how, then, could his image, man, be totally depraved in his nature, as these same Christians tell us? How, also, could an utterly and inherently depraved creature follow up Christ's commission, 'Be ye perfect, even as your father in heaven is perfect?'

"What is the logic of the prayer over the 'heathen soul' of the poor hungry man who is decoyed into the mission-room by means of rice and soup? Are the chances not that the ignorant man, who has not the remotest idea of self-culture, would come to believe from all he hears and sees, as we know he generally does, that everything in the Christian scheme was to be got vicariously—the soup, the salvation, and the prayer too—and that all one had to do was to mutter 'Amen' at the end of each mouthful of grub or prayer? 'Struggle is the law of life,' so our Christian rulers and merchants tell us as they giv another turn to the screw by which to wring out our every means of subsistence. Very well. But if one must toil from morn to night for a loaf of bread, must he not strive of himself all the greater for purchasing eternal bliss for the soul? Or is this prayer system a contrivance by which missionaries make their own struggle in life pretty easy? Or is it rather a scheme suggested by the banking system of trading peoples, of drawing checks upon the deity on behalf of themselvs and their converts—checks, whose worth must, of course, depend upon the real claims of the payee and the solvency of the payer? What if either of these be found unsubstantial on the appointed day, and if prayers don't draw? Wouldn't our enthusiastic friends, then, be in a bad fix and sorely vexed—the more so because their want of forethought and their practice of speculating in morals had left them complete bankrupts?

"In regard to the threat of eternal condemnation to hell-fire, I find it difficult to admit that sensible Christians can believe in such a monstrous doctrin. It carries absurdity on the very face. It would imply that, after all, God's plans ended in disastrous failure, and that an 'all-wise and merciful Providence' must see that the greater part of the creatures of his handiwork were absolutely worthless and fit only for everlasting tribulation. It would also imply that the future world was only a great deal worse than the present, and, if generally indorsed as true, this doctrin would strengthen the position of the Materialists who want to make the best of this existence. On this supposition I can appreciate the wisdom of our jolly folks' song, 'Let us eat, drink, and lose our brains; he that will retain sight or sense shall go straight to hell.' For doubt being, in our mental constitution, the root of knowledge, sensible men will always doubt. Christians, least of all, ought even to be suspected of such a belief, since in their system the whole idea of providence, from the creation of man, is the restoration from the fall. What a pity it must be if, after repeated interferences and plans to keep his men in the right road, and after giving up the son of his bosom as the atoning sacrifice, poor Jehovah had to confess, alike with his insignificant mortal creatures, that all was but vanity and vexation of spirit. In fact, whichever way you look, this theory of eternal damnation is a reductio ad absurdum of the whole Christian scheme, and is altogether suicidal.

"No, my children, it seems to me that this brimstone and fire business is only a missionary dodge to frighten the timid and superstitious into the mission folds. The lay Christians, we are well aware, giv heathens the choice between 'civilization' and buck-shot; and as long as we are weak-kneed enough to retain a clinging to an unworthy life, we hav to put up with the Christian's civilization and its peculiar 'resources,' which famish the body and harden the soul. Thank God, however, that brimstone and hell-fire are not as real objects as buck-shot and gunpowder.

"Let us hope, my friends, that our Christian brethren, as they grow older in the experience of human life, will gain broader conceptions and outliv their superstitions."

This is Terrible!

From the Catholic Union and Times.

We hear much of the conversion of England. There is not the shadow of a hope for such an event until she is smitten into the dust of national humiliation by the mighty hand of God. England must do penance in sackcloth and ashes for those dark centuries of Ireland's bondage and slaughter. She has fattened on the spoils of the poor, and grown drunk upon the blood of martyrs; and she shall not escape the sword of the vengeful angel who will make her eat bread mingled with tears, and scourge her with the lash of scorpions. When the nations of the earth shall see the once proud Babylon thus prostrate in the bitterness of humiliation, and wag their heads in derision as they pass by, then we shall hope for England's conversion to the God of her fathers—not before.

Canadian Notes.

Mr. J. A. Risser lectured in Albert Hall on Sunday last on the "Coming Man's Religion." Mr. Harrison gave a reading on the "Telephone; and Recent Discoveries in Science." A little girl nine years of age played on the piano forte selections from Balfe's opera, the "Bohemian Girl," with variations by Czerny, and in response to an encore, performed "La Chatelaine," by Alphonse Leduc.

Concerning the Rev. T. W. Jeffery, the Toronto Daily News of May 5, 1885, contains the following: "We hav had any amount of vulgar abuse, irrational maundering, and hypocritical denunciation from certain reverend gentlemen lately, but the person whose name heads this article must be credited with an entirely new method of bringing his profession into contempt, and bespattering the cloth which he wears. For years past Toronto has been content with the efforts of the Bond street pastor (Dr. Wild) as ministerial pantaloon. Mr. Jeffery, it seems, is anxious to augment the circus by appearing as clerical clown. He is said to hav succeeded in making his congregation laugh, but it is well known that people who hav assembled ostensibly to worship God titter on the slightest provocation. Besides, the cap and bells, when they surmount a reverend brow, hav often an irresistibly ludicrous effect. Newspaper reports do not inform us whether this buffoon in broadcloth began his discourse with the time-honored saying, 'Here we are again,' or that he performed a handspring on entering the pulpit. Perhaps he thought his wealth of original holy humor would make up for the want of such accessories. Nobody criticises an ordinary clown's jokes, but a reverend clown, from the fact that he is fortunately rather more of a rarity, may be worthy or unworthy enough to be the subject of a passing note or two.

"Ignorance and falsehood. One is often the parent of the other, and let it be hoped it is so in the Rev. Jeffery's case—from the gist of his jokes. Rev. Jeffery said, 'It is all very well for editors to get behind the walls and write about the preachers, but has one editor volunteered his services in the Northwest? (Laughter). Not one.' For the benefit of the Queen street Methodist congregation, not for that of the Rev. Joker Jeffery, it may be stated that the editor of the News long since volunteered his personal services to the government, offering also to organize an irregular troop of cavalry. But the congregation should understand, also, that the word 'editor' is often used in a misleading way.

"An editor is, compared to an ordinary newspaper man, what a bishop is, compared to an ordinary parson, and can just as easily leave his charge. But probably the Rev. Jester Jeffreys has a child-like belief that the editor writes the whole of the paper, from the quack advertisments to the death notices. Now, for the still further information of the Queen street congregation, it may be added that there are no less than eight newspaper men, who correspond to ordinary parsons, at present fighting for their country in the Northwest. But the duties of the chaplain, after all, are not to fight; they are scarcely as dangerous as those of the war correspondent, and we would not like to say, within a dozen or so, how many journalists are at present on the march with our troops. Rev. Jeffery says: 'Half a dozen ministers volunteered to accompany the troops to the Northwest.' If, gentle and consecrated Joker, these men volunteered their services before the government proclamation was issued, you are hereby challenged to name them. Your previous assertions too plainly show your want of knowledge or your lack of veracity to allow any one to accept such a statement on your own unsupported word.

"This mirthful Methodist, after alleging that he would be willing to ride on a broomstick and fire a pop-gun in order to get to the Northwest, says that ministers didn't go to the front because their conference didn't order them. Here is ecclesiastical tyranny with a vengeance! The men's consciences impelled them to go forward, the dread of the conference held them back. Was priest ever in worse bondage to his spiritual superiors? They dared not go. They were not afraid of half-breed cannon, but of Methodist canons. Oh, mighty and enlightened Methodist church, which hast so inculcated the spirit of obedience in thy disciples that they had rather witness a thousand heroes fight for their country a whole month without a word of the gospel spoken to cheer them than break a single rule of their awful disciplin. We don't see much chance of escape from the alternativ of calling Mr. Jeffery untruthful or a fool. But he has solved the difficulty for himself. He remarks, with unmistakable emphasis: 'I will not let every fool in the country hav his say without raising my voice.'"

Did God Send a "Savior" to the Aztecs?

The series of articles on Mexico completed in this number of The Truth Seeker possesses more than ordinary interest for Freethinkers—and should for Christians—as involving Christianity in a still more impenetrable mist of doubt and uncertainty as to its origin. The points made by the writer are: 1. That the veneered paganism now known as Christianity was fully developed in Mexico several thousands of years prior to the supposititious advent of Christ, every rite and ceremony in the Catholic church, from baptism to extreme unction, being practiced by the Mexican priests; also that the principal events in the life of Christ were duplicated in the career of the Mexican God; 2. That the Mexicans were highly civilized centuries and centuries before the Spanish adventurers landed on their shores; and, 3. That it was necessary for the church to destroy the Aztec monuments and evidences of civilization, and murder the people, lest the resemblance between the two forms of religion and the acknowledged antiquity of the Aztecs should destroy Christianity. The writer has pursued his researches into this subject for years, aided by one of the best public libraries in America. His information is derived almost wholly from Catholic sources, both in English and Spanish, and there is not a point made, he assures us, that cannot be incontestably proven by authorities which no one can question.

If this be so, what becomes of Christianity? Did God repeat in several countries the theological scheme with which our priests and ministers hav burdened this country? There is not a shadow of doubt that Constantine's Christianity was but revamped paganism—that Catholicism especially is in all its material essentials patterned after the religion of the Roman empire. Felix Oswald finds, too, the roots of Christianity in the dirt of Buddhistic pessimism. Now again we hav it in another country separated from the East by thousands of miles of sea—and hav it, too, with all its wealth of ritual and elaborate mummery. If all but the Judean savior were frauds, how are we to know it? Every argument for the divinity of Christianity supports with precisely the same pertinence and force its eastern and western prototypes. The science and reason that destroy their pretensions also demolish the claims of Christendom. If, on the other hand, all are divine and God-given, the world might as well put its trust in the ancient gods of Mexico as in the more modern one from Asia.

We invite the Christians to explain how it is that Mexico possessed Christianity before Christ was born.

A Foe of the League.

In most of the states the churches are already granted extraordinary privileges, and are in much closer relation to the government than is consistent with our national constitution. Church edifices are tax free, absurd Sunday laws are upon the statute books, the oath which recognizes the Christian deity is administered in all the courts, Christian fast and holidays are observed by official appointment, the Christian gospels are daily dinned into the ears of the school children, the government remunerates chaplains for their useless services, and the different states are unconstitutionally and unwisely liberal in granting subsidies to sectarian "charities." One would suppose that with all these concessions and favors the church might be content. But that she is not is evidenced by the flourishing existence of the National Reform Association, a society laboring to secure in both state and national constitution "an explicit recognition of the moral laws of the Christian religion as the standard of all legislation." Tacitly this association has the support of all orthodox Christians, and openly of a great portion of the preachers and papers. The headquarters of the plotters are in Pittsburgh, where on April 21st and 22d they held their annual meeting. The titles of the speeches delivered there outline the work of the organization. The opening address was a defense of the Bible in the public schools, the speaker holding that, the actual character of the nation being Christian, its use is justified. Another speaker took for his subject, "The Rights of Christian Citizens;" another, "The State and the Sabbath." One reverend's discourse bore the title of "The United States Mail Service and Sabbath," in which it was argued that the whole mail service should be discontinued on the "Lord's day." This preacher lamented that this form of Sabbath desecration was alarmingly increasing, facts and figures showing that the number of towns in which the mail is delivered and the post-office kept open is increasing every year, and that the post-office is increasingly resorted to even by Christian people. Some hundreds of thousands of officials and employees, the discourse recited, are compelled by the regulations of the postal service to labor on Sunday. Another minister set forth what he considered to be "The Duty of the State to Christ." The "Christian Amendment to the National Constitution," was the subject of another address. The "National Divorce Reform League" was represented at the meeting, and the constitution of the association so amended as to recognize and aid it in its efforts to repeal divorce laws. Prohibition was also made part of the work of the association, as was the abolition of "other kindred evils."

"The existence of this association," said one of the speakers, "is one of the noteworthy signs of the times." We think so, too; but it is noteworthy principally for the openly arrogant claims it puts forth, and as a forewarning of what we might expect should the church obtain that power in legislation she is seeking. The narrow margin by which Edmunds's Christian amendment to the United States Constitution was defeated should make patriots careful, for that amendment was prompted, and urged upon the Senate, by this very association. Say what they may, the people now indifferent to the machinations of the church are foolish. The Freedom of Worship bill about which so much has been said this winter was a good test of the power of the church. Catholicism passed the bill through the state senate, Protestanism defeated it in the assembly. In the first instance the Jesuits showed what they could do with the city Catholic vote at their backs; in the second, the Evangelical Alliance displayed the power it possesses through being sustained by the country Protestant vote.

The only force in the country directly and organically opposed to the National Reform Association is the National Liberal League. The Nine Demands are the affirmations of political Freethought, as the constitution of the Reform Association is the political affirmation of Christianity in this country. The one is for practical as well as theoretical religious freedom; the other the expression of organized religious tyranny. It is not too harsh to say that every supporter of the Reform Association is a traitor to the country, for the Constitution of the United States, from beginning to end, in spirit and in letter, is framed in accordance with the principle of the total and complete separation of church and state. The Reform Association is not only an open enemy of this Constitution, frankly avowing the desire to substitute for it an organic law which shall recognize Christianity, but is traitorous inasmuch as it seeks to make that document null and void so far as religion is concerned. Every practical connection of the several state governments with the church is in contravention of the national charter, violating its spirit and letter, and antagonistic to the unwritten law which dedicates this country to the natural rights of man in matters of religion as well as of politics.

We think that in view of the openly exercised influence of the church upon our legislatures, it would be well for the National Liberal League to turn its attention a little more to politics. This Reform Association maintains four district secretaries in the field, lecturing and organizing societies to work for their avowed objects, and if the League lecturers could make a point of following them occasionally setting the people right upon their duties to the government (in reality themselvs), and expounding the principles and making plain the motivs which influenced the men who drafted our Constitution, a great deal of practical good might be accomplished. We are glad to see that Judge Krekel has announced his determination to deliver in his city a course of such lectures, and we hope his example will be followed by all the lecturers in the field. Especially is it the duty of the League lecturers to do this, as the organization is nothing if not political. As soon as the League can bear the expense, pamphlets by able jurists (and there are several in the League) upon all the Nine Demands should be prepared and circulated extensivly, thus counteracting the efforts of the secretaries of the National Reform Association. The petition to stop all Sunday trains, recently sent by the Presbyterians to Washington; the persistent efforts of the church everywhere to close all places of decent amusement on Sundays; the constant lobbying and log-rolling of religious bodies for grants of money from the states, are all part of the program to make this a "Christian" nation, and should be met and thwarted at every turn by the true friends of religious reform—the Freethinkers. It will be well for the League directors to bear this in mind, and act upon the suggestion. Our Christian opponents need the closest kind of watching.

Changes in the Unchangeable.

"For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book. He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly; Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii, 18-20.

The revised version of the Old Testament has been made public in England, and a semi-official article prepared explaining the changes made. The revision involves, the revisers explain, "no changes of the Hebrew text—no older manuscripts than the Masoretic having been discovered—and the idiom of the authorized versions is most carefully preserved, out of regard for the conservativ feeling of the church in its attachment for the language of the old version." Whether this is the case or not, those familiar with the Bible will hav to judge for themselvs. For it is not for Hebrew scholars alone that the Old Testament is supposed to be written. A word, even in our mother-English, cannot and does not convey the same shade of meaning to everybody, and the words substituted in the new version as given in the incomplete list telegraphed to this country will not convey the ideas now received from the King James translation. Who that sees the poetical passages of Psalms in poetical form will recognize them as the same rugged rhapsodies and lamentations he is used to? "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," has been changed to, "For thou hast made him a little lower than God." Surely there is an important change in that, unless God and the angels are one, and the words synonymous, which supposition would involve extensiv alteration in the text of both the Old and New Testaments. The revisers hav proved unable to reconcile the two accounts of creation in Genesis with the latest words of science, but a lame attempt is made by putting some "good whiles" between the days: "And there was evening and there was morning one day;" "there was evening and there was morning a second day," a third day, and so on. Instead of there being "giants in the earth in those days," we are now told "the nephelim were in the earth in those days." Job's desire that "mine adversary had written a book" is now the wish "that I had the indictment which my adversary hath written." A glance at the following more important "corrections and amendments" of the Testament will disclose that, including the changes mentioned, the Christian world has heretofore been blindly misled as to the meaning of certain minor but not altogether unimportant particulars:

"Tabernacle of the Congregation" has been everywhere changed to "Tent of Meeting." In regard to the word "Jehovah" the usage of the authorized version is followed, the revisers not thinking it advisable to insert it uniformly in place of "Lord" or "God," which, when printed in small capitals, represent the words substituted by Jewish custom for the ineffable name. Of technical terms from the Hebrew, one in three seems to hav been generally introduced. The word "grove" (Judges vi, 28) has been replaced by "ashera," with its plurals, "asherim" and "asheroth." In the poetical books "sheol" replaces "hell," which has been changed in prose passages to "the grave" and "the pit," with "sheol" in the margin. "Of these renderings, 'hell,'" says the preface, "if it could be taken in its original sense as used in the creeds, would be a fairly adequate equivalent for the Hebrew word, but it is so commonly understood as the place of torment that to employ it frequently would lead to inevitable misunderstanding." In Isaiah xiv, where "hell" is used in more of its original sense, the revisers hav left "hell" in the text, putting "sheol" in the margin. "Abaddon," which has hitherto been known to English readers of the Bible only from the New Testament (Revelation ix, 11), has been introduced in three passages—once in Job, and twice in Proverbs. The term "meat offering" has been changed into "meal offering," the former term having ceased to be the generic name for all food. A new plural—peoples—has been introduced, although sometimes this becomes "Gentiles" when the contrast to the Chosen People is marked. All headings o chapters hav been dropped, as in the revised New Testament, and the text has been divided into paragraphs, but the old chapter and verse divisions hav been retained in the margin for convenience of reference. By this means the revisers hav been enabled to rejoin Psalm x to Psalm ix, and Psalm xiii to Psalm xii, and to begin Isaiah liii at chapter lii, verse 13. The several days of the creation are made more prominent by breaks of a line between the verses. This expedient has enabled the revisers to make use of the dialog form and to show the dramatic character of the Song of Songs, the first chapter of which, for example, is divided into seven speeches. The Psalms are definitly divided into five books, the last four beginning respectivly at Psalms xlii, lxiii, xc, and cvii. A striking improvement is the printing of all poetical passages in poetical form. This has been done in the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and the Canticles, but the Prophets hav been left in prose, however passionate their oratory. The songs of Lamech, Jacob, Miriam, Moses, Deborah, and Hannah; the Psalms of Jonah and Habakkuk, and David's Lament (in Second Samuel, i) appear in versified ballad. The origin of Joshua's miracle, "Sun, st nd thou still upon Gideon," is indicated by its verse character; so, also, is the triumphal cry of Samson (Judges xv, 16).

The high priest no longer casts lots for the scapegoat; he does so for Azazel. The summary of each day's work at the creation now runs according to the formula:

"And there was evening and there was morning one day;" "there was evening and there was morning a second day;" a third day, and so on, giving a suggestion of successiv stages with long intervals.

The "apples of gold" of Proverbs xxv, 11, are now incased in "figured work" of silver, not in "pictures."

"Vanity and vexation of spirit," Ecclesiastes ii, 17, has become "vanity and a striving after wind."

"Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them," Psalms cxxvii, 5, has been changed into "Happy is the man that hath filled his quiver with them."

Reuben's curse, Gen. xlix, 4, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel," now reads, "Unstable as water, hav not thou the excellency."

The following changes also grate against associations: The authorized Genesis, vi, 4: "There were giants in the earth in those days," is revised: "The nephelim were in the earth in those days."

In the authorized edition, Job xxxi, 35: "Oh, that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is that the almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book," is revised: "Oh, that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is that the almighty would answer me, and that I had the indictment which my adversary hath written."

The authorized Psalm viii, 5: "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," is revised: "For thou hast made him a little lower than God."

The authorized Psalm cxvi, 11: "I said in my haste all men are liars," is revised: "I said when I made haste to escape all men are a lie."

Ecclesiastes xii, 13: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God," etc., has been revised to read: "This is the end of the matter; all has been heard. Fear God," etc.

Proverbs xiv, 9: "Fools make a mock at sin, but among the righteous there is favor," revised reads: "The foolish scorn the guilt offering, but among the upright there is good will."

The above are nearly all of the passages in which a shock is given to old associations. In other passages there are found variations which cannot be called rash alterations. For instance, in Isaiah lii, 13, in the authorized version, reads: "Behold, my servant shall deal prudently; he shall be exalted and extolled and be very high." The revised reads: "Behold, my servant shall deal wisely; he shall be lifted up and shall be very high."

Isaiah, liii, 3, in the authorized version is: "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and we hid, as it were, our faces from him; he was despised and we esteemed him not." In the revised this reads: "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their faces; he was despised, and we esteemed him not."

The same chapter, verse 7, is changed to read: "He was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; as a lanb that he led to the slaughter," etc.

Same chapter, verse 8: "He was taken from prison and from judgment, and who shall declare his generation," is revised to read: "By oppression and judgment he was taken away; and who considereth his generation."

The Christology of the Old Testament is almost entirely unaffected by the revision. The crucial passage, Isaiah vii, 14, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son," remains unchanged, except that the margin suggests, "The virgin is with child and beareth.'"

In the fifth commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," becomes: "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

The following are examples in which the actual task of revision is distinctly seen:

Authorized version—Genesis xxii, 14: "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." Revised version—"In the mount of the Lord it shall be provided."

Authorized version—Exodus xix, 20: "And it was a cloud and a darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these." Revised—"And there was the cloud and the darkness, yet gave it light by night."

Authorized—Job xxviii, 4: "The flood that breaketh out from the inhabitants; even the waters forgotten of the foot they are dried up, they are gone away from men." Revised—"He breaketh open a shaft; away from where men sojourn they are forgotten of the foot that passeth by, they hang afar from men, they swing to and from."

Authorized—Job xxxi, 35: "Behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me." Revised—"Lo, here is my sign above, let the almighty answer me."

Authorized—Job xxxvi, 18: "Beware lest he take thee away from his stroke." Revised—"Beware lest thou be led away with thy sufficiency."

The most striking part of the revision is, of course, the intimation that long periods elapsed between the successiv stages of creation. It is a concession to evolution forced from unwilling ecclesiastics by the recently acquired knowledge of the age. The attempt, however, is likely to bring no peace to the church, for the orthodox Christians will not accept it, and the scientific men and the Infidels will laugh at the spectacle of a body of churchmen trying to catch up with the times by such an oft-exploded expedient. The very fact of the revision is an open confession that the Bible is the work of fallible men, full of errors, and needing correction. Now that both the New and Old Testaments hav been changed, what becomes of the doctrin of plenary inspiration? Into what corner of what church has it gone? And who insures the accuracy of the Bible as now left? The American revision committee recommended many more changes than were made in the New Testament; we are told now that many phrases are left intact that might hav been changed had the revisers not been constrained by the "sacred" feeling in which the old literary form is held by the people who pay these gentlemen for their erudite services. But with how much respect can a revision influenced by such fear of "sacred" feelings be regarded? And, too, the old unanswered questions are bound to be asked again and again, If God wrote the Bible, why did he not write it right? Or if he inspired its writing, why did he not guide aright the pens of his amanuenses, or else inspire the readers so they would know what he meant? This may be the "coarse criticism of the Paine school," as the milk-and-water critics say, but these questions are those that come naturally to the lips of doubt, and must be answered if the church is to be longer regarded as a believer in her own dogmas. Every revision widens the breach between the inquirer and Christianity and renders faith in the gospels less and less possible. The dogmatic attitude of Catholicism is the only logical one to assume. Truth is truth; and if the church had the truth eighteen hundred years ago, what was then truth must be truth now. A change in attitude admits error; a revision is a confession that mistake has been made. Every change in the Bible is a humanizing of the book, bringing it nearer to men and familiarizing them with the manner of its production. The world has no reverence for familiar things; they must come from the dusty past and be unexplainable to inspire awe and reverence in the minds of the common people. As Denslow says, a cause, to admit of perpetual advocacy, must be one that cannot be subjected to the analysis of experiment; it must relate to that which is both unknown and unknowable. This revision, so far as it makes the Bible better known, so far as it reduces the unknowableness of it, destroys the reverence for it and shortens the period in which it will find advocacy and allegiance. The good of this last Protestant struggle with early mistakes will be exactly the reverse of what was intended. Orthodox Christians can but regret the remodeling of their idol; Freethinkers will rejoice that it shows to the world of what common stuff are holy things. It is admitted by all impartial men that the revision of the New Testament bred a critical spirit among those who previously had nought but reverence for the book. The gospels were put upon the level of profane history, and searched and weighed and criticised as human productions and not as the utterances of divinity. This criticism led to skepticism in thousands upon thousands of cases, and Infidelity flourished apace. The Protestants seem to hav forgotten this, for which we rejoice, for the discussion that must follow the production of this new Old Testament will familiarize many more people with the text-book of the church, and destroy, for them at least, all sacred feeling for it. Only in the starless night of faith is the Christian safe.

The Slanderer of Liberal, Mo.

One or two of our friends refer in this week's issue to the recent abuse by Clark Braden of the people of Liberal, Mo. Incidentally Braden refers to Mr. Bennett in these words:

"Before the war there was a little knot of Infidels in the town of Paris, in Eastern Illinois. Their leader was the notorious D. M. Bennett, a renegade preacher, who had been kicked out of the church for misconduct. Bennett started an Infidel sheet, which he afterward moved to New York City, where it became notorious as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Bennett became infamous for spending nineteen months in the penitentiary for circulating obscene literature."

Braden also refers to Mr. Walser as one of Mr. Bennett's associates at Paris. To show just how much the fellow knows about the history of Mr. Bennett, we will say: 1. Mr. Bennett did not liv in Paris, Ill., before the war; 2. Mr. Bennett was never a preacher; 3. He never was kicked out of the church; 4. His sentence was thirteen months. We do not think Mr. Walser and Mr. Bennett were acquainted in Paris. Every Liberal in the country knows why Mr. Bennett was imprisoned, and how infamously false was the charge, and there is no occasion to defend his fame against the assaults of such a mongrel cur as Clark Braden, who has slandered nearly every prominent Freethinker in the country. Mr. Underwood once thought it necessary to print a pamphlet describing "The Kind of Man Clark Braden Is," but Col. Ingersoll declined to befoul his boot by kicking him. Braden's notoriety has recently been helped by his arrest in Missouri for swindling a man in Nebraska out of several hundred dollars.

Mr. Walser has had him arrested now for criminal libel and the trial was set down for May 18th, at Lamar, Mo. The papers publishing the libel will also be prosecuted. In the next TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Walser will present the statements of the treasurer of Barton county, of the circuit clerk, of the sheriff and deputy sheriff, of the recorder of deeds, and of some Christians, that Braden's story is a lie manufactured from whole cloth. This ought to be satisfactory to even the most prejudiced Christian, and if the people of Liberal can also get Braden sent to the penitentiary for a few years they will hav done a good service to the country.

A Statesman and His Virtue are Soon Parted.

While the labor leaders are urging the workingmen to unite and right their wrongs by means of the legislature at Albany, a notice has been posted in the depot at Frankfort which cannot but hav a discouraging effect upon such efforts. The notice reads:

"To conductors: Annual pass No 130, in favor of the Hon. Lewis B. Sherman is lost. If presented for passage, take up, collect full fare, and return to this office."

The Hon. Lewis B. Sherman is the Democratic Workingmen's Anti-Monopoly Assemblyman from the second Oneida district. It looks as though the first step necessary to insure reform through legislation is to relight Diogenes's lantern and continue his search.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. C. FANNIE ALLYN has been lecturing lately in Springfield, Mass., to good audiences. Her address is Stoneham, Mass.

E. C. WALKER lectures at Friend, Neb., May 16th, 17th, and 18th. Going thence to Omaha, he will proceed from that point through Northern Nebraska, Dakota, Iowa, and Minnesota. For lectures, etc., address him at Valley Falls, Kan., until June 10th; later than that at Sioux City, Ia.

THE president of the Ingersoll Secular Society, G. N. Hill, Esq., will be one of the speakers at the festival of the Free Religious Association, in the Meionaon, Boston, Friday evening, May 29th. There will be discussions of the possibility of scientific religion that forenoon, and Socialism that afternoon in Parker Memorial Hall.

TUESDAY evening, May 5th, a reception was tendered Mrs. Amelia H. Colby by Mesdames Smith and Randolph, at their home for "Light and Color Cure," 729 Tremont street, Boston, as a farewell greeting from her many friends ere her departure for the West. Mrs. Colby's lectures in Boston hav been highly successful, as they deserve to be everywhere.

EVERYBODY is cordially invited to attend the annual picnic and Sunday assembly of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association at Cassadaga Camp grounds, Chautauqua county, N. Y., June 6th and 7th. Mrs. Elizabeth L. Watson, of California, will be the speaker. Damon's band will furnish the music for the two days. There will be dancing on the Saturday evening, the 6th. For further information address T. J. Skidmore, president, or Ida M. Lang, secretary, Fredonia, N. Y.

Letters from Friends.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., May 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your illustration of a "Modern Balaam," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d, contained volumes, and speaks plainer than words; in fact, it is the best illustration of priestly tyranny I hav ever seen. Now, I would like to make a suggestion. Why not strike off several thousands of that cut by itself, suitable for posting or framing, at a nominal cost, and scatter them broadcast? Such a move would be the means of opening the eyes of a certain class which it is impossible to reach in any other way, for people who will not spend time to read a book or paper will invariably pause to look at a picture or engraving.

I will agree to take one hundred or more of them, to begin with, provided you conclude to do as herein suggested. I will also see that they are put where they will do the most good. Please giv this matter consideration, and to those who are subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would say send in your order at once, and by so doing give the publisher an idea of the number wanted.

I inclose an article from the Boston Globe of to-day, purporting to be a statement in regard to the town of Liberal, Mo., by the notorious Clark Braden, minister of the gospel and alleged forger of notes, which rather reflects on the place and its inhabitants. Can you throw any light on the subject? Seems as though something ought to be done to counteract such a damnable lie.

Being an outspoken Infidel myself, I feel rather hard to read such a torrent of abuse as this ass Braden has seen fit to pour out on the heads of the people of Liberal.

Yours, for truth and justice, A L. FRISBIE.

DETROIT, MICH , May 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I wish you could hav been with me on Sunday last. I took that "Modern Balaam" with me, and called on a friend who is the one lost sheep in a French Catholic family. I showed him the paper, and he called his father, and sisters, and mother, and a lot of visitors around him, and then gave them an explanation in French, and there was fun alive for awhile. "There you are," said he, "and there is your boss with his club," and then he pointed to the patches. I wish you would get the picture up in good shape in a chro mo, and then I want one to hang up in a frame where everybody can see it, and I think I could get places for five or six at least. They will just be a grand thing. Get them up nice and every real Freethinker will want one as a challenge to bigotry and superstition. It is the very best thing I hav seen

Yours truly, J. H. WOOD.

PALATKA, FLA., April 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 18th, and balance of stamps in issue of May 2d. You hav never issued a positivly inferior number of the great Liberal periodical, but May 2d, according to my way of thinking, is the best one you ever printed. I first thought of marking the worthy articles and items therein, preparatory to sending it to a friend, but soon found that I would hav to make an index at every heading, and so covered every page with a single ☞. Any man who can put, by selection or otherwise, a like amount of instructiv, newsy, and readable matter in each of the fifty-two numbers of any periodical in one year, would be peerless in the arena of journalism.

LEWIS MORRIS.

BOSTON, MASS., April 30, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I am unable to understand how Brother Chapel can find fault with my short way of figuring up our glorious Freethought calendar, but here is another and a longer way that may suit him better. I made the first year to begin on Jan. 1, "A.D." 1600, and, as is mathematically necessary at the beginning of all first years, I write the figure 0 for that day, the new era having but just commenced and having no time as yet to its credit. The following Jan. 1st (1601) I write the figure 1, and so on down to the very last January, when I write 285, as is mathematically correct for me to do.

The result is the same as by the shorter method of deducting 1600 from 1885, but possibly may seem clearer to some friends.

A calendar is simply a register of the age at last birthday, of the era it stands for. GEORGE N. HILL.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., April 20, 1885.

MR EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents for your ALMANAC. In this locality we hav intelligent people, a great many Freethought and free speech, men and women both. I hav heard Liberal League spoken of, but nothing has been done to speak of. Why can't San Diego hav the pleasure of hearing and seeing that noble man, Colonel Ingersoll? What hav we done that he will not come in our midst? We believe he would make it financially, and our people are hospitable and generous, and finer climate and place to sojourn for a time is very hard to find. I believe he could be induced to make his home in view of our beautiful bay, ocean, and environments. You hav many other speakers that we should also be glad to hear.

A. N. BURGESS.

BANGOR, ME., April 27, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The ANNUAL for 1885 reached me in due time. I am more than satisfied with it. Every lover of freedom and reform should hav a copy. I could wish it were in every household in the land. The reading matter is instructiv, and the articles are well written. To me, however, its chief attraction lies in the fraternal spirit it awakens, the companionship it inspires with the noble men and women whose portraits adorn its pages. One almost feels in looking upon these faces, many of them bearing well-known names, that he is receiving a personal introduction. How isolated soever his locality, and how much soever the community in which he livs may be permeated by the old superstitions, and hedged in by priestly power, it is a gratifying reflection that in the great warfare against the most gigantic system of wrong the world has ever seen he is not alone.

Send me four copies for distribution. Reform in these days can, I think, be best promoted by the dissemination of books and papers, and everyone interested should lend a hand to the extent of his ability. People that now for various reasons refuse to commit themselvs will quietly read and think, and in due time, when the pressure of bigotry and intolerance begins to giv way, the humor and innuendo so freely indulged in in relation to some of the fundamental doctrins of the church, and which everywhere indicate the prevailing skepticism among the common people, as well as those in higher life, even in orthodox circles and under orthodox influences, will ripen into bold and earnest arraignment. N. L. PERKINS.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., May 3, 285.

"WASHINGTON, D. C.—Whereas, It has pleased God to afflict, almost unto the door of death, that great and exemplary man, the successful leader of the Union hosts," etc., etc.—Union Soldiers' Alliance.

MR. EDITOR: If this is not blasphemy in every sense of the term, then no such thing as blasphemy has ever existed. Would it not be in order with good Christian propriety to bring charges of blasphemy against this Union Soldiers' Alliance for accusing our "God" of such inhuman barbarity. Afflicted almost unto death's door—what for? And one of the followers of the Right Rev. Mr. Newman, and possibly one of the elect! They even accuse God of being pleased while engaged in that most damnable outrage upon General Grant. And for no cause whatever, except, possibly, for leading successfully the Union hosts. Surely if God is responsible for this fiendish outrage the courts should be open to giv his accusers a chance to prove it. If this case of blasphemy gets into the courts, I suggest that Robert G. Ingersoll be employed as counsel for Grant. Robert has always spoken well of the gods, and I know that he would do his level best for our God.

Yours, NELSON HUNT.

PEM, IND., May 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: A gentleman by the name of Reynolds—Professor Reynolds—has been giving entertainments here for the past week on mesmerism or animal magnetism, and has created quite an excitement. There are not so many believers in Spiritualism as there were prior to his landing here. I think his entertainments a great benefit in enlightening the people You would be surprised to learn the number of people who are ignorant in regard to animal magnetism and its power—who were ready to attribute such phenomena to the supernatural.

Professor Reynolds demonstrated the fact that such power was derived from the natural only, and any person possessing a certain amount of animal magnetism could control the minds of others.

I am in receipt of the last ANNUAL you sent me, and I must say I hav not words to express my gratitude for the estimation and value of such a book. Several years hav I been reading from the pens of the illustrious authors whose grand intellectual physiognomies adorn the pages of the ANNUAL, but never having the good fortune to meet with one of them, I find my ideal conception of my brother-Freethinkers greatly inferior to the noble portraits presented in the ANNUAL. I take great pleasure in looking at the pictures every day, and showing them to others, explaining to them the great object of those indefatigable workers. Since receiving the ANNUAL and looking at those portraits so often, I feel as though I were intimately acquainted, and long to grasp their hand and giv a hearty shake. The ANNUAL cannot be prized too highly, as it will be the means of bringing Freethinkers closer together more intimately related, as every Liberal in the land can hav the ineffable pleasure of seeing the great leaders who are trying to blot out superstition and supersede it with the grand religion of science and humanity.

Friend Macdonald, I will send you the Indianapolis Journal, which contains a couple of articles, one from the pen of the editor on "The Mormon Deliverance," and one from Rev. Clark Braden—or the proper name to designate him would be "the Boss Liar," or "Jo Cook No. 2." If any person wants to make me hot, let them slander that noble, generous-hearted D. M. Bennett. Oh, how I wish I was an Ingersoll or a Watts! I would go down there and drive that ground-hog in his hole and make him take his hole in after him. State your opinion in regard to the veracity of the article by Braden, and what you think of the Christian editor who believes the Bible to be God's word and denounces the Mormons for practicing its teachings. Let us hear from you in THE TRUTH SEEKER. As I am in Indianapolis every day or so, I would like to show to the editor of the Journal an article from your pen relating to those subjects. W. A. HATHAWAY.

TRAPPE, PA., April 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, due you for that best of all papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Papa has returned from the West, having closed up affairs there for the present. Times are hard, and the needful is scarce with us, but calling together a council, consisting of the members of our own family, we unanimously came to the conclusion that THE TRUTH SEEKER was indispensable, and we must hav it; for what would the children do without the Corner—papa without those discourses on Freethought subjects? And as for myself, a sorry plight I would be in had I no TRUTH SEEKERS to accidentally lay upon the table when the clergymen call to turn me from my ways; and call they do.

Why, only a short time ago, one talked to me for nearly two hours and a half on the sin I was committing in not coming to the Bible God; and when he paused to take breath once or twice, I very demurely offered a few of my thoughts and opinions on the Bible God, using as a reference Remsburg's "Bible Morals," and we all know that facts are found there. He, however, commenced talking on something else, telling me that blind obedience was better than none at all; that I should join the church, do the will of God, and afterwards reason.

I told him I preferred to go on investigating yet a while, whereupon he shook his head very solemnly and mournfully and prepared to go, not, however, without charging me that whenever I came to a knotty question to bring it to him, and he would endeavor to enlighten me. Now, I thank the man for his kindly interest, but endeavor to answer such knotty questions is all he can do. No satisfactory answers are ever given.

Hoping you will excuse my delay, and thanking you for your leniency, CLARENE RHOADES.

RACINE, WIS., May 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription is about to expire, and I wish to renew, for I cannot think of doing without the paper, which I hav had from the first number. And I wish to do a little, if possible, to extend its circulation and usefulness. I shall therefore take advantage of one of your advertised terms, to wit: "One subscription with four new subscribers in one remittance, $10." I trust that if the cash is sent in one remittance the names and addresses of subscribers may be sent subsequently as they are obtained.

I hav room here to say that I hav the honor to be a life member of the National Liberal League, and am in hearty sympathy with its objects and its course in the past, and like the name; but if I am able to attend its next Congress I shall cheerfully vote to change its title to "The American Secular Union," thus fraternizing with and including our brethren of Canada and all the British provinces, and making it a continental instead of a national institution.

ALMOND OWEN.

BAKERSFIELD, CAL., April 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: After reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, I send it on its rounds, and I hav found quite a number that are willing to read it. Others, too prejudiced to read it, only assert that it contains nothing but lies. There is quite a Liberal idea about Bakersfield, if we only had some stirring lecturer here to giv it a start or set it afloat. For the past six months there hav been several church sociables and concerts, or something of the kind. The lady members are selling tickets of admission for their grand raffling-off of some of their scarfs, and the proceeds to go to the church, which reminds me of an occurrence at San Luis Obispo, in this state. The Methodist minister there was transferred to a place further south, and previous to his going the members got up a sociable for his benefit, and as the proceeds were small some of the young people said if the members would giv the use of the hall they would turn it into a ball and giv the proceeds to the minister, and some of the members saw the minister and asked him if he had any scruples as to how they raised the money. His reply was, "No; any way to get the money—any way to get the money." ISAAC GAMBEL.

LEXINGTON, KY., April 26, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Recently, in the Ironclad Age, Dr. Monroe published an exceedingly interesting editorial advocating the death of that artful old serpent of wickedness, Satan. All who hav the cause of Christ at heart will, I know, concur in the doctor's views, and none more so than the good ministers and myself. The "old boy" has always been a disturbing element in the godly plan of salvation, and as long as he's allowed to run at large and tempt us poor weak mortals, just that long are we prone to do evil and to commit all manner of sin. This is no idle question, but a practicable one—one that should receive respectful consideration at the hands of the pulpit preachers and all others who place explicit faith in the atoning blood of the "crucified Lamb." Christ can never carry out successfully his "father's" will as long as Satan has a free pass from the same father to go to and fro in the earth counteracting the elevating influence of the "spirit" (not a Spiritualist's spirit, but the "holy spirit") with his wicked whisperings. It's just as Dr. Monroe says, if we wish to remove sin from the world, we must first destroy the author of sin, and the rest will come easy.

But the questions arise, How can it best be done, and in what manner? And who will undertake the job? Even the good doctor, with all his qualifications as a literary genius, and his fidelity to truth and humanity, not to mention his acquaintance with the God family, and his vast knowledge of the "divine plan," is powerless, as it were. What we need is the assistance of preachers. What we want of them is to petition the "savior" in behalf of us poor heathens to adopt radical measures for the final removal of the enemy of souls. And inasmuch as the savior is a member of the all-powerful "trinity," it could easily be done, and the hard, overworked moral guides would hav no more opposition, and, what is infinitly better, they would be enabled to rest from their labors in the "vinyard." It would practically settle the whole issue, and everlastingly end the unequal war, and mammon and all wicked flesh would be overthrown, and righteousness reign supreme.

I am so interested in the wondrous beauties of the Christian religion that God's lieutenants and Dr. Monroe, if they need help in the work of curtailing the power of his Satanic nibs, they can count upon me to render all the assistance I possibly can.

Right here a somewhat delicate question presents itself. What if the watchers of Zion don't want the evil one to "go dead?" Suppose they are in partnership with his nibs in the soul redemption business? What then? And suppose the "pards" will "divide up" in that "great day" when the Lord of lords comes in the white cloud to judge the wicked flesh? Oh, won't there be groaning and grinding of teeth? What will become of us poor Liberals? Doubtless we will be cast into the bottomless pit so kindly prepared for our reception by our heavenly father, there to roast and broil throughout all eternity. Perish, horrible thought! Think of our awful fate, all ye who aspire to Infidel honors, and seek safety in the protecting shadow of the "cross" if ye would liv and escape eternal death. Seeing, then, that God will dispense impartial justice and injustice to the righteous and wicked alike, I hav to, in such an emergency, console myself by singing;

"What will befall us below,
Is something I do not know;
Or what dangers are waiting—
What troubles are brewing
In the hot country called hell,
Only the devil and priest can tell."

PAOLO, IA., April 29, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the books all right. I am well pleased with them. I wish that every family had that kind of reading; it would open their mental eyes and show them where they stand. I feel well fortified now to meet any one that attacks me on any of their creeds and dogmas. This is a priest-ridden people, and it is hard to do anything with them. They will not read any books that will teach them better; they do not want to learn that they hav been deceived all their lives. But I think it is better to do it late in life than never. I was almost sixty years old before I had my eyes opened. But if I had been where I could hav had the books and papers that I hav now I should now be far ahead of where I am. I am well pleased that the cause is doing so well. I hope our great champions will be kept busy in the field, and those that hav money to spare will shell it out to keep the ball a-rolling. I will now close this by wishing you all well. I remain, as ever,

Yours, in the cause of truth, J. STRATFORD.

ONTONAGON, MICH., April 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your splendidly godless paper comes to hand regularly. But although it is godless, it is not without its share of other spooks. Can you, Mr. Editor, tell me what Dr. Cheseborough means in his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 21st? Do you know if he meant it for a ghost story for children? If so, I would humbly suggest that it should be published in the Children's department, unless Miss Wixon would object to such trash to corrupt the minds of her young pupils. How does the doctor know that there was a "stupendous battle raging in the spirit world for many years?" It is the old story of God and Lucifer fighting. The diakka is a good substitute for the devil. It is very convenient to hav a few of the diakkas on hand to lay the blame on them for everything that goes crooked. Why not stick to the devil of our forefathers, doctor? If we must hav a devil, I, for one, would prefer to stick to the old one, than to hav a Tiger-faced Jim and all the other diakkas in his place.

Yours truly, DON D. MCLEOD.

ANAHEIM, CAL, March 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am much encouraged about the position of our League at Santa Ana, California. We hav quite a library of Liberal literature, with a promis of more books from friends of the cause. If the League changes its name, as proposed, to the American Secular Union, and gets the big tent to use in the East summers, and come here to winter, there is no doubt but a rich harvest could be reaped of dollars, besides convincing the wavering of the worse than useless expenditure of money and time in upholding the worn-out myths of Christianity.

When such eloquent speakers as Putnam, Remsburg, Ingersoll, Watts, Reynolds, Jamieson, and others can hold forth the light of reason to the minds of the masses without being arrested for blasphemy, it shows that human minds are growing, and that in time the laws of our land will hav to conform to the advancement. May the good work go on; and as this climate is so well adapted to tent and grove meetings, I hope to see our brave brothers in this section. The harvest is ripe.

MRS. KATE PARKER.

ROCHELLE, ILL., May 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to say a few words in behalf of Professor Bell, who has just completed a course of three lectures here. I think it is a pity that a worker so efficient, so enthusiastic, scholarly, genial, and good a speaker and companion, should be out of a "job" at any time. There are not in any town in the country a half-dozen Liberals who could invest the few dollars a course of two or three lectures would cost them to better advantage, and who would be better compensated on any other investment than this. Every lecture of this kind attracts at least a few of our pious friends, and every "sermon" of the professor they listen to broadens their heart, mellows their prejudice, awakens their intellect, and in like degree makes them fraternal and tolerant toward us. As it is, they are ignorant of the many claims and unanswerable arguments we can advance in the establishment of our belief, and they go home from the lecture meditating and perplexed over the many new thoughts and startling truths revealed to them, and which often may become the germ destined to evolve them from the darkness and misery of superstition to a glorious state of enlightenment, Freethought, and reason. Therefore all Liberal lectures as an investment—if for no other purpose—decidedly pay. Fraternally,

MR. EDITOR: Your postal card notice of my time expiring as a trial subscriber was duly received. I inclose you $4, for which you wil please giv me THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months, and you will also send me two "Story Hours," one TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and one "Bible Morals." The half-dozen "Bible Morals" I got of you are all nicely disposed of, and I think they are doing much good. I make my subscription to your great and good paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, believing it to be the best. Its pages are full of food for the inquiring mind. I spend many happy hours in reading it. Keep on in the good work and your name will be handed down to posterity as one having done a great and good work. Oh, if every one would only stop for one moment and exercise that grand gift which nature has given some of us—reason—what a change there would be! But no; they go to church Sunday after Sunday, and swallow down without tasting whatever the minister says, just as a young robin with closed eyes and ears gobbles the worm down, and say, "What a grand sermon we had to-day!"

ADRIAN, MICH., May 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The saints hav been having a lively time here lately, as you will see by the slips I send you from the daily Times of this city. For the past two months or more a small squad of the Salvation Army has been here making the nights hideous with their howlings and raving. There has been here at the same time a company of equally fanatical Free Methodists; you may well believe that between them both we [illegible] wild music. The city authorities hav now forbid them to parade the streets, as it had become an intolerable nuisance. If the authorities had waited but an hour or two longer they would hav had the godly sinner behind the prison bars for bigamy

I heartily indorse all your correspondent Councilman says about Colonel Kelso's "Bible Analyzed," as too much cannot be said in praise of that great work. The more I read it the more strongly am I impressed with its great power. I hav never yet seen anything to equal it. It is hard indeed to select any particular chapter as the best where there is so much that is good, but, for a blind, fanatical God-worshiper, I think the chapter on the God of the Bible is the most powerful of all. I hope every Liberal in the United States and Canada will buy a copy, and persuade his Christian neighbors to read it. If a fair-minded, intelligent Christian has read it carefully, he is of no more good to the church. I hav persuaded three Bible believers to read it, and it has fixed them all. They hav lost all faith in the Bible as the infallible word of God. Please send me Brother Babcock's last little book.

Yours fraternally, P. B. REASONER.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS, May 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed some clippings taken from one of our daily papers, with accompanying comments, which will serve to show you the state of the spiritual thermometer in this important city of the Southwest.

An ecclesiastical sky-scraper, a veritable meteor, a wandering star of the first magnitude, has been here for quite awhile haranging the multitudes, averaging from two thousand to four thousand nightly, and the sensible and silly are being treated to a wholesale regimen such as this town never knew. It would perhaps be a terror to the place where your heart is supposed to be to hear his impassioned philippic anent Gehenna, with all its brimstone, blood, and thunder. The crotchety gospel pedler, to whom reference is made, goes by the title and cognomen of Rev. R. G. Pearson. He is of the Cumberland Presbyterian order of faith, I believe, and has a capital dome above his shoulders somewhat larger than a croquet ball—let's see, it may be near the size of a ten cent cabbage, with pedal extremities that will mash all the vacancy out of a number nine boot. His voice is a "still small voice," what I would denominate feminin, but the press calls it "Randolphian." Some pronounce him a Guiteau II., while all of us gentiles agree that he bids fair to add largely to the insane list for this county. A considerable sensation was aroused by the distribution of a large number of TRUTH SEEKERS and Truth Seeker Tracts throughout the immense tabernacle of the faithful. The person who did this must hav been some reckless ingrate, with no fear of Jehovah or the reverend before his eyes. It seems that the aim was good, and that the shot struck true, if we may judge from the "fine firenzy rolling" into which the reverend gentleman was precipitated upon learning of their pernicious presence.

To say nothing about other results, the hippodrome seems quite a success in a monetary point, as United States currency is turned in by the hatful.

Now, Mr. Editor, I'll approach the primary object of this writing. My request is for some information, if you can glean it, touching the ante-career of this itinerant "moral policeman," a number of us heathens being quite anxious to get the "scales" off our vision in regard to such history, because we can't help thinking that there is one of the usual "bugs under the ship." FRANCIS W. BRADLEY.

[We hav no knowledge of the revivalist referred to. Perhaps some of our readers may. Circulation of Truth Seeker Tracts and other Liberal literature ought to do some good—though the people may be too crazy to read.—ED. T. S.]

NEW YORK, May 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. E. Cady Stanton thinks that Christianity has not been of any benefit to women. She might go further and say with truth that it has always been a curse and a stumbling-block to reasonable progressiv reform, being used as a weapon of menace to stem the tide of free speech, thought, and action. While these good Christians are praying and exhorting, holding out promises of future reward and eternal joys for a mere belief in a senseless dogma, the earth is being despoiled, murder is rampant (dignified by the name of war), exiles are undergoing penal servitude and brutal treatment, for protesting against monarchical government; the poor all over the world are becoming poorer, many dying of starvation; wages for the workers are scarcely above the starving point; misery, degradation, want, and suffering has never been so painfully visible as it is at the present day.

The present day! day of civilization, day of Christian beneficence, with millions for ourselvs and pennies for the poor. On one side piled up, garnered in safe places, the kindly fruits of the earth, with a Christian standing guard over them, protected by Christian laws, claiming and receiving obeisance from Christian ministers, safe from invasion by the starving multitude, who bow before the words "thou shalt not steal," in their simple honesty forgetting that the "second thief is the best owner."

For what is that man but a thief who, either by cunning or by tricks, or "financial genius," absorbs unto himself more than he or his family can hav any earthly use for, and who, holding it tight in his avaricous hand, calmly sleeps under the mild admonition of his pastor, while upon the air is borne the wail of the dying who die for the want of a morsel of the waste from his abundant table? This is the old, old story. We are told it has always been so, will always be so. Why has it always been so? Because of a wrong conception of the relations between man and his creator. Instead of looking forward to a life beyond the grave, instead of flattering and cajoling God and trying to let him see what a tremendous being we think he is, we should hav turned our attention entirely to his gift of life and the use of the earth which he has given us, and shown godly qualities by equal dispensation of benefits, of love for our fellow-tenants on the earth, and a kindly and generous heart and solicitude for others which it is said Christ alone has shown. Of the future we know nothing, of the past we can hav nothing, but of the present we can do something to drive out of the minds of the ignorant and superstitious the nightmare of an avenging God who exists only in the idle vaporings of ministerial leeches on the body of the people.

WM. ALLEN SMITH.

BLUFFTON, O., April 25, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which please credit me for one year's subscription, and send me the ANNUAL and one copy each of "Bible Morals" and "False Claims," and turn the balance over to the Tent Fund, and oblige.

I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and your plan of giving all sides a hearing. This makes it interesting and is the only way to arrive at the truth.

Of course I heartily wish that everybody (especially Liberals) could get rid of superstition in all its forms and be content with "one world at a time," and use all their best energies toward making it better. And when I see people (apparently rational and intelligent in everything else) spending their time in writing about the "diakka" and their doings, and other (to me) foolishness of a like nature, it makes me sick, and I think "what fools these mortals be!' But then, there are many true and noble souls among Spiritualists, and they hav done much to loosen the bonds of priestcraft. Indeed, it is to them that I myself owe the mental liberty that I now enjoy. Hoping that all Liberals will continue to giv all sides a respectful hearing, and that the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER will continue to be the medium through which it can be done,

Yours for universal mental liberty, F. C. S.

ITHACA, N. Y., May 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I send you one dollar to continue your Liberal paper.

In No. 19 this volume, May 9, 1885, I see a communication from the pen of S. H. Preston, whose subject is "Matter—Man—Mind," which to my mind, observation, and experience is worth more than all others put together upon matter, its forms, and the science of mind, which subject has engrossed my attention for many years. It encircles the whole of material nature, with the embodiment of man, and his animal and intellectual mind. He says the infinit universe, from atoms to astral worlds, is a material unity; that all matter is essentially the same, and varies only in its forms; and all the material in man is common to the whole world, and there is no especial human element, and no distinction between the elements of the living and the dead; that is to say, only a change of chemical conditions in operation in the perpetual evolution of nature; that the prime product of man's organism is nervous force, the product of the brain, and of brain, mind; like will always produce like. The mind is the extremest measure of man, and all the antecedents of that are material.

I hav long since noted the truth of this assertion, and waited for some one to giv it expression; and now we hav it in elegant and scientific language from our friend S. H. Preston. This brings to my mind the logic I tried to get into the papers some time since, that no one had the capacity to trace form to its beginning, that form was eternal, and begot its own likeness; that man did not originate from protoplasm, and thus through a long line of successiv forms up to monkey and to man; that matter in form and mind cannot be traced to its beginning collectivly. Individuals hav a beginning and ending in human form and mind, but no extinction in elemental life. Water is productiv of animal life and form. All animal forms hav minds. Nature in male and female order produces form and mind, and they grow and expand together from the earthly production of material element until maturity; when the form decays, and the mind correspondingly, and by chemical action returns to mold in successiv reaction, to sustain animal form again. Thus form succeeds form in the order of the law of nature. I heartily indorse Mr. S. H. Preston.

Yours fraternally, ZENAS KENT.

THE MYSTERY DEEPENS.

STRASBURG, ILL, May 11, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I hav always been interested in Spiritualism; and when I read "A Mysterious Letter" by "Thumb Medium" I got a slate and pencil, and sat holding them, expecting every moment a message from the other world. Every little while one of the children would say, "Keep still, pa is going to cipher directly." Then I would hold my thumb up, and see two thumbs, or two door-knobs. The children would then say, "Ready—bang," and giggle, while I tried the slate trick again. Presently my wife brought the baby to me, saying it had the ear-ache. I told her I did not believe it, and would prove it. I made a tube out of a piece of paper, and placed it at the back of baby's head; and with one eye to the tube, the other opposit the ear, I looked at the door-knob with both eyes, and could see right through the baby's head. I told her there was no ache about that ear—to look for herself. She looked and jumped back, thinking there was a hole clear through the baby's head, and asked what made it. I told her that was a spiritual sight—that under the influence of spirits a person could see through anything.

TUBE MEDIUM.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The World and All.

She was ready for bed and lay on my arm,
In her little frill cap so fine,
With her golden hair falling out at the edge
Like a circle of noon sunshine.
And I hummed the old tune of "Banbury Cross,"
And "Three men who put out to sea,"
When she sleepily said, as she c'osed her blue eyes,
"Papa, fot would you take for me?"

And I answered "A dollar, dear little heart,"
And she slept, baby weary with play,
But I held her warm in my love strong arms,
And rocked and rocked away.
Oh, the dollar meant all the world to me,
The land and the sea and sky,
The lowest depths of the lowest place,
And the highest of all that's high.

The cities with streets and palaces,
Their pictures and works of art,
I would not take for one low, soft throb
Of my little one's loving heart.
Nor all the gold that ever was found
In the busy, wealth-finding past,
Would I take for one smile of my darling's face,
Did I know it must be the last.

So I rocked my baby and rocked away,
And I felt such a sweet content,
For the words of the song expressed to me more
Than they ever before had meant.
And the night came on and I slept and dreamed
Of things far too glad to be.
And I wakened with lips saying close to my ear,
"Papa, fot would you take for me?"

Stay with Mother.

We stood in the press at the ferry gate,
Breathless, weary, and just too late,
Watching the great boat plunge and strain
Through a roaring chaos of ice and rain.
And over the sullen crash and din,
O'er the turbulent tide thundering in,
Over the feet of the restless crowd,
A young voice carolling sweet and loud
Rose for a moment and beat the air
Like the strong white wings of the angel Prayer:
"O feet that are fain to go astray,
Stay with mother when her hair turns gray."

Only the words of a worn quatrain,
With a pitiful plea in its sad refrain.
Only a lad's voice sweet and strong,
Trolling the catch of a threadbare song;
As the tired and shivering crowd made way
For the pale little woman whose hair was gray.
The world may be crowded with sorrow and care,
But sweet human nature still thrives everywhere.
There's an instrument locked in each hardened breast
Whose compass may never be proven or guessed,
As the heart of the multi ude echoed that day,
"Stay with the mother when her hair turns gray."

DORA.

Slovenly Speaking.

I hav read with deep interest in Children's Corner in April 4th, "Going Strawberrying," and on May 9th "Grandma Craggin's" and "Georgia M—'s" letters, and think all three may be ranged under the general head, "Bad Habits;" and though I am not a critic, nor a philologist, but hav suffered all my life from the defect I deplore, viz., imperfection of language from lack of privileges in youth, yet I wish to notice, for the benefit of children, some errors of speech that are so universal, and yet such flagrant violations of the simplest grammatical and orthoepical rules that I think they may be classed under my title, "Slovenly Speaking."

"Georgia M—" (see TRUTH SEEKER, May 9th) points out one set of outrages. Permit me to supplement them with others no less offensiv to refined ears and cultivated tastes—that is, clipping a class of words ending with "ing," of which there may be hundreds, as hearing, seeing, feeling, touching, eating, smelling, asking, giving, going, coming, walking, talking, speaking, and so on, almost indefinitly. Children, you can search these words all out, and then tell me if I am correct in sayin' that one-half of the time in speakin' the soundin' of the g is unheard, which is a burnin' shame when so much is bein' done toward educatin' the risin' generation against the cryin' evil of ignorance. Parents are standin' in their own light by refrainin' from trainin' and teachin' their children in speakin readin', and writin' properly, and they are not doin' their duty by them in settin' bad examples before them, by themselvs utterin' improper language. Therefore, parents and teachers should always be seekin' opportunities for instructin' youths against omittin' the final g, as I hav done in this sentence in order to show you that the erroneous habit has become so common as to be scarcely perceived, and yet all these words we hear daily, and many others.

When a teacher, over forty years ago, I exercised the pupils on these words, compelling them to prolong the final g until the habit was formed and could not be eradicated. The words were written upon the blackboard and the whole school pronounced them in concert as I designated each with my pointer, and, children, it was an exercise they loved better than play, and I myself would like to liv it over again to-day with the same dear children, many of whom are now parents and grandparents, while some we shall never see more. My young friends, you can make a play of this yourselvs far more useful than silly games in which there is no profit, and not half the fun.

Those persons who clip the g from off the words I hav mentioned, almost always add it to words where it does not belong, as "Havin' been out in the garding, hangin' out my washin', on comin' in and pullin' down the curting (curtain), and shuttin' out the shinin' mornin' sun, and standin' there by the winder, hopin' the coolin' air of the evenin' would be revivin', askin',' etc., etc. Here is the cockney style: "My 'and haches clear up to my helbow" (my hand aches clear up to my elbow); which misplacing h sounds no worse to me than misplacing g. We would suppose that some persons took pains to misplace g did we not know that it arises from thoughtlessness.

In 1882, when visiting in Winchendon, Mass. (my birth-place), I was surprised to hear nearly all its residents, nativ or otherwise, separating the syllables of the name of their own town, and inserting g, thus Winchingdon, and accentuating the interpolation g as if their reputation depended upon their making that letter the most prominent in the word. What but the most inexcusable carelessness could account for such a palpable blunder?

Others seem to hav a dread of the letter r, and with them it is hoss, cuss, pus (purse), fust, wust, dassent, for dare not, etc., while some court the r with "this here," "that ar," kinder, sorter, hern, yourn, hisn, barlance (balance), and prehaps.

I shall never forget my mortification when a young girl teaching school in the now city of Fitchburg, Mass., at being introduced very emphatically by the head of the house where I was boarding as "Mrs." Gibson. Possibly this may account for my hatred of substituting Miss for Mrs., so common with many when speaking of or to married women or widows, just the reverse of my girlish experience, you perceive.

Now, my young readers, I call all this slovenly language—as slovenly and loose as for you to appear in company with your hair disarranged, your face dirty, dress soiled or torn, shoes and gloves ragged, and in a general appearance of confusion and untidiness; and yet many young persons, and even adults, who would scorn to be caught thus dressed at home, do not hesitate entering society using language in contravention of all known rules, even more objectionable than any I hav hinted at, interlarding their conversation with slang and with substitutes for oaths and profanity.

Now, children, it is as necessary that you should be proper and clean in your language as in your attire; there is a fashion in the one as well as in the other, and any departure from the rules of the former is noticed as readily by educated, well-bred people as is unfashionable, threadbare, and soiled apparel by the crowds of fashionable people you may meet; so I hope, my young friends, you will hav as great a dread of being heard or seen using improper language in speaking or writing as you hav of being caught in shabby garments; then you will take pains to form good habits and correct bad ones in all directions, as Lida suggested, and which is so very important to your success in life.

If your editor, Miss Wixon, will pardon this long letter, and desires it, and you are pleased with my lecture, I will write you again on some other topic more lively, and, perhaps, more interesting—how I kept school when a little girl, wrote sermons and preached for play. Your friend, ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., May 8, 285.

[We thank dear Miss Gibson for her timely and instructiv lesson, and for her kind interest in our Corner. We shall be delighted to hear how she kept school, wrote sermons and preached for play, when a little girl, and we think she never taught a lovelier class, or preached to a more appreciativ audience, than she will always find in the Children's Corner. —ED. C. C.]

The following from the Nashville Banner may appropriately follow Miss Gibson's article:

The writer was conversing with a very intelligent gentleman the other day, and he was surprised at the number of ungrammatical expressions used by him. It was not because he did not know better and could not use the most elegant language, but he had fallen into the bad habit of speaking carelessly. We all do it, and we all ought to do better. There is nothing which is more charming than correct speaking. When you find men or women who use the best language in speaking, you like to hear them talk. It is like good music. Why should not all who can write correctly also speak correctly, and avoid those slips of grammar and the slang expressions which so generally mar our intercourse with each other. The Banner has a great mind to take up the subject at length and point out many expressions which should be dropped forever from our speech. But [illegible]y.

Instead, it givs a [illegible] spelling and pronunciation below. [illegible]any of our young readers can correctly pronounce the words given in this jumble, and again, how many can spell all these words? Suppose you try it? Let some one in the family call out the words, and let the others spell. Here is the lesson:

The most skilful gauger I ever knew was a maligned cobbler, armed with a poniard, who drove a pedler's wagon, using a mullein stalk as an instrument of coercion to tyrannize over his pony shod with calks. He was a Galilean Sadducee, and he had a phthisicky catarrh, diphtheria, and the bilious intermittent erysipelas. A certain sibyl, with the soubriquet of "Gypsy," went into ecstasies of cachination at seeing him measure a bushel of pease, and separate saccharine tomatoes from a heap of peeled potatoes, without dyeing or singeing the ignitible queue which he wore, or becoming paralyzed with a hemorrhage. Lifting her eyes to the ceiling of the cupola of the capitol to conceal her unparalleled embarrassment, making a rough courtesy, and not harassing with mystifying, rarefying and stupefying innuendoes, she gave him a conch, a bouquet of lilies, mignonette, and fuchsias, a treatis on pneumonics, a copy of Apocrypha in hieroglyphics, daguerreotypes of Mendelssohn and Kosciusko, a kaleidoscope, a dram-phial of ipecacuanha, a teaspoonful of naphtha for deleble purposes, a ferrule, a clarionet, some licorice, a surcingle, a carnelian of symmetrical proportions, a chronometer with a movable balance-wheel, a box of dominoes and a catechism.

The gauger, who was also a trafficking rectifier and parishioner of mine, preferring a surtout (his choice was referable to a vacillating, occasionally-occurring idiosyncrasy), wofully uttered this apothegm; "Life is checkered; but schism, apostasy, heresy, and villainy shall be punished." The sibyl apologizingly answered: "There is a ratable, allegeable difference between conferrable ellipse and a trisyllable diaresis." We replied in trochees, not impugning her suspicion.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—POETICAL ENIGMA.

My 6 and 4, and 3 and 2 is named a forest tree,
While 12 and 5, and also 1 is called the deep blue sea;
My 15, 6, and also 11 spell a famous general's name,
While 16, 6, 12, 10 and 8 is a king well known to fame;
My 6 and 10, 11, and 12 is something all should hate,
While 6 and 7 as initials stand for a great and sovereign state;
Of 17 letters I am composed,
Now do your very best;
For my whole is a lady Liberal
In the great and boundless West.

2.—NUMERICAL ENIGMA.

SUNDAY, May 10, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just come from Sunday school and found my mamma writing to you, so I thought I would write too, and tell you about how I came to go. All my little playmates go, and mamma says it will do me no harm. We hav a lovely minister, he tells us stories, and we hav singing, and I hav a nice time. I hav a little friend, her name is Carrie, she is a Spiritualist, and I laugh at her when she tells me about Spirits coming back here to see us. My mamma tells me that this belief is just as foolish as the other. I am so glad that I hav a Liberal mamma, and I am her little girl. Good bye. From CORA.

[Cora's letter is good, but we must ask her not to laugh at her little playmate on account of her belief. We must not ridicule those who believe differently from ourselvs, but try to convince them of their errors, and do all we can to make them see things in their true light. We know a good many very kind, intelligent people who are Spiritualists, who devote much time to doing good in the world; and while we may not understand all things as they do, we can imitate their example of goodness. Cora's dear mamma will tell her this is the better way to do.—ED. C. C.]

Selections.

Sociology of the South.

Extract from Correspondence of the New York Times of May 10, 1885.

Of all the obstacles, however, in the way of our development, the most formidable is our theological status. I know no people so dominated by their clergy, no clergy such resolute and consistent foes of progress. The clergy upheld slavery to the last gasp, and still often defend the system. The clergy sounded the tocsin of war from hundreds of pulpits. Of a large portion of the church the clergy are even now engaged in thrusting back the too eagerly proffered fraternal grasp of their Northern brethren. The clergy oppose to scientific investigation an unelastic system of dogma, and stigmatize as heretics, not those of their number who fail to preach the great precepts of love to God and love to man, but those who doubt the identity of the laws of the Christian and the Jewish Sabbath or who venture the assertion that "evolution is probably true." The influence of the so-called religious press is scarcely less at the South than that of the pulpit. A man who reads nothing else reads his "church paper"—and what does it teach him? I can speak from accurate knowledge of but one such publication. It is issued from the most prominent city of the South; it is the leading organ of its denomination; it receives only encomiums from the clergy and allegiance from the laity. But if, indeed, it be true that to "call evil good and good evil" is the "unpardonable sin," there are not many successiv weeks wherein this sheet is not guilty. A man scarcely receives his imprimatur as a lofty and noble spirit until canonized by the abuse of these religious columns. They hav denounced nearly every man proclaimed good and great by the consensus of humanity. Even such men as Longfellow, Phillips Brookes, Dean Stanley himself—that Christlike "bigot only of intolerance"—hav not escaped. This paper silently ignores public vices of our political partisans, while in article after article the one lamentable error of a great and conscientious woman is so coarsely interpreted and so unceasingly reiterated, that her high personal qualities and the unswerving rectitude of her teaching are buried beneath the stones which her accusers, themselvs presumably "without sin," hav cast upon her.

A duel of peculiar atrocity agitates the entire community. But for dueling our religious paper has no denunciation. Drunkenness defiles the church, but the liquor-sellers are generous to the clergy, and for their traffic the church's organ has condemnatory words very few and faint. It is vigorous, however, on the subject of dancing, encouraging purity of thought by an imputation of unspeakable evil inherent in this universal impulse of light-hearted youth. It is silent in regard to infidelities of conduct, but it makes haste to brand as "a thesaurus of Infidelity" the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. It rejects, on the ground of "a want of Christian courtesy," a wholly impersonal article which chances to be opposed to its own scientific views, and prints an attack upon the Century Magazine—the wisest and stanchest friend the South possesses—an attack which for vindictivness, contumely, and mendacity might hav been penned, as it was inspired, by the very spirit of evil! The Century may well exclaim, as did Frederick Robertson of his similar persecutor: "The 'Record' has done me the honor to abuse me for some time past, for which I thank them gratefully. God forbid they should ever praise me!" The "pity of it" all is that these are our guides in the most important issues of life.

Stuart Mill tells us that "the evidence of history and that of human nature combine by a striking instance of consilience to show that there is one social element predominant and almost paramount among the agents of the social progression." This is "speculation, intellectual activity, the pursuit of truth." We hav seen that our isolation, in part unavoidable, but largely wilful, our lack of a "noble discontent," our impatience of criticism, our inhospitable "climate of opinion," our dogmatic and intolerant theology, all militate "against the main determining cause of social progress." If our opinions and modes of thinking never change, our advance is impossible.

Are we of the South willing that it should be so? Are we content to be a people without a literature; without an intellectual and moral influence; without a part in the great task of the future, that "of rendering life, not what it now is, almost universally pueril and insignificant, but such as human beings, with highly developed faculties, can care to hav?" Are we willing to be of interest only as a unique people, a sort of modern Aztec, a type left behind by the current of civilization? Above all, are we willing to hav the vitality crushed from our religious faith, and to substitute pharisaic formulas and ferocities for the Christian ideal of the brotherhood of man? No political changes, no material prosperity, will giv us the life we need. The impetus must come from within, from a change in the very "ply and tendency" of our minds.

Happy for us is it that "sociology is not a science of positiv predictions, but of tendencies only." Another generation may reverse the horoscope of this? We of the old, look to the young South, believing in its possibilities, hopeful of its achievements. If this paper helps to show even one whose career is yet before him "the way not to go," it will not hav been written in vain. And yet, ever before my too adventurous pen has seemed to rise the warning:

"Truths would you teach, and save a sinking land,
All fear, none aid you, and few understand."

A SOUTHERNER.

The Liberal South Holds Out Her Hand.

From the Independent Pulpit for May.

The New York TRUTH SEEKER is perhaps the most vigorous and effectiv Liberal journal in this country; Agnostic in regard to the future, but duly alive and aggressiv in its opposition to bigotry, ignorance, and superstition. In replying to a criticism by our correspondent, "Independent Thinker," in the April Pulpit, the editor disavows any spirit of bitterness toward the people of the South, which we are inclined to accept as true, notwithstanding, now and then, there appears a reflection that to Southern ears sounds harsh and unkind. As to his remark that the South is a "long way behind the East and West in development, both physically and mentally," we may admit its partial truth, without suffering any disparagement whatever, since circumstances that are painfully sensible to every one hav conspired to confer upon the East and West many great advantages. As to the mental and moral condition of the white people of the two sections, statistics giv the superiority to the South; and but for the disasters consequent upon the late war, she might hav been equal to the other sections in physical development. Liberalism has not been urged upon the Southern people as long and as vigorously as it has upon those of the North; but a brief experience and opportunity for observation teaches us that the people, where tested by agitation, are about as Liberal as those of any other section. The condition of the negroes is to be deplored, and the Southern people are striving with all their power to elevate these unfortunate people, who, in their turn, are making some improvement. Our contemporary evinces a manly spirit of candor and conciliation in his reply, and we rejoice that among Liberals these sectional animosities are handled with a great deal more charity than among Christians. The following part of Mr. Macdonald's reply is so manly and conciliatory that we reproduce it with pleasure, as an example of a truly Liberal spirit:

"Our remark that 'all the old Abolitionists are now Liberals,' was in response to an inquiry, and is strictly true, with not the slightest shade of sectionalism concealed therein. Though a soldier's grave at Manassas Junction is a sacred spot, we hav no hatred of the foemen who took a father's life. All fought for what they considered right. The cry against the South, raised even now by certain political papers, is, in our opinion, not only totally unfounded, but criminally unwise as regards the future of the United States. Let the dead past bury its dead. We believe that, with the exception of a few of the older generation, the people south of Mason and Dixon's line are glad that slavery has been abolished, and are willing to forget and forgiv, and strive now as mightily as their Northern brethren for the upbuilding of the common republic. And certainly Liberals should be among the first to help heal the wounds of war, and we believe they are. There is more tolerance expressed by the old soldiers and the old Abolitionists than by those who never went to war, or the politicians who profited by the war, and would profit by a continuance of the sectional feeling. We are sure that our Independent Thinker has drawn wrong conclusions from premises wholly insufficient. Let the Liberal South hold out her hand, and the Liberal North will leap clear across the bloody chasm to grasp it."

SAID a geological girl to an apple merchant: "Giv me some gneiss apples, that's schist what I want; giv me two quartz, strata way, so I may catch mica."

Christian Persecution of Jews.

A correspondent of the Telegram, under date of April 25th, writes from Constantinople: "An incident has just occurred here which serves to show how the fire of religious fanaticism still lingers in the heart of the Eastern Christian, and what scenes of persecution would doubtless be witnessed from time to time but for the controling presence of the Mohammedan Turk. A whole Jewish quarter on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus has been depopulated, the inhabitants being dispersed among the other villages by the care of the police, in order to preserve them from the furious attacks of their Greek neighbors. It is the old story, 'Giv a dog a bad name and then hang him.' Some one started the idea during Holy Week that the Jews of Deirmen had wantonly insulted the emblem of Christianity, and the ill-feeling this engendered, intensified by a subsequent incident, culminated on Saturday last in a serious riot which, but for the wise forbearance of the Turks coupled with great firmness, would undoubtedly hav had a most sanguinary ending. That the feelings of the Greeks hav been cruelly outraged cannot be denied, but there is not the slightest evidence to show that the Jews are in any way responsible for this. It is more than probable that the real authors of the evil deeds by which a whole population was set by the ears are Greek robbers, who were looking to profit from the row they knew would take place. The opening scene in this chapter of religious strife was the appearance in a Jewish garden at Deirmen on the morning of Good Friday, of a wooden cross, with a cock in a high state of decomposition nailed upon it. This naturally excited the wrath of the Greeks living in the vicinity, but they contented themselvs for that time with an appeal to the police. Six Jews were arrested on suspicion, and in order to calm the excitement that prevailed, the owner of the garden and his family were moved off to Constantinople.

"The Jews indignantly denied having had any hand in the outrage, and the affair was being forgotten, when fresh provocation gave a new impetus to the fury of the Greeks. A Christian grocer, called Stepan, living at Deirmen, found on Saturday morning, nailed to the door of his shop, a cross covered with filth. This, like the former deed, was at once attributed to the Jews, and the news, flying rapidly from mouth to mouth, in an incredibly short time a vast crowd of men and women had collected in the streets, crying out for vengeance. A voice in the crowd suggested that they should take the law into their own hands, and siege was immediately laid to the Jewish houses, the owners of which had immediately proceeded to barricade themselvs at the first sign of danger. Stones began to rattle at the windows, and finding it difficult to force an entrance, preparations were being made to set the houses on fire, when, fortunately, a strong detachment of cavalry from the Scutari barracks made its appearance on the scene. The police had been unable to do anything, and even the presence of the soldiers, although it served to put an end to the incendiary proceedings, did not suffice to make the crowd disperse. All the efforts of the 'Ephors' of the Greek and Armenian churches to induce the people to leave the matter to the authorities were of no avail. The summary punishment of the Jews they would hav, for nothing could convince them that they were not the authors of the outrage, although a gendarme stationed at Deirmen had been arrested on suspicion. Not until they received a solemn promis that the whole of the Jewish families would be cleared out of Deirmen would the incensed Greeks think of retiring. It was well that the authorities kept watch and ward during the night, for the fury of the populace had in no wise abated by morning, although it was the day of peace among Christians. A vast crowd collected, clamoring for the fulfilment of the promis given by the authorities, who saw no way of calming the excitement but by the removal of the Hebrews. Escorted by cavalry and police they were marched off to where the Jewish communities are strong enough to hold their own against any ebullition of Christian fanaticism."

Mexico's Wasted Wealth.

Emily Pierce in Frank Leslie's.

It is a fact, frankly acknowledged, that the Roman Catholic church in Mexico is now surrounded by the ruins only of its former greatness. Fifty years ago this opulent institution owned over three-fifths of the city of Mexico. The income of the archbishop was greater than that of the queen of England. In 1827 there were 150 convents and monasteries in Mexico. One-tenth of the products of the country went to the clergy as tithes. The estimated value of church property in 1850 was $300,000,000, one-third of the entire property of the nation. In the city of Mexico there were 5,000 houses, valued at $80,000,000, of which the church owned more than one-half. Domes rose in every block, the cross was lifted upon every hand. The annual income of the church in the city of Mexico was $20,000,000, while that of the republic was only $18,000,000. The clergy in the city of Puebla held mortgages on farms, in that state alone, to the amount of $40,000,000. Between Puebla and Apizaco, a distance of thirty miles, were 124 churches, and the valley of Puebla numbered 365—one for each day in the year.

The grand cathedral stands upon the site of the Aztec Teocalli; it covers a space of 426 by 500 feet, and its high altar, which is in the center of the edifice, is above the spot once occupied by the sacrificial stone. The choir is one mass of elaborate carvings. Extending around it, and leading to the high altar, probably 200 feet, is a railing of lumbago, manufactured in China, and weighing twenty-six tons. It is a brassy-looking metal, composed of gold, silver, and a small alloy of copper, but containing so much gold that an offer has been made to replace it with pure silver, and giv many thousand dollars in addition. The altar itself, placed upon a marble platform, is of wrought and polished silver, and the whole surmounted by a small temple, in which formerly rested the figure of the Virgin of Remedios, who was dressed in three petticoats—one embroidered with pearls, another with emeralds, and a third with diamonds, the value of which was over $3,000,000. This was only one part of one church in Mexico, and that said not to be the richest.

I dropped into the sacristy one day, and found two or three padres indulging in a quiet chat after mass. They politely volunteered to show me the magnificent set of vestments worked for the cathedral by command of Isabella of Spain. They are of cloth-of-gold, incrusted with gems, and with passages of holy writ, so exquisitly worked in silk that it required the closest inspection for my woman's eyes to discover traces of the needle. These gorgeous vestments are useless for practical purposes, being so heavy that no man of ordinary dimensions could sustain their enormous weight during mass, or even long enough to pronounce benediction.

The cathedral of Puebla is the best specimen of architecture I hav seen in Mexico. The material is blue basalt, and the massiv buttresses and lofty towers without, the noble arches and artistic pillars within, giv a dignity and solidity often lacking. A favorit legend tells us that, while in process of building, this cathedral gained mysteriously in hight during the night exactly as much as the masons had accomplished during the day. This was said to be the work of two angels who came down from heaven, and wrought with golden trowels in their hands; hence the city acquired the name of "Puebla de los Angeles" (the city of the angels).

Here, the great altar affords the finest display of Mexican marbles in the republic, and beneath it is the sepulcher of the bishops. Before the revolution there depended from the center of the vast dome an enormous chandelier—a mass of gold and silver weighing tons; one may imagin its value from the fact that the cost of cleaning it alone amounted to $4,000. Here the candelabra were of gold, and so ponderous that a strong man could not lift them; the value of the jewels was of historic notoriety, and an image of the Virgin boasted a zone of diamonds valued at $1,000,000.

The cathedral of Santa Guadalupe is the most famous in Mexico, and was once the richest and most venerated shrine; but the grand old Italian president, Benito Juarez, confiscated most of its gold and silver ornaments, and coined them into money to carry on his war against the church party. Even the frame of solid gold which surrounded the patron saint was taken, but this was afterward returned. The altar railing, weighing tons, is of solid silver. This alone, of all the sumptuous church fixtures, was spared by the Liberals.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Let There Be Light!

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

SIGNIFICANT. NEW AND BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIV.

FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

(Design patented Feb. 24, 1885.)

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

DESCRIPTION:

The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symboliz s the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3 00, $3 50, $4 00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt. OTTO WETTSTEIN,

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Sent to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price. THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market: it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

TOUCHSTONE: Hast any philosophy in thee, shepherd?

Corin: No more but that I know the more one sickens the worse at ease he is; and that he that wants money, means, and content is without three good friends; that the property of rain is to wet and fire to burn; that good pasture makes fat sheep and that a great cause of the night is lack of the sun; that he that hath learned no wit by nature nor art may complain of good breeding or comes of a very dull kindred.

Touchstone: Such a one is a natural philosopher.—Shakespere.

YOU cannot change a man's thoughts about things as you can change the books in his library. The mind is not a box, which can hav opinions inserted and extracted at pleasure. No belief is good for anything which is not part of an organic growth and the natural product of a man's mental development under the various conditions in which he is placed. To promote his intellectual activity, to encourage him to think, and to put him in the way of thinking rightly, is a plain duty; but to try to insert ready-made opinions into his mind by dint of authority is to contradict the fundamental principles of free inquiry.—Leslie Stephen.

LET us, if possible, banish all fear from the mind Don't imagin that there is some being who would giv to his children the holy torch of reason, and then damn them for following where the sacred light may lead. Let us hav courage. Priests hav invented a crime called blasphemy; and behind that crime hypocrisy has crouched for thousands of years. There is but one blasphemy and that is injustice. There is but one worship and that is justice. You need not fear the anger of a God whom you cannot injure. Rather fear to injure your fellow-men. Don't be afraid of the crime that you cannot commit. Rather be afraid of the one that you can commit.—Ingersoll's What Must We Do to be Saved?

ANY engagement, which is innocent, is better than none; as the writing of a book, the building of a house, the laying out of a garden, the digging of a fish-pond—even the raising of a cucumber or a tulip. Whilst our minds are taken up with the objects or business before us, we are commonly happy, whatever the object or business be; when the mind is absent and the thoughts are wandering to something else than what is passing in the place in which we are, we are often miserable.—Paley's Mental and Political Philosophy.

THEY who fancy heaven to be a state in which there is nothing to do, but everything to enjoy; no victory to gain, but only garlands to wear, must be people who hav never learned how tiresome enjoyment is. The hardest thing to hav long is joy. Men can more easily bear work for years than play for weeks. The heavenliness of existence consists in brave, hopeful effort to gain something to make the world happier. An hour of that will glorify, will make the heart almost leap out of the bosom to get room enough to beat in.—O. B. Frothingham.

THOUGH it is not a direct article of the Christian system that the world we inhabit is the whole of the habitable creation, yet it is so worked up therewith, from what is called the Mosaic account of the creation, the story of Eve and the apple, and the counterpart of that story, the death of the Son of God, that to believe otherwise, that is, to believe that God created a plurality of worlds, at least as numerous as what we call stars, renders the Christian system of fal h at once little and ridiculous, and scatters it in the mind like feathers in the air. The two beliefs cannot be held together in the same mind; and he who thinks that he believes both has thought but little of either.—Thomas Paine.

THERE is a moral phenomenon more prevalent than we are apt to suspect, the existence, in the same understanding, of two opinions mutually destructiv, without any consciousness of their incompatibility.—Bailey's Pursuit of Truth.

HOW strange and sad is the laxity with which men, in these days, suffer the most inconsistent opinions to lie jumbled lazily together in their minds!—S. T. Coleridge.

I FLATTER myself that I am so sincere a lover of truth that it is very indifferent to me, so I am possessed of it, whether it be my own or any other man's discovery. For I count any parcel of this gold not the less to be valued, nor not the less enriching, because I wrought it not out of the mine myself. I think everyone ought to contribute to the common stock, but to hav no other scruple about the receiving truth but that he be not imposed on and take counterfeit, and what will not bear the touch, for genuin and real truth.—Locke.

REASON was given man to be exercised, not to be stifled. Destroy that and you dwarf a man to a brute. Take reason away from man and you take all that is noble in him; it is the motion from the air, the hue from the flower, the light from the sun. Reason bids man throw off false reverence of customs, and embody his life in higher forms. Reason is radical. It does not believe that goodness is all known, that greatness is all dead, and that man's whole duty is to worship the former and weep over the latter; but it points forward and says: "There are holier truths to be learned, loftier hights to be reached, and a better humanity to be lived.—L. K. Washburn.

THE REFORMER.

Aloof he stands and talks with God,
A Moses understood by none;
And men who trade and men who plod
Revile him fiercely, or but shun;
But he, cloud-wrapt and victory shod,
Abides his time till right be done.

Poor task it were to stoop and heed
The senseless sneer, the empty joke,
While truth unfolds the coming creed
That yet shall sever error's yoke;
Absorbed in one prophetic deed,
He hath no time for meaner stroke.

DR. BOUSILLEUR AND HIS MARVELOUS NOSTRUMS AND THEIR EFFECT.

"Doctor," said a sickly-looking man, as he seated himself in the office of Dr. Bousilleur, who advertises as "late of the Hospital La Charite, Paris," "Doctor, can you giv me something that will cure a pain in the chest?"

"Oui, certainment, monsieur," cried the doctor. "One remede merveilleux. You take one little bouteille—poof! Good-by all zee docteur, all zee pain of zee poitrine—zee chest."

"A dead shot, is it, doctor?"

"Ma foi, oui," he replied, "One medecine beautiful, magnifique. He kill zee pain avec celerite, instan'ainement. He go at once to zee situation of zee pain—one medecine of great intelligence."

"Is it bad to take, doctor?"

"Le diable, non! He be delicieusement—all same you swallow one what you call rainbow. Every personne take him wis enthousiasm."

"How much do you charge for one bottle, Dr. Boozeyur?"

"One bouteille zee medecine puissant cost you fife dollaire en monaie d'or des E'ats Unis Unite State gold coin."

"That is very dear; can't you take less?"

"Impossible, mon cher sir! Parole d'honneur, c'est entierment impossible. Bah! zee medecine is not wataire of zee rivire. He is one merveille de la nature—une chef d'ouvre d'art. Me can submit me to no sacrifice pecuniaire. You take zee demi-bouteille, pay me two dollaire half or sortir; go to le quartier Chinois. It is there you find le docteur, le medicament for you. Allez-vous en!"

"No, doctor, I'll not go to Chinatown for medicin; I'm not that mean."

"Ver' goot. Vous avez l'air malade, and my medecine certainment make zee cure parfaite and immediatement. Peste! it is no one maladie incurable—immedicable."

"Well, doctor, here are $5; giv me a whole bottle."

"Ah, merci, monsieur! You will find him one medecine magnifique—ineffable."

"I hope so. Good-by, doctor."

"Au plaisir, monsieur; au revoir."

The next day Dr. Bousilleur's customer returned, entering the office with: "See here, Dr. Boozeyur, that medicine—"

"O, ho! Bon jour, monsieur," broke in the doctor. "Ah, ha, you feel yourself pretty well to-day? Avez-vous bien sleep—bien dormi? You feel goot—tres-bien?"

"Infernally bad, doctor; infernally bad."

"Pas tres-bien! Ah, goot! Me hav prescriber you zee medecine to make you feel pad. Zee medecine work by the rule of contrarietie, d'une maniere remarquable."

"But I didn't take it, Dr. Boozeyur!"

"Le diable! Zat is pourquoi, why you feel bad; pour quelle raison you do not feel good."

"But, Dr. Boozeyur, the medicin was not for myself; it was for my father."

"Eh! Ver' well—comment se porte, monsieur, votre pere? How is your fadder feel?"

"He is dead."

"Mort! Le diable! Mort? Serait il possible. Do you not make to me one plaisanterie caprieuse—one what you call joke, humbug? E range—suprenant! He did take it?"

"Yes."

"And he is dead—mort?"

"Dead."

"How long time he liv from when he did receivoir take zee medecine?"

"About ten hours."

"Bon—goot!"

"What! Do you say good?"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 12. No. 22. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, May 30, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

A FREETHOUGHT demonstration, attended by five thousand persons, was held in Sydney, New South Wales, to condemn the conduct of the colonial government in sending troops to the Soudan. The resolution of condemnation was carried unanimously.

E. M. PACKARD, arrested in Brooklyn for embezzling $50,000 from his employers, always had a well-thumbed Bible on his desk. Evidently his favorit biblical story was the flight of the Israelites and the "borrowing" transaction which preceded it.

BOB INGERSOLL may be an Infidel, and he may be going to hell when he leaves terrestrial scenes; but there are several thousand Christian men in the world whose wives would be far more happy were their husbands half as decent as Colonel Bob.—Grit, Hanover, Kan.

A BELFAST gentleman who recently returned from Portland visited the Salvation Army while there, and discovered in one of the leaders a tramp who spent the larger portion of the winter in Belfast jail. The tramp has become converted and is now a leader in the Army.

AT the morning session of the Presbyterian Assembly held in Cincinnati May 22d, Judge Drake, of Philadelphia, offered a resolution which declared the Roman church apostatized, its priesthood usurpers, and its baptism invalid. Such a resolution as that from a Presbyterian would cool the most torrid atmosphere.

A GREAT fuss has been made by English Christians about the "abolition of church rates," but the abolition, says Annie Besant, has been very imperfectly performed. In the rates for which payment has lately been demanded from her, she found a church rate of 10s. 5d. under the 51 George III. c. 151, an act to enable the vestrymen of the parish of St. Marylebone to build a new parish church, or two or more chapels. She comments: "Thus I am forced to pay in support of an establishment and a creed which I detest, while at the same time church people hav the impudence to pretend that they receive nothing by gift of Parliament."

AN Arizona man who subscribed for a religious paper some time ago sent a letter to the editor to stop it, in which he said: "We find the Gila Howler, our local paper, much livelier than your old milk-and-water affair. Besides, you havn't played a square game in your 'ads.' My wife bought a pair of the corsets you advertise and blamed if they didn't bust in three weeks, and we use them now to mend the chicken-coop. I took half a dozen of the dead-shot pills you puffed up in a reading notice week before last, and the next day I was so sick that all the doctors in the town published bulletins about my approaching death, and the boys said I had the jim-jams. For these reasons I hav determined to quit your paper and read the Howler only. As I know it always lies unless it is paid to tell the truth, it can't lead me into temptation."

THE Chronicle reports that in a Mongol murder case in San Francisco the following oath was administered to each of the Chinese witnesses: "This is to inform the spirits of the gods, also the evil spirits and the demons, all to descend here to hear, oversee, and examin into the case of Wong Ah Foo, charged with murdering Loi Ah Gow. If I come here to swear profanely and tell the untruth, or not according to the facts of the case, I humbly beg the celestial and terrestrial spirits to redress Loi Ah Gow's grievance and to punish the false witness immediately, and to arrest his soul. May he die under a sword, or die on the half-way of the sea, and hav no life to return to China. This is the true and solemn declaration of oath sworn by my own mouth and signed by my name by my own hand. Dated this —— day, second month, in the eleventh year of Quong Soi." It is believed that all who take this oath will testify truthfully, as the Celestials believe that if they should perjure themselvs after passing through the ceremony they will die an everlasting death, and that the gates of the Flowery Kingdom will be closed upon them.

THE subjoined compendious vocabulary of abusiv epithets directed against the Russians, arranged for convenience in alphabetical order, is extracted from a Delhi newspaper: "Russians! asses, blockheads, boobies, clowns, dolts, empty heads, fanatics, flats, fools, fallow brains, gabies, geese, hypocrits, ignoramuses, jobbernowls, jabber heads, knaves, loggerheads, mooncalves, numskulls, oafs, pumps, quacks, rogues, ruffians, squatters, simpletons, tomnoddies, ualators, vultures, wreakers, yellers, zokels, zanies!"

THE following epitaph in addition to the usual record appears on a tombstone in a Buffalo (N. Y.) cemetery:

"My wife,
Whose remains lie below,
Was faithful and true.
Her life was as pure as a drop
Of dew on a rosebud.

"A true woman, a stranger to superstition and cant, she was never born again, had nothing to repent of, but had the esteem of all the noble and good who knew her worth.

"Love, truth, and virtue never die;
Such as she are immortal."

The lady was the wife of Alexander Cole, and the inscription is an honest tribute of his love.

AT one of Mr. Bradlaugh's meetings, when the petition for the passage by Parliament of an affirmation bill was presented, one of the signers was a poor fellow with no arms, holding the penholder in his mouth. The signature, made by bending his head over the sheet, was very clear and firm. Mr. Bradlaugh relates that the man had lost his arms in the rolling mill to which he had been carrying the white-hot iron with tongs. The tongs had been held by the metal feeding the rollers, and in trying to disentangle the tongs the poor fellow slipped and was gripped, and both his arms crushed off to the elbows. Mr. Bradlaugh adds, "My eyes moistened as I saw this signature, and it will at least serve to encourage me in my wearying fight."

JUDGE DOUGHERTY, of Alabama, was noted for eccentricity and sarcasm quite as much as for impartial administration of justice. During a term of court at Montgomery a young man was tried for petit larceny—taking a pocketbook. The next case was for murder. The evidence in the former was slight, in the latter conclusiv, yet the jury convicted in the first and acquitted in the second, much to the surprise of the judge, the audience, and the prisoners themselvs. In the first case the judge said to the prisoner: "Young man, you hav not been in this country long?" "No, sir," replied the young man. "I thought so. You don't know these people; you may kill them, but don't touch their pocketbooks." The Mobile Register tells this anecdote.

ON the subject of "False Judges" a correspondent of John Swinton's Paper says: "Long accustomed to the sycophantic adulation of Judge Folger by a partisan press, the article in your last issue, 'The Befouled Bench,' is most refreshing to me. The small mischiefs a bad judge may do are easily covered out of sight under power and prestige, but there are judicial offenses which can never be hidden nor forgiven, 'neither in this world nor in the world to come.' When Ward Hunt, willing to gain a little trumpery popularity at the expense of an innocent woman, so far exceeded his powers as to direct a jury to find a verdict of 'guilty' against her, he wrote his name on the eternal roll of infamy. His offense shall be punished with the scorn of all ages. Benedict added his name to the disgraceful roll by his outrage upon Lange. (See 9 Albany, Law Journal, 102.) Mr. Lange was wrongfully convicted of a trivial technical offense, quite harmless in itself, and the imposition of a malicious and illegal sentence led to the celebrated case of Lange vs. Benedict, in which Mr. Lange, with laudable public spirit, sought to bring Benedict to justice. In this case the whole judiciary of the country proved faithless, and Folger distinguished himself by his opinion, of which the gist was that as Benedict's act 'was not without the inception of jurisdiction,' his conduct was judicial and not personal, and hence Mr. Lange was without remedy (73 New York Reports, 12). Thus Folger stood between a judge whose conduct could not hav been gratuitous, and the punishment he well deserved, and screened him from the consequences of his rascality; and thus Folger wrote his name beside Benedict's on the list of infamous judges Judge Krekel, when two offenders were convicted before him of minor misdeeds, detained them in jail long enough for one to teach the other to read and write, and then discharged them both. What a contrast is there between the Krekels of the bench, who, I am sorry to say, are few, and the incompetent and corrupt judges, who find it necessary to bolster up their pretended dignity by injustice and cruelty."

THE proposed railway from London to Bombay will, it is estimated, extend over a distance of nearly seven thousand miles, and this distance, it is calculated, can be traversed in nine days, or an average of thirty-five miles an hour. The route contemplated is through Paris, Madrid, Gibraltar, Tangiers, Tunis, Tripoli, Cairo, Bassorah, Kelat, to Kurrachee and Bombay. Use will be made of the existing railways in France and Spain, and steam transit will be established from the Bay of Gibraltar to Ceuta, in Morocco, from which latter point will begin the international railway, the works of which will hav to be constructed in Morocco. This line will then form a junction with the system of railways under the administration of the French railway company in Algeria and Tunisia. Thence the route will continue through Tripoli, and form a junction with the Egyptian railway system. From Egypt, the route to India would be continued to the Euphrates, and then along the coast of the Persian Gulf to Kurrachee; thence to Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras.

CHRISTIANITY loses its effectivness when carried into a cold country. It is related that a missionary who had been sent out to Greenland had to be recalled, after having lived for a long time among the Eskimo, because he had not made a single convert. On reaching home, he was interrogated by the president of the society as to the reason for his failure. "Sir," he replied, "the nativs listened to me with the greatest attention, and would crowd around me in the bitterest cold and the deepest darkness, until I began to talk of the terrors of hell-fire which would be prepared for all those who did not giv heed to my words. The thought of going to a place where it was always warm affected them differently from what I expected, for the prospect appeared so desirable to the poor creatures, trembling with cold, that from the same hour they left me they never came back." It is said that another missionary was shortly after sent out by the same society, who was warned to be less explicit in his description of the place of torment awaiting the unconverted Greenlanders after death.

IT has been objected to the theories of the origin of species, as propounded by evolutionists, that, though we may grant the probability of the doctrins they enunciate, there hav been few attempts to indicate species that hav actually arisen in this way. Prof. Thomas Meehan undertakes this task in the Proceedings of the Academy of Natural Sciences at Philadelphia, just issued. Pinus edulis, the Pinon nut of the Mexicans on this side of the Rocky Mountains, has two or three leaves in a sheath. On the Western side, in Nevada, there is a smaller tree, with the leaves solitary in the "bundle," just as if two leaves had been rolled into one. This is known to botanists as Pinus monophylla, or the single-leaved pine. Besides this difference, there are others which warrant botanists in regarding it as good a species as any other well recognized as such. Professor Meehan finds this monophyllous character occasionally in Pinus edulis, and shows that the two must hav had a unity of origin, notwithstanding their acknowledged separate specific identity. Pinus edulis is a more highly developed species than Pinus monophylla.

News of the Week.

FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN, ex-secretary of state, died in Newark, N. J., on the 20th, aged 68.

GENERAL GRANT has had his ups and downs during the past week, but his health on the whole is improving.

VICTOR HUGO died on the 21st inst., aged 82. While on his death-bed, he declined the proffered services of a priest.

ENGLAND continues making activ warlike preparations, but it is not known at what power they are directed.

RIEL, the rebel leader in the Northwest, is in the hands of the civil authorities. General Middleton is now paying his attention to the Indians.

FRED. DOUGLAS, the colored statesman, has taken a pew in the church at Washington where the president attends. He sits in a conspicuous place, and attracts much attention.

THE Rev. J. R. Reasoner, pastor of the first Presbyterian church at Collinsville, Ill., committed suicide, May 21st, by shooting himself through the temple while laboring under a temporary fit of insanity.

FATHER O'FLAHERTY, a priest of Syracuse, N. Y., started a sensation recently by reporting that two of his nephews had been abducted. At latest accounts it appears that the lads ran away to escape the cruelty of the priest.

LAST Sunday morning at Sand Lick, Raleigh county, W. Va., while a number of men were returning from the M. E. church quarterly meeting, a dispute arose on some church questions, in which R. C. Calloway was fatally stabbed.

BARTHOLDI'S colossal statue of Liberty is on its way to New York in the steamship Isere. The New York World has raised by subscription a fund of nearly $60,000 toward building the pedestal. The statue when erected will be 305 feet high.

SAMUEL NUTT, editor of the Spirit of Truth, an odd sort of religious paper published near Bloomington, Ill., died on the 21st. He believed that he had been commanded by the Lord to liv without eating for forty days. He died of starvation on the thirteenth day.

ROBERT EMMET ODLUM jumped from the Brooklyn Bridge, a hight of 140 feet, one day last week. He struck on his back and side, and died within an hour after being picked up. Odlum kept a swimming academy at Washington, D. C., and the jump was taken to advertise his business.

LOUIS FRANCOIS, a Frenchman, living in New York, strangled his wife one night last week, put her corpse in a bag, and started for the river with it. He was stopped by a policeman and lodged in jail. His wife was buried in Potter's Field. On going to prison Francois's first request was for a minister.

MISS ROSE ELIZABETH CLEVELAND, sister of the president, has written a book, the title of which is not yet decided upon. The papers hav published some extracts from advance sheets. Judging from these, the matter is mainly what goes under the head of religious slush. It is not worth reading.

AT a temperance meeting in this city on last Sunday the Hon. Neal Dow said that he intended to wipe out of existence the breweries and grog shops of the whole United States as they had been wiped out of Maine. He said that Maine had saved $24,000,000 under prohibition, and that there was not a pauper in the state.

RELIGIOUS services were held on Boston Common on Sunday, the 17th, which is against the law, and the leaders in the matter were arrested and placed under bonds to appear for trial. Last Sunday the offense was repeated, and the police took the names of those who participated. More arrests will probably follow, and the Supreme Court will pass upon the constitutionality of the ordinance forbidding preaching without a license.

How They Lie About Liberal!

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Please excuse the uncouth heading of this article. I would not use so harsh a heading, could I find a milder term to use without violating the rule to always use language befitting the subject of one's remarks. But I confess in this instance I am not a sufficient linguist to bring in use sufficiently strong terms to convey the feeling of contempt that I entertain for that poor, wizened soul, Clark Braden, who has published the citizens of Liberal, all along the line, as a most despicable set of wretches. We are placed in the light of designing oppressors and bigots, the people as serfs, the men as scapegraces, and our mothers, wives, and daughters, as walking evidences of impurity. There is not a social crime of which that wretch Braden has not accused us, and all of which hav found a willing and ready space in many of the leading journals of the country. You know the object of those libels as well as I do. The same loving (?) spirit of Christianity which is leveling its shafts of calumny and vile filth at the names of our loved mothers, faithful wives, and innocent daughters did the same thing away back in the dark days of the world, when the Christian religion ruled the state and destinies of man. Then the fagot-fire, torture, and the rack were suasiv arguments and heaven-inspired instruments to bring man to the knowledge of the efficacy of God's love for an erring world. His love has always been typified by the love of the big bear for the child when it was being hugged to death. If God is love and the minions of the church are his vicegerents, we would that we could hav less of his expressed affection for us.

If we do fail, if we are utterly crushed out (of which I entertain no fears in the world), we will hav established one thing in this the nineteenth century, and that is that the Christian religion is, as it always was, an implacable enemy to all forms of human freedom, unless it comes through the church, with the clergy as rulers and men as underlings, always ready to support them and their designs, even at the expense of their own manhood and better judgment. You can hear from all the pulpits of the land that the religion of Christ is not aggressiv in any sense of the term; that it is mild and forgiving, subduing the people through the spirit of kindness, as breathed upon the Christian heart by a loving savior. A bigger lie was never uttered than this old hackneyed jade of a stereotyped saying. They love you only to your destruction. When that will not catch you, their hypocritical pretensions are laid aside, and you and all your household, your friends, and your kinsmen are attacked in a manner that would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the hardest reprobate in the land. When the exigency of subduing a man or a people comes, they do not stop to measure terms or consider the rules of honorable opposition. When they decide upon the expediency of crushing a disbeliever, depend upon it it will be done, even if they hav to resort to an attack upon innocent schoolchildren, pure girls, and loving mothers, as they hav done in this the last onslaught on us.

They hav assaulted the citadel most violently; but let me tell you that we hav buried the white flag and raised the red one. We hav volunteered for the entire war, and by the eternal hills of justice, we will never let up until the vile thing lies cringing at our feet! We will never let up until the courts of the land vindicate us and condemn them.

If God made us, he did not use pliant mud in the making, for we never will yield to those vile scoundrels, and will never let them rest until we show to the world that Infidelity means manhood in its broadest and most comprehensiv sense.

We hav the scoundrel Braden now under arrest for criminal libel. Suits will follow of the Globe-Democrat, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette, Indianapolis Journal, Elmira Telegraph, and all other journals publishing the libels.

For the benefit of your inquiring readers, who do not know that Freethought means the highest type of humanity, I send you a few statements from official and Christian sources, that they may judge between Braden's libels and honest people's certificates. I could giv you a thousand such if necessary.

Liberal, Mo., May 14, 1885. G. H. Walser.

STATEMENTS FROM OFFICIALS AND CHRISTIANS REGARDING THE STANDING OF THE PEOPLE OF LIBERAL.

Liberal, Mo., May 12, 1885.

I hav read the article purporting to come from Clark Braden and published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and reproduced in the Indianapolis Journal, and I pronounce it a base libel on the people of Liberal. I am now living in Liberal. I hav lived here for about two years. I hav lived within three miles of this place for over eighteen years. I am a member of the Methodist church and a firm believer in the religion of the Bible and New Testament. I am acquainted with all the people of the town, and hav been acquainted with G. H. Walser for twenty-four years, and I know from my own knowledge that Mr. Walser is universally kind to all alike, both Christians and Liberals. No one has ever been oppressed here on account of his or her belief, on the part of Liberals. The people here are sober, kind, generous, and industrious. The females are pure in mind, in conduct, and in speech. There is not a disreputable character in town and never has been one to stay. There has been no case of feticide in the place to my knowledge, nor hav I hav I heard of such a thing. The young girls and young men are modest and well behaved. The hotel conducted by S. C. Thayer is as nice a house as can be found anywhere. There is less profanity among the people here than any town I was ever in. There is no place where a person can get intoxicants by the drink unless on a physician's prescription for medical purposes. I pronounce the article by Clark Braden a scandalous outrage and a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end. The above are facts.

Mary A. Lewis.

I was one of the first settlers in Liberal. I came here and bought property of Mr. Walser, and he knew that I was a Christian. I hav always been treated kindly by Mr. Walser and the people generally. I own the Opera House in Liberal. It cost me forty-five hundred dollars. The principal dances are held there, and no lewd women hav ever attended those dances. Those dances are always conducted decently and in order. The Liberals were not turned out of the hall for the non-payment of rent. M. Burgess.

I am a farmer and I liv one mile from Liberal. I bought my land from G. H. Walser, and I told him at the time I bought that I was a member of church. He remarked that that made no difference; that religion did not make a man a good man nor a bad man; that people should be judged according to their manly bearing and not from a religious standpoint. I am well acquainted with the people of Liberal, and I know them to be high-minded and honorable, a people who love virtue and hate vice in all its forms. Without an exception they are all temperate, and fully four-fifths abstain from the use of tobacco. Their morality equals that of any people I ever knew. No man or woman is ever molested on account of their belief. When differences hav arisen, they hav always grown out of an infringement of their rights as citizens and not on account of religion. There are many church people in Liberal, and they are all kindly treated.

George F. Nelson.

Lamar, Mo.

I am a minister of the gospel in the Freewill Baptist church. I am well acquainted with G. H. Walser; he has lived in this city and county for many years, and he has always enjoyed the esteem and respect of those who hav known him: his best friends are those who hav known him the longest. I am also acquainted with the people of Liberal, and taking out their skepticism they are as worthy the respect of the world as any people I know of, or hav ever known. Infidels as they are as to the teachings of the Bible, they hav done what Christian communities in this country hav failed in doing, in keeping saloons and places of intoxication out of their town. To this extent Christian towns could well take pattern of Liberal. I do not believe that Christianity requires such services as those of Clark Braden in this respect. John A. Pool.

Lamar, Mo., May 13, 1885.

To all whom it may concern: Having read in the public prints an interview regarding the people, I will say I hav many times visited said town, and am acquainted with a number of its residents. While there I hav always been treated with respect and kindness. While not in sympathy with them on religious matters, I hav failed to see practiced any of the immoralities spoken of in said interview, the conduct of the people being the same as in other places, so far as my observation extends.

With Mr. Walser I hav had business relations for many years, and hav always found him prompt and reliable in all transactions. R. P. Smith,

Treasurer of Barton county, Mo.

Lamar, Mo., May 13, 1885.

We are acquainted with G. H. Walser, of Liberal, and with the citizens of that place generally, and from our own knowledge of that people, we know them to be good and respectable in every sense that it takes to make up good citizenship. They are as pure-minded, well-behaved, and as worthy the esteem of the world as any people in the country, and we pronounce the charges made against the citizens of Liberal by Clark Braden, as published in the Post-Dispatch, as infamously false. W. L. Mack, Circuit Clerk.

B. B. Boston, Deputy Sheriff.

S. P. Finley, Sheriff.

G. F. Burkhart, Recorder of Deeds.

Barton Co., Mo.

I am deputy sheriff of Barton Co., Mo., and, as such officer, I arrested Clark Braden last March on a warrant issued by the governor of the state of Missouri, in compliance with a requisition from the governor of Nebraska on the governor of Missouri, as a fugitiv from justice. I turned Braden over to Sheriff Lane, who took him back to Wilber, Nebraska, to answer to an indictment for felony. He is now on bail here for criminal libel. I arrested him for that crime last Friday, May 8, 1885. B. B. Boston, Deputy Sheriff.

The indictment was quashed because it was inartfully drawn, and the lamb skipped out before another one could be found. Walser.

One View of Shakspere.

One view of Shakspere's works is this: he does not portray character to be understood as individualities, but as portions of the whole human race, strata or currents in nature's vast ocean.

Thus in Hamlet we hav the "infirm of purpose." Informed by the ghost that his suspicions were right, satisfying himself by the mock play, exercising caution, enjoining secrecy on others, nerving himself up to a high pitch, and swearing recenge—just let the reader see what he has to say of himself—and then fails in all, or by mere chance accomplishing his object, by sacrificing his own life.

So it is with all his characters—merely types running through life. See Macbeth—unalloyed allegiance until "vaulting ambition o'erleaps itself."

See Othello—what a brave and loving husband until "trifles light as air" transformed him into an incarnate fiend! See Coriolanus, "the noblest Roman of them all" until domestic ties and filial affection seduced him; and Lear—what a noble "head and front" until troubles accumulated and reason was dethroned! And so on through the whole catalog of different phases.

How often do we say—or could say if we were observing—"There goes Poor Tom," or, "There goes Horatio, 'as just a man as enemy coped withal,'" and so on ad infinitum.

Persons going to the theater should not go to see Shakspere's pieces merely as a pastime, but for instruction, to see nature's "store unrolled." By this means they would derive both pleasure and profit, and on every step of their road would find > "Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, > Sermons in stones, and good in everything."

Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Female Suffrage.

There is no woman in this century who more entirely commands the public respect for the grand virtues of her character than Mrs Stanton. But yet she is not the embodiment of all wisdom, as is shown in her course in regard to woman suffrage. The greatest, and, I may say, the only obstacle in the way of securing for women their proper place in society, and endowing them with the right of suffrage, is the women themselvs. If the population of the country be fifty millions, then there are twenty-five millions of women. Of these there is only a comparativ handful who hav any desire to vote. Even in the educated class, not one woman in a hundred, or perhaps in a thousand, feels herself wronged in being denied the suffrage. So far from this, some of this class hav recently astonished the public by petitioning the legislature not to grant this privilege, either to themselvs or others of their sex.

Now, wisdom is the adaptation of means to ends. And the most enthusiastic and persevering use of means to accomplish the most desirable of ends is all love's labor lost unless the means are judiciously chosen. The state of Massachusetts, in seeking, some years ago, an outlet for her manufacturing industries, and an inlet to the productions of the West, found a mountain in the way of her enterprise. What did she do? Whine about it, and establish prayer-meetings asking the Lord either to remove it himself or else strengthen the faith of the saints so that they could uproot it and cast it into the sea? No; she tunneled the mountain, removing the rocky obstacles with the most powerful explosivs, at the expense of millions of money and years of time and labor. This was the first thing to be done. This was a wise adjustment of means to ends. After this, as was foreseen, everything in the way of commercial prosperity came to her, naturally and necessarily.

Look at the job which Mrs. Stanton and her noble coadjutors hav had in hand for a quarter of a century. They wish to place the ballot in the hands of twenty-five millions of women in this country, believing that the beneficent consequences of such a policy would show themselvs in many ways, first, on the women themselvs, and secondly, in promoting the well being of the republic as a state. But a mountain of rock stands in their pathway. It is not the selfishness of the male sex and their lack of courtesy to the women that confines the suffrage to themselvs; for these women are our mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters, and the moment they, as a class—not a mere handful of them—signify their desire to be enfranchised, the legislature will promptly comply with their wishes. But the fact is undeniable that the women themselvs do not wish the privilege. This is the great trouble. What! An oppressed class of intelligent human beings who do not wish to be relieved of their oppression? Why, the dumb-driven negroes of the South were so tired of their bondage that they ran away from it as soon as they found out that the North Star hung over a land of freedom. How comes it to pass, then, that twenty-five millions of women seem to hug their chains and take no steps, because they hav no desire, to secure their freedom? It is because the church and its religion dominate in this nation, and both are opposed on principle to the liberation of the female sex, either politically or socially. For eighteen hundred years women hav been under the harrow of the church, and of the civil laws dictated by the church, until their subjection has become an inherited instinct. Paul the Apostle, whom she has been taught to regard as divinely inspired, blames the introduction of sin, death, and sorrow into the world on woman. He silenc s her voice in the church on this account, and enjoins the most absolute submission on her, in a department where, according to the theory, she has a soul to be saved as precious as that of her brother. Even in the holy relationship of love and marriage, woman, in the capacity of wife, according to Paul's teachings, is only a private prostitute, bound by law, unlike public prostitutes, to submit, sexually, to her husband's will at all times and under all circumstances. Instead of firing her soul with resentment and self-respect, these barbarous ideas hav been dinned into her ears for so many ages, and the laws made in consonance with them hav so long been enforced, that no wonder she feels, as if by instinct, that subjection to man is her duty, as it has for ages been her lot.

No one knows better than Mrs. Stanton and her colleagues that these things are true. Yet old age is overtaking them, and the cause to which they hav devoted their lives is not much further advanced to-day than it was when they began their self-denying work. What is the reason of this humiliating failure? It is because they hav been laboring unwisely, as much so as it would be to put the cart before, instead of behind, the horse, and expect him to go. Mrs. Stanton knows, and has been goaded lately to say it aloud, that it is the church, with her priesthood and her holy books, which, through the law, degrades woman on principle; and the great error of her life was that she did not begin this work of reform by making war, first and foremost, upon the power and prestige of this organization, instead of losing thirty years of time in waiting to see whether the Ethiopian would not change his skin, and the leopard his spots, of their own account. As there is many an ailment in the human body which defies all local and specific treatment, but which disappears entirely when the the general health of the person is established, so woman's rights, in all their departments, political, social, and otherwise, will adjust themselvs properly and without friction as soon as ever the people come to their senses and throw off the degrading superstitions of the church. But as long as this organization exercises its ghostly dominion over the human intellect and conscience, with its false standards of truth and duty, so long will reform of all kinds be hamstrung. The strength of the church to-day, next to her complete organization and command of wealth, consists in the women, who are besotted with the namby-pamby emotionalities called piety, on which such men as Moody and Sankey play as if on an organ. These, for the sake of society, influence their husbands and sons to go sometimes to church and to contribute to the funds. If, perchance, a woman, escaping for a while from the stupefying influence of the church, and coming to feel that she has rights which are not respected by the laws, is inclined to ask for them, she is met by her religious teacher with a "Thus saith the Lord," which remands her to silence and submission at the peril of being called an Infidel, and risking her soul's salvation.

More than twenty years ago the writer of this article, at the request of a certain Female Suffrage Society, delivered an address to the public, in which he traced the dependent and degraded condition of woman to the Pauline writings of the New Testament, and contrasted them with the teachings of Jesus, who, in regard to marriage, said, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife," instead of a woman leaving father and mother and cleaving to her husband, taking with her name, fortune, and happiness, to be at his disposal. But the clergy took the alarm, and intimated that the lecturer was tinged with Infidelity, and the dear, good women, "belonging" as they did to the church, and who for years had been toiling, like the fabled Sisyphus, waiting and expecting the church to giv her powerful influence in favor of this reform, are laboring, and waiting, and expecting still. No, woman will never hav the place in society for which she is fitted and designed by nature until the authority of the church is completely destroyed among men. This colossal organization stands in the path of human progress like a mountain. We cannot go around it, nor under it, nor over it, with our best engineering. But we can blow it to pieces with the dynamite of science, logic, and ridicule. And if Mrs. Stanton and her fellow-suffragists had acted on this principle during the last twenty-five years, there is no telling how near we might now be to the realization of their hopes in regard to the legal status of their sex.

I hav mentioned ridicule as one of the weapons of our warfare against the church superstitions. Now, I admit that ridicule has no effect whatever in demolishing a truth which is established as such by facts and reason; but it is omnipotent in destroying absurdities and superstitions like those on which the church swindle is mainly based. We hav had in our own day an illustration of this fact. When Darwin announced his grand theory of Evolution, the milksops of the pulpit in England and this country, to keep on the sunny side of the ignorant people, loaded their little pop-guns with ridicule, saying to every Darwinian they met: "So, you hav come to believe that your grandfather was a monkey." This feeble attempt at wit was kept up, as we all know, for many years. But when Darwin died the very churchmen themselvs sang him to his grave in Westminster Abbey, although his writings, in which the words church and religion were scarcely used at all, hav done as much, if not more, to undermine the popular religion, and sweep it from the earth, as those of any other writer, living or dead.

Some good Radicals, whose breath still smells of the onions and the garlic which was their chief diet in the land of Egypt and the house of bondage, don't approve of the use of ridicule which Colonel Ingersoll makes in his lectures. They would rather he would treat the theology of the church in a more solemn and reverential manner, and argue against instead of making fun of these dogmas sanctified by the belief of ages. But how would you go about arguing with a churchman against the fundamental doctrin of his creed—the tri-personality of the God-head—which teaches that a child may be as old as his father, nay, may actually beget his own father, as the Eternal Son, conjointly with the Eternal Father in the Trinity, begat the Holy Ghost, which Holy Ghost begat the Eternal Son on the body of the Virgin Mary, which son was born 1,884 years ago on the 25th day of last December? How could you frame an argument to reach the intellect of a Catholic who believes that a wafer of bread in the sacrament of the mass is transmuted into the body, blood, and divinity of Jesus Christ, so that a congregation of a thousand persons hav, each one of them, the eternal God manifest in the flesh in his stomach, undergoing the process of digestion with his cabbage and potatoes? Such stupendous absurdities of creed cannot be touched by sober argument. Ridicule is the only weapon that can find the vital spot. The medieval tomfoolery of chivalry and knight-errantry, sanctified as it was by the church, might hav held its sway to the present time had not Cervantes, in his "Don Quixote," laughed it out of existence.

Colonel Ingersoll has his equals in logic, but he has no equal, either in this country or Europe, in the skilfulness with which he uses the legitimate weapon of ridicule. No man born of woman, who has the least twinkle of fun in his nature, can hear Ingersoll ridicule one of the church superstitions and ever get over it. For it may be set down as a fact that when a man is compelled to laugh at the absurdity of his religion he has taken a long step toward its rejection altogether, for, "nulla vestigia retrossum." Such a man may leave the audience, swearing between his chuckles at the "blasphemy" of the lecturer, but after he cools off and reflects, he will be convinced that no power in heaven or earth could be so unreasonable as to require him to do violence to his own intellect by believing a manifest absurdity.

It is useless to mourn any longer over the waste of time and influence which the cause of woman has suffered from the unwisdom of the female suffragists It would be like crying over spilt milk. But it seems proper to say to those women just coming on the stage of public life, with aspirations to improve the condition of their sex, that the first thing to be done in the way of securing that object is to destroy the malign influence of the church in human affairs. After her authority is gone, and with it the authority of the Bible as a plenarily inspired revelation from heaven—which authority the Bible itself does not claim—woman naturally, and without any further contest, will take the place in society for which she is so eminently fitted by nature, and where she will be a lasting blessing to her race. Our London Letter.

In the hard struggle for existence the clergy, like other tradespeople, find it highly necessary to move with the times, and frequently introduce novelties in the wares they sell, unless they are content to shut up shop. Their goods are not worth much at any time, and are dear at any price, but as the sellers inform the public that no home is complete without their celebrated "faith," and advertise the article so largely, there are still found plenty of simple-minded folk who believe in goods bought at the gospel shops. If it were not for those who possess more money than sense, and who back the dealers up so largely, the whole swindle would be broken up. It puts one very much in mind of certain notorious mining companies continually being introduced here, and where the mines are in some extremely remote corner of the earth, where the prospectiv shareholders are never likely to go in search of them; calls are always being made with a view of introducing new machinery, and the miners are invariably closely approaching a very rich lode, which generally, however, they never succeed in reaching. In reading the report of the missionary meetings at Exeter Hall during the present, I find the same thread running through all of them. The poor benighted heathens are just on the point of being converted wholesale, but more missionaries, and, of course, the means to support them in luxury, are wanted, and when the necessary funds are collected, the subscribers will see what will be done—and the same tale is related year by year, and the gulls continue paying up the calls, and thus the merry game goes on. I find in one case it was stated that the only missionary who was in the district (somewhere in China) had no doubt he could easily bring over the nativs to the only true religion if he understood their language, or they understood his, and therefore the promoters of the scheme thought that money ought to be subscribed to send out to his assistance a few more missionaries. Perhaps they were under the impression that if half a dozen of them all talked together the heathen Chinee might better be able to arrive at their meaning. It was satisfactory to know that a vast number of Bibles and tracts had been sent out, but it was not stated in what language they were printed, though if the paper was good enough to be made in papier mache, no doubt that would be no obstacle to the distribution of this class of literature.

The ingenious little dodge of endeavoring to prove that science and theology are very closely allied, after having subsided for a time, is being renewed, and fresh scientific theologians are coming into the field.

A recent writer on the subject claims to show that "so far from any established discoveries of science being fatal, or even hostil, to a reasonable theology, such a theology may be inferentially founded upon them; and that, indeed, the highest use of our knowledge of the physical order is to force us to the acknowledgment of a spiritual order, the former being, as it were, the visible and tangible representativ of the latter"—very pretty reading, and no doubt perfectly intelligible and convincing to the anthor, and a sentence like that looks as though the author was very learned. I don't think I shall purchase the work, neither should I be inclined to read it even if I had the precious volume presented to me. I hav been decoyed into reading similar works, and find they are generally such very dreary compilations that they can only be recommended in cases of insomnia, but even then they should be taken cautiously, or the remedy may prove worse than the disease.

The theory of evolution, as expounded by Darwin, and elaborated by other writers, will never be overthrown by the puny efforts of the greatest theologian in existence. It is quite as well, however, that these attacks should be made, as the truths of science are never injured by the mud thrown by theologians, but, strangely enough, only stand out all the clearer in consequence. Shakspere—Bacon.

"Holt" does not "depreciate Bacon" as a writer. There are some very fine expressions in the Essays. But one will search in vain through all Bacon's works for those words and peculiar combinations of words characteristic of Shakspere, and never so used before by any other English writer. It is improbable that Bacon ever read Shakspere, else he must hav quoted occasionally, as he was in the habit of quoting. These expressions, "mark now," "topful of," "sans reproach," "flat perjury," "all sorts," "as who should say," "sky-aspiring," "eagle-winged," "fantastic summer," "braying," "harsh-resounding," "deep-mouthed," "mind's eye," "hell-pains," "loud churlish drum," "wavering many," "fond many," "candied," "an' 'twere," "purge away," "steaming time," "mure," "margents," "rondure," "blench," "deracinate," "neglection," etc., etc., or kindred ones, found on every page of Shakspere, we look for in vain on Bacon's pages. (Shakspere's errors of ignorance were impossible to Bacon.) Writing on so many subjects, and so many letters to private friends, he must hav dropped some of these expressions; sometime the mask must hav fallen.

One might suspect, from their comments, that some of Bacon's admirers regard him as the author of Reasoning. But there is nothing said on the subject by him which had not been said hundreds of years before by Roger Bacon. Indeed, Francis Bacon, without scruple, took the very best ideas of the "Opus Majus," "Opus Minus," and "Compend. Studii," of Roger. The "Four Idols" of Francis are the "Four Hindrances" of Roger; the "Experiments" of one are the "Experience" of the other; the "Antiquity is the Youth of the World" of the former is the "Juniors of Times the Heirs of Predecessors" of the latter; "Novum Organon" is due to "Opus Majus;" so is "Advancement of Learning" to "Compend. Studii," etc.

Francis clearly took many of his best ideas from Roger and improved on them, as the advantages of his later time permitted. Who knows from whom Roger derived them, or cares? It is not he who first says, but he who says it so loud, so long, he compels a hearing, deserves the praise.

But yet, Francis might as well hav given old Roger a little credit, instead of a sneer. No, indeed! Our Bacon was not so generous of fame as to let immortality gather around unworthy brows for his work. He loved plaudits as well as ducats. He was a very great man; but when the commissioned officers dissapear the ranks always supply those who grandly fill their places. He was not a poet. In all candor let it be submitted as to those "Psalms" of his, had they been published last year as the work of some gifted, sky-aspiring youth out West, they would hardly elicit such admiration as they do from my critical friend. HOLT.

ALL recognized truths once rested, solitary and alone, in some one brain. Truth is born an acorn, not an oak. The Rev. Sydney Smith once said that there was a kind of men into whom you could not introduce a new idea without a surgical operation. He might hav added that, when you had once forced an idea into the head of such a man, you could not deliver him of it without instruments. The conservatism of unthinkingness is one of the potential forces of the world. It lies athwart the progress of mankind like a colossal mountain-chain, chilling the atmosphere on both sides of it for a thousand miles. The Hannibal who would reach the eternal city of truth on the other side of these Alps must fight his way over ice and hew his way through rocks.—Ignatius Donnelly in "Ragnarok."

The Liberal Club.

On the evening of Friday, May 23d, was held, at 220 East Fifteenth street, the Three Hundred and Eightieth Regular Meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. What shall be said of it, and how shall this feeble though expensiv stylographic pen do justice to the occasion? As the man with the badgepin shed the light of his torch on Treasurer Morris, and a ten-cent piece upon the table, President Wakeman was reading notices of other meetings which were to be held in divers parts of the city. These having been got along with, he said he would go through the usual formula of saying that he had the pleasure as well as the honor of introducing as the speaker of the evening Mr. Hermon H. Shook, of the New York bar. Mr. Shook, he said, was one of the few Christians who hav at all times clung to the hope that the members of the club would finally be saved. He then indicated to the lecturer that he might let her go.

As Mr. Shook approached the front of the platform and threw back his shoulders, the audience clapped their hands in token of welcome. A map of Australia hung behind him on the wall, but it had no connection with the lecture, except that Australia is away off. Mr. Shook said he should be false to his own feelings if he did not express his appreciation of the kindness of the Liberal Club towards him, and it was not because of any lack of interest in the topics there discussed that he had absented himself. The club was designed to giv everybody a hearing, and in his case that principle had never been violated. He inquired of the audience what was the condition of their minds. As for himself, he did not feel as pugilistic as he used to when he came there regularly. He had lost some of the war fever then prevalent. He perceived we were to hav a lecture on "Why Are We Liberals?" He knew a young man who became a Liberal because he was left at a Sunday-school election. Mr. Shook took for the text of his lecture, which, he said, would be something of a sermon, the words of Job v, 13: "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness." From this he approached, by easy stages, the subject of his lecture, which was "Wisdom Traps." It took forty-five minutes for him to accomplish this. Wisdom traps were defined as traps which people get into through fooling with the unknowable. Those who called themselves Rationalists fell into the trap when they showed that revelation could not be reasoned upon, because that proved exactly what revelation claimed for itself. Then, again, disbelievers in God and worshipers of nature put their foot in it. No man (and here Mr. Shook spoke very solemnly) could gaze upon nature without looking up to nature's God. Evolution, the speaker said, corroborated Genesis, and so did geology, though he would not stop to giv the details.

The lecture continued a good hour, and was not especially condensed or of absorbing interest. Most of the arguments were hopeless "chestnuts," and the pleasantries had been in the past tense for several generations.

President Wakeman said that those who wished to discuss the subject would now be given an opportunity in speeches of ten minutes each.

Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, protagonist, described himself as a Methodist with modern improvements. He was grateful to the lecturer for admitting that revelation could not be reasoned upon, because that was an admission that revelation was irrational. There was one class of Freethinkers whom he liked to see curried down with a brick, as Mr. Shook had done. Dr. Weeks then went on to examin other arguments, and walloped the lecturer until his ten minutes were up.

Mr. McLeod next ascended the steps to the platform. He is a tall person, and waves about somewhat like a tree in the wind. He made a good speech, however, mainly devoted to the phrenological aspect of things. Casually he paid a high compliment to the great moral beauty of Mr. Shook's character as indicated by his dome of intellect.

Mr. Wakeman, by request, ran over the lecture briefly, touching upon the questions of evolution, Christ, and other religious and scientific conundrums. He thought it probable that there never was a historical Christ, as data as to his identity, nativity, and age were altogether absent. This did not exclude us from believing in an ideal Christ. We were not fallen angels, in Mr. Wakeman's opinion, but rising men and women.

Mr. Cohen said as some remarks about the people of his race, the Hebrews, had been made, he would add something himself. The Jews, he said, did not believe in Christ, because their God declared himself to be the only duly authorized god, all the rest being but base imitations, and when this other fellow came along and claimed to be God also, they very naturally doubted his veracity. But they gave him a show. When about to crucify him they told him if he was God he would be allowed to prove it by helping himself if he could. This was, said Mr. Cohen, the greatest opportunity of his life to convert the Jews. He did not do it, and the opportunity was lost forever. Mr. Cohen's was one of the best speeches of the evening, and in the matter of forcible expression there was nothing like it.

Mr. Furbish corrected the lecturer of the evening. According to the revised Bible the text should read, "He excels the wise in their craftiness." That put another aspect on it. Mr. Shook, said the speaker, has made a mistake in bringing religion to the Liberal Club. There is more here of true religion to the square inch than in any church in New York.

Dr. Foote, Jr., recommended that those desirous of reaching a right conclusion as to whether evolution and geology corroborated Genesis or not should read the works of Professor Draper. These would throw much light upon the subject. The doctor did not seem to be in the best of spirits. There appeared to hav been none of the environments furnished necessary to a pun, and therefore, though he made a consecutiv and systematic series of remarks, it cannot be said that he did himself full justice.

Mr. Shook, in summing up, claimed that none of his arguments had been answered. All the critics had criticised Christianity, which it had not been his object to defend. This declaration left his hearers in immense doubt as to the purpose of the lecture. It is no very flattering commentary on the perspicuity of the speaker that so many intelligent persons should hav misunderstood him. Nevertheless, the meeting was an interesting one and will be looked back to, so to speak, as something beautiful not elsewhere met with in the routine of this world.

Madam Delescluze was present, and apparently enjoyed the lecture very much, though she refrained from taking the platform, much to the writer's regret. It is appropriate here to append the following explanation which was handed in to the TRUTH SEEKER office during the week. It is evident that the scribe, in admiring the charming address of the lady, made some mistake in reporting her remarks. By the way, the reporter is not the author of the able spring poem alluded to:

THE WORDS OF MME. DELESCLUZE AT THE LIBERAL CLUB.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There is much to be pardoned to poets, particularly when they are possessed by the fine frenzy necessary to produce such good poetry as that which heads the report of the proceedings of the Liberal Club on the eve of the 8th inst., when Mr. Shevitch, of the Volks Zeitung, was the lecturer. I occupied the platform a short time on that occasion, criticising some of the statements of the speaker, but surely your poetical reporter must hav been "in the clouds" studying the harmonies of rhyme and rhythm to be introduced into his musical description of the "coming spring," otherwise, as a seeker after truth, he could not hav so entirely misunderstood my words and their meaning. As one must sometimes go to a neighbor's house to find out what takes place in one's own, so we must sometimes look into the newspapers to discover what we hav thought or said. It was a great surprise to me to read that I "accused" anybody of being a foreigner. My husband was a foreigner—a Frenchman—and since his death, six years ago, I hav lived in the one house with foreigners—Germans, and Freethinkers at that—and always on the friendliest terms.

Pray, Mr. Editor, entreat your poetical scribe to leave those absorbing young ladies, the muses, out in the vestibule the next time he visits the Liberal Club. Then, perhaps, he may giv some attention to mere prose. Believe me, sir,

Very truly yours, ELIZABETH M. DELESCLUZE.

At the next meeting, which is the last for the season, Mr. George Krahmer speaks on "Why Are We Liberals?"

Information Wanted.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER for Nov. 22, 1884, p. 741, the following notice appeared:

"Geo. Jepson, Smithfield, L. I., N. Y.: We hav fifty-one members; fifty take activ interest. We hav a League library, and free use of good hall."

Since that date I hav written to the said Geo. Jepson at Smithfield, at Smithtown, and at Smithville, and in every instance the postmasters hav returned to me my letters, stating that Jepson could not be found. I hav also been out on the Island about seventy miles from New York city, with the purpose of purchasing a home near the place where that flourishing League is located. I made extensiv inquiry in every village and hamlet that I visited concerning a League, but I am sorry to say that I was not able to find any person who had ever before heard of Geo. Jepson, or of a League now in existence on Long Island. A League of fifty-one members should let its light beam forth, so that an itinerating inquirer after truth could find congenial spirits. If any reader can giv information concerning the League alluded to, I hope he will notify us through THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I wish to locate on Long Island near that League. ESS. E. TEE.

Let the League be Up and Doing.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you allow me space to call the attention of Liberals to the fact that a state Convention has been called for the first Monday in June next, to revise our constitution, and to suggest that thousands of Liberal papers, tracts, etc., should be distributed throughout the state, the state thoroughly canvassed, and the convention besieged during its session in order that a Liberal constitution may be assured.

Another such opportunity may never present itself, and the matter, in my opinion, is of the first importance.

At least two good lecturers should enter the state, at Fernandina, one go directly through to Pensacola, the other up the St. John's to Sanford, and thence to the Convention. There is no time to delay.

Alva, Fla. J. L. BARKER.

The Bruno Statue.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since the last announcement I hav received the following subscriptions for the Bruno Statue to be erected at Rome:

Previously acknowledged,	$126.65
Mrs. E. L. Rose, London, per J. P Mendum,	24.33
Charles Eckhard,	10.00
Walter W. Conley,	1.00
Theodore Evert,	1.00
Jonathan Nichols,	1.00
Isaac Slenker,	1.00
H. Beichling,	.50
Total,	165.48

I hav also received from the committee at Rome the papers which they stated they had sent to me in their letter lately printed in your paper with their authorization to me to receive subscriptions.

These papers are very satisfactory. The print of the statue discloses a noble work of art; a colossal bronze figure of the martyr on a pedestal which givs it a very impressiv elevation. The letters of approval from the leading Freethinkers fully sustain the movement. Among those names are Victor Hugo, Herbert Spencer, Ernst Haeckel, E. Castelar, and hundreds who represent all shades of Liberalism in Europe.

How much this statue will cost, and how much ought America to contribute, are the only remaining questions, which I hope soon to be able to answer. I will remit the funds I hav received on the first of June next. Those who desire to be among the first to contribute to this "Act of Reparation" of an "Act of Faith," will send at once to

T. B. WAKEMAN, Authorized Agent.

Satan Can't Stand Codfish Liver.

The belief in a devil has drenched the earth with blood and tears. It has filled men and women with fear, till they hav fallen upon their knees and cried aloud for help. And the people hav been so badly frightened as to cause them to keep constantly in the field a great army of professional devil-fighters.

These priests never hav made any attempt to kill, but always hav been satisfied to fight the old fellow with prayer, but somehow, in spite of all of their tears and prayers, the old fellow, as said, still continues his work, and is like to get the most of us. In all ages of the world there hav been men who professed to hav great influence with ghosts, and who pretended to know just how to manage and what to do to scare the old fellow and drive him away.

For the benefit of the clergy I will giv an old receipt for driving the devil out of the country. I find it in the Catholic Bible, in the book of Tobit. It reads, "Thou shalt take the ashes of perfume, and shalt lay upon them some of the heart and liver of the fish, and shalt make a smoke with it. And the devil shall smell it, and flee away, and never come again any more" (Tobit vi, 16, 17). Let us hope the clergy will profit by the above advice, and if there is a devil drive him far away. M. BABCOCK.

NOTICE TO FRIENDS OF LIBERAL: Please giv me names of all persons kept away from Liberal on account of the libels of Clark Braden and the paper containing the charges. I am going to sue them all.

[3122] Liberal, Mo. G. H. WALSER.

AGITATORS PUBLIC BENEFACTORS.—The great enemy of knowledge is not error, but inertness. All that we want is discussion, and then we are sure to do well, no matter what our blunders may be. One error conflicts with another; each destroys its opponent, and the truth is evolved. This is the course of the human mind, and it is from this point of view that the authors of new ideas, the proposers of new contrivances, and the originators of new heresies are benefactors of their species. Whether they are right or wrong is the least part of the question. They tend to excite the mind; they open up the faculties; they stimulate us to fresh inquiry; they place old subjects under new aspects; they disturb the public sloth.—Buckle.

THEY learn nothing there but to believe: First to believe that others know that which they know not; and after that themselvs to know that which they know not.—Lord Bacon on Colleges.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS H. S. LAKE spoke at Kalamazoo, Mich., May 3d; at Vicksburg 9th and 10th, and Grand Rapids the 17th; returning to Ottumwa, Iowa, for the 24th and 31st. She goes East in June, to begin a course of Sunday meetings at Watertown, N. Y. Parties wishing to arrange for grove meetings will address her at 12 High st., Watertown, N. Y.

W. F. JAMIESON will now accept calls for lectures, and will attend grove meetings. Address him at Lake City, Minn.

The National Liberal League.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, President.

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, 33 Clinton Pl., New York.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain. A. C. MACDONALD,

Chairman of the Finance Committee.

News and Notes from the Field.

M. L. Dey has done a good work in breaking the ground at Springport, Mich. The lectures were eminently successful. The Opera House was filled both evenings, and they who had never listened to the doctrins of Liberalism before found that there was something new in the world, and also something more true than they had ever listened to before.

Mr. Dey has been a sturdy Liberal in this community for years and has alwa s openly maintained his convictions. He has held important offices in the township, and has the thorough respect of his neighbors, although some of them are in the orthodox fold. Sometimes the clergymen get scandalized at the awful Infidelity of Mr. Dey and endeavor to defeat him at the polls with all the instrumentalities of "Christian charity," but he is invariably elected by a triumphant majority, and the churches are obliged to admit that so far as this world is concerned the Infidel is ahead. Their only consolation is that he will never hav an opportunity to play upon the golden harp. Well, so long as we can make music here we will not trouble ourselvs about the hereafter.

We did hav music at Springport. Porter's brass band gave us a good welcome and smoothed the way for our iconoclastic blow. Thus the muses are beginning to array themselvs on our side, and the rugged way of the pioneer is beginning to be adorned with flowers.

C. B. Reynolds was with us also and aided in the success of the meetings. He remains to carry on the work, lecturing at Duck Lake twice on Sunday and once at Springport, making a Sabbath day's journey of twenty or twenty-five miles, which is far ahead of what the ancient Jews undertook to do. Whatever the chairman of the executiv committee does he does with might and main. The splendid list of representativs which he has chosen in the several states shows that he has not been idle, and his letter to them is a valuable contribution to the better understanding of the great work that lies before us. I hav no doubt there will be a cordial response all over the country and that at the next Congress we shall hav enlarged and better methods for the promulgation and organization of Freethought.

The formation of an auxiliary society was initiated at Springport, and under the inspiration of Mr. Reynolds's continued labors no doubt a successful League will be instituted. There is a vast Liberal element throughout this section, especially among the farmers, and under the able leadership of Mr. Dey and others this element will become a power in the community, not simply to modify the churches but to create independently a nobler civilization.

From Springport we went to Auburn, Ind., and found here the amplest encouragement. The Court House was packed for two evenings. Friends came from a distance of twenty miles to attend. These were the first Freethought lectures in the place, but the community was ripe for them. W. H. Rakestraw is the leading spirit in this movement, and its brilliant success shows the ability and energy which he puts into the cause. His brother, Samuel Rakestraw, John Leasure, H. R. Heberling, J. J. Van Auken, temporary secretary of the auxiliary League, and others are valuable co-workers. Over twenty names were subscribed for the new society, and without doubt one hundred names will soon be enrolled, and we shall hav here one of the most prominent Freethought organizations in the country. I look forward with great interest to the constructiv work which it will accomplish in the spirit of human brotherhood and social progress, showing by actual achievement that the new is better than the old.

The marked development of Liberalism in some places is simply astonishing. In communities like that of Auburn and vicinity, where no open endeavor has ever been made for the advancement of Freethought, the moment the living word is spoken it is responded to by hundreds who almost unconsciously hav drifted in the forward direction. This shows the spirit of the age and the immense promis of our work; that it is the evolution of human growth; that it is not thought only, but life, and springs from human hope and aspiration; it satisfies a mighty hunger for something more beautiful and more noble than the world has ever yet enjoyed.

The Auburn string band furnished music for both our meetings, and added much to the pleasure of the occasion. The audiences were among the most refined and intelligent that we ever addressed. In every respect the meetings were well arranged.

We had the pleasure of meeting E. R. Shoemaker, of Waterloo, Ind., Dr. Morse and his wife, of Angola, Ind., and other friends good and true in the Freethought ranks, whose presence was a delight to our pilgrim journey.

From Auburn, Ind., we went to Sturgis, Mich., where we mingled with some of our Spiritualistic friends, whose delectation of another world does not make them any the less sturdy in their use and enjoyment of this. I always like to meet with these wise and comfortable believers in the glory of hereafter. So long as immortality is a vague, transcendent hope it is intensely fascinating; I only object to its formulation into an iron creed as a test of fellowship—as a standard by which to labor.

"It is not endlessness high natures prize,
But the rich fulness of all faculties."

It is the kind, not the quantity of life we hav, that crowns us with supreme bliss; it is not mere existence that the human heart longs for, but wealth, grandeur, and beauty of existence; it is that each moment shall be a sparkling jewel and not a mere breath.

All the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the Thurstons, who hav done such faithful service through many years for liberty. It was by invitation of A. H. Thurston that we came to Sturgis. We would like to hav gone to the big farm which has been so long the home of Freethought, and reveled a day or two in the delights of nature and forgotten everything of care in the sunshine and glory of spring. Indeed, I felt very much like that remarkable scripture character, Nebuchadnezzar—I did want to go to grass; I wanted to see it, lie down upon it, and be thrilled by the electric pulse of earth while gazing upon the infinit blue of heaven. However, business prevented and we could not accept the kind invitation of our friends. We hope to do so in the future. We were obliged to stick to our dusty way and follow the music of the smoking locomotiv, catching now and then glimpses of the fresh magnificence of this birth of the world in tree and flower, in winding meadow and sunny hill-side, in beauteous grove and sparkling stream, in the soft, luminous horizon that seemed ever opening into new pictures of delight and enchantment.

N. G. Watkins, favorably known to readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers as an earnest writer, was also at Sturgis, and we were glad to make the acquaintance of so genial and sturdy a reformer.

From Sturgis we went to Angola, where Dr. Morse, a veteran in the cause, a worker for more than half a century in the field of Liberal thought, had made arrangements for a lecture. The attendance on Tuesday evening was very good. Angola and the neighboring country can boast of a large and influential Liberal element. Many lecturers hav been here before, and the ground has been well cultivated. It was a great pleasure to meet with such a generous and devoted Liberal as Dr. Morse, and also with his amiable wife, an ardent Freethinker and supporter of Secular philosophy.

Important business has compelled Mr. Watts and myself to forego all lecture engagements for this season, and adjourn until fall. I hav not been able as yet to answer many letters which I hav received while busy in the campaign, but now that I am again in New York I shall endeavor to communicate with friends, and, in the way of correspondence, keep up the growing fellowship of our cause. I shall lecture in and about New York during the summer months; work for the success of the two great conventions in September and October; and prepare for a wide and vigorous campaign for the coming year.

We hav done the best we could during the past year; made some mistakes of course, but I believe, on the whole, the record will stand good; and, learning by experience, we shall endeavor to accomplish more fruitful results hereafter.

Mr. Watts sails for England to prepare for his removal to this country and full devotion to the interests of the great work here. Mr. Watts has labored most faithfully during the past year, and his eloquent exposition of our principles has been of invaluable service to our cause. He goes with our hearts' best wishes for a happy voyage and a speedy return to fortunate labors in this new world.

Fraternally yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Cause in Michigan.

From Philadelphia I was suddenly summoned to New York, friends having been informed of a large tent, flooring, seats and equipment, for sale at low rate and easy terms in Girard, Mich. I opened negotiation by telegraph, but not being willing to risk purchase without personal inspection, and desiring to hav consultation with my colleagues, Messrs. Watts and Putnam, in regard to general interests of the work, and especially the National Liberal League Congress at Cleveland, and to arrange preliminaries with Brother S. P. Putnam (who is Chairman of the Executiv Committee of the New York Freethinkers' Association) for the annual convention at Albany, N. Y., September 11th to 13th, I started for Grand Rapids, Mich.

Sunday afternoon a large attendance greeted Messrs. Watts and Putnam at the Powers Opera House. In the evening the crowd was immense; even standing room was unattainable, and the vast audience gave undivided attention to the speakers.

That Charles Watts was logical, eloquent, and carried conviction to his hearers despite their prejudices, goes without saying. But the legion of friends of the gentle, genial S. P. Putnam will be delighted to know that he has made a wonderful improvement in his delivery. Without notes of any kind, with grace of motion and dulcet cadence, he pours out his heart's convictions, clothed in the glowing beauty of poesy, delighting and entrancing his audience.

On Monday evening Mr. Watts delivered a most crushing rejoinder to a Rev. Gilbert's so-called reply to Colonel Ingersoll's lecture "Which Way?" So great was the interest to hear Mr. Watts that, long before the hour appointed, even the third gallery—always reserved for the roughest of the gods—was crowded by fashionable ladies, and, despite discomfort and crowded condition, for nearly two hours all gave earnest attention.

Brother J. D. Blodgett, who, with prince-like generosity, bore the entire expense of these meetings, was delighted with his investment, so thoroughly satisfactory was everything connected with this great effort.

I obtained seventeen new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sold a large number of Liberal publications.

On Monday I accompanied Messrs. Watts and Putnam to Springport. Two meetings were held on the evenings of May 11th and 12th, at the Opera House, under the auspices and through the efforts and liberality of M. L. Dey. Wednesday morning I bade adieu to my colleagues, and went to Girard, only to find the tent I had expected to purchase shockingly dirty, and altogether unsuitable for our purpose. Discouraged but not dismayed, I wrote and telegraphed in several directions, and finally gave orders to the well-known tent makers, Murray & Baker, of Chicago, to make us a circle tent fifty feet diameter, they guaranteeing to ship it to me at Kalamazoo on or before Thursday, May 28th.

I returned to Springport, and on Saturday afternoon that stanch, tried, and true Liberal, J. Courtright, escorted me to his happy and hospitable home at Duck Lake. Sunday morning, May 24th, I spoke at South schoolhouse at 10 A.M., subject, "Salvation"—good attendance and deep interest. A pious Methodist doctor attempted to reply to Mr. Watts's lecture at Springport. He had learned by rote about fifteen pages of Watson's reply to Paine, and inflicted it on the audience, trying to palm it off as original. The audience were much disgusted. But I succeeded in restoring them to good humor by my rejoinder. Rode over to Springport, five and one-half miles, and at 3 P.M. lectured at the Opera House on "Heaven and the Angels." The parsons had worked for the past three days, with all the desperate energy of men whose bread and butter was at stake, and plied the stay-away argument for all it was worth. Yet I was assured my effort was not in vain. I rode back to Duck Lake, North schoolhouse, seven miles and a half, and at 8 P.M. delivered the lecture, "Why I Left the Pulpit." The schoolhouse is a very large one. Every possible place was occupied. I hardly had room at the desk, so great was the crowd.

On Sunday next, May 24th, I am advertised for Augusta, Mich., afternoon and evening. I go from there to Kalamazoo to pitch my tent, and shall open Tent campaign Sunday afternoon, May 31st. Expect to remain two weeks. Correspondents will take take due notice and govern themselvs accordingly.

Contributions to the Tent fund should be sent to the TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

Watts and Putnam in Grand Rapids.

The German American, a paper published in Grand Rapids, in its issue of May 16th, has the following notice of the recent lectures in that city:

"The first of the course of Liberal lectures was delivered Sunday afternoon at Powers's Opera House by Mr. Charles Watts, on 'Agnosticism and Theism,' to an intelligent and appreciativ audience. In this address Mr. Watts developed the Agnostic philosophy as understood by him, to the evident satisfaction of all Agnostics. He then contrasted the two, showing the former to be a real philosophy based upon life, while the other was the creature of imagination and had its origin in ignorance and superstition.

"In the evening Mr. Watts was introduced to one of the largest and most appreciativ audiences that ever gathered under a roof in this city. The subject for the evening was 'Secularism and Christianity.' For more than an hour and a half the justly-celebrated English lecturer and Freethinker held his audience as by magic power. He has a thorough command of language, shows a thorough acquaintance with present and ancient history and of the subject of Freethought. Frequent outbursts of applause by the audience were sufficient to demonstrate the fact that the lecturer's utterances were heartily approved.

"Probably the most interesting of these lectures, to Grand Rapids people, was the one given Monday night at Redmond's Opera House. It had been announced that Mr. Watts would reply to Rev. J. E. Gilbert's criticism on Colonel Ingersoll's 'Which Way?' The house was crowded with an eager and attentiv audience. Throughout the entire lecture the speaker was greeted with repeated rounds of applause. Except to applaud, the audience was held as by a magic spell, giving the most intense interest and attention to catch every word that was said. During all our travels in this country and in Europe, it is not too much to say that never before hav we witnessed so attentiv and interested an audience. From the first sentence until his conclusion, which was nearly two hours, the speaker cut right and left, showing conclusivly the falsehood, misrepresentation, and ignorance of the reverend gentleman. His keen wit, his logical reasoning, and his eloquence as an orator, backed by a thorough historical knowledge of the world and its greatest thinkers and writers, make him a power, both as a public debater and lecturer, for effectiv work that must be felt wherever he goes."

IN AUBURN.

MR. EDITOR: Watts and Putnam lectured here on the eve of the 14th and 15th, in the court house, to a full house. The audience for the first night consisted of but few Christians, but on the second night a good many of them were there, and the very strongest at that, also three ministers. One of these with great courage asked the ushers to find him a back seat before he would come in. When Mr. Watts made his closing remark he challenged any of them, or all of them, to debate, but they made no reply—still as death. But I think he gave them some facts to ponder over. They no doubt will defend their side to-day when he is forty miles away.

We took down some twenty odd names toward organizing a League here. This is the first Liberal lecture we ever had, and the belief or teachings of Secularism were new to most of the people, as there are but few who take any Liberal paper, but become Freethinkers from reasoning for themselvs. All were well pleased with the lecture. I heard some Methodists make the remark, "It was very good." I hope it will do them good, and cause them to look at humanity in the right light, and not to pay so much attention to something they know nothing about.

I want to say to all readers of this: Make arrangements to get Watts and Putnam, and you will hav a grand treat. I say, Success to the standard bearers in spreading the light and truth. W. H. RAKESTRAW.

The American Congress of Churches.

This project was started on the 10th of November, 1883, the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birthday, when a circular was issued entitled, "A Call for an Interecclesiastical Church Congress" On New Year's day, 1884, the Pittsfield (Mass.) ministers came together again to read the nearly two hundred replies they had received from eminent divines, college presidents, and laymen. The third conference was held at Pittsfield on the 18th of June last, when, after a full discussion, the above title was agreed upon as the name of the new organization, and the purpose of the movement was formulated "to promote Christian union, and to advance the kingdom of God by a free discussion of the great religious, moral, and social questions of the time." A "council" of twenty-five clergymen and laymen were appointed, which met in New Haven on the 20th of November last, when a permanent organization was effected, and Hartford, Conn., was selected as the place for the first meeting on May 11th, 12th, and 13th. A faint idea of the purposes and extent of the movement may be gained by the following quotation from the Boston Journal:

A CONGRESS OF CHURCHES.—THE PROGRAM FOR THE MEETING AT HARTFORD, CONN.

WATERBURY, CONN., April 21st.—The arrangements for an American congress of churches in Hartford, Conn , May 11th, 12th, and 13th, are approaching completion. The program embraces topics of great importance. The discussions will be opened by men widely known as specialists, such as Rev. Howard Crosby and Rev. James Freeman Clarke, Senator Hawley, Dr. N. J. Dunton, of Hartford; John Henry Hopkins, leader of the ritualists; Washington Gladden; George Dana Boardman, of Philadelphia; Prof. Samuel M. Hopkins, of Auburn Seminary; President Robinson, of Brown University; and Rev. Frederick D. Power, pastor of the late President Garfield. Governor Harrison, of Connecticut, will preside. The management of the congress is in the hands of a council in which the chief religious denominations are represented. Its chairman is Dr Joseph Anderson, of Waterbury; its secretary, Rev. Wm. Wilberforce Newton, of Pittsfield. Among the members are Hon. Francis Wayland, of New Haven, Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, Dr. A. P. Peabody, of Cambridge, Dr. Chas. S. Robinson. Dr. William Ormiston, Rev. T. C. Williams, and A. D F. Randolph, of New York, Dr. J. B. Thomas, of Brooklyn, Dr. Daniel Merriman, of Worcester, Dr. F. W. Conrad, editor of the Lutheran Observer, and Isaac Errett, editor of the Christian Standard. Among the fifty vice-presidents who hav given the congress their indorsement are some of the leading men of America, representing various sections and denominations, such as Bishops Andrews, Foss, and Warren, of the Methodist church, ex-President Haygood, of Oxford, Ga . Bishops Harris, of Michigan, Howe, of Pennsylvania, and Tuttle, of Utah, of the Episcopal church, Senators Dawes, Edmunds, and Hawley, ex-Governor Long, of Massachusetts, and R. M. Bishop, of Ohio, and many others. Of the Hartford Local Committee Dr. E. P. Parker is chairman, and Charles Dudley Warner, Henry E. Robinson, Gen. W. B. Franklin, F. W. Cheney, and J. L. Greene are members.

This conference has just closed, and, in view of these facts and others, let me inquire, what is the significance of the inauguration of such a great movement as this promises to become in the not distant future?

To giv even a synopsis of the speeches delivered during the four sessions of this congress would quite exceed my limits; permit me, then, to condense by saying that the congress, which embraced representativs from all the Protestant churches, was opened on the evening of May 11th, Governor Robinson, of Connecticut, presiding, Rev. Edward P. Parker, D D., making the address of welcome, after which "An Historical Account of the Congress of Churches" was given by Rev. Joseph Anderson, D.D. These preliminaries were followed by the presentation of the first topic for discussion, which was "The Relations of a Divided Christendom to Aggressiv Christianity." Dr. Crosby, of New York, read the first paper, the gist of which was, the curse of Christianity is a divided church. "Who can visit a village of one thousand inhabitants, with its three churches, and not confess its divisions are unchristian?" "But," he declared, "there should not be the slightest compromise. Such compromise comes often from the union of church and state, which is not true unity." Did he mean that?

Rev. Henry Hopkins, D D., of Williamsport, Conn., an Episcopalian, followed, giving an account of three empty houses of worship on the main street of his town, saying that these failures hav been due to doctrinal differences. Such, he said, is to a greater or less extent the case of thousands of villages. Because of these divisions people decline to take part in Christian worship, and abroad it is even worse. Nineteen different sects are trying to convert the Japanese from heathenism. Even on the two great sacraments there are differences of opinion. If in eighteen centuries Christians hav not settled their points, how can it be expected that heathens will be able to do so? While the missionaries may be willing to giv up their individual peculiarities, they dare not do so because of their sects at home.

After Christ's great prayer for unity the voice of sectarianism should be dumb. The whole world sees the division that exists, and therefore men do not believe. We must hav unity first, and then we may expect the world will believe in the same line of thought.

Rev. Frederick D. Power, of Washington, D. C., Garfield's pastor, said that a divided Christendom was unknown to Christ and the apostles. If Christendom is divided the divine plan is disregarded and men are living in sin. Workers together with God, the early Christians carried everything before them; with schism came confusion, shame, failure and death.

Rev. Dr. Peck, of Trinity Methodist Church, New Haven, said that "union will never take place on a denominational basis, nor will there be union until every Christian body recognizes the points of every other. Each must hav conceded to it its perfect right of interpretation of the great original charter." Then why not grant the same concession to Anti-christians?

Rev. Theodore C. Williams, of All Souls' church, New York, said "there can be no union of consent to vital doctrins unless you hav some authority to declare what doctrins are vital. Only upon Christ's character for the agreement of his squabbling disciples can union be had."

Rev. George F. Pentecost, D.D., Brooklyn, deplored existing differences, and expressed his belief that "the world is not so badly off after all, since Christianity has laid its hands upon every civilized country, and the doctrins of Christ hav been fixed upon them with a grip of iron. Christian union is only to be had by realizing it in sectarianism."

Rev. A. A. Miner, D.D., of Boston, Universalist, closed up the evening's entertainment with "hell." Hear him. He approved heartily of Christian unity, saying that "such unity is possible when it is considered that we hav one Father; that we are brethren of one family in no formal sense; that God loves every man as his own child. Here is a basis of unity broad as the universe, high as heaven, deeper than hell." Aha! has hell become engrafted into his creed because of the evangelicals around him?

The topics discussed on the second day's session were, in the morning, "The Function of Worship in Promoting the Growth of the Church," and in the evening, "The Attitude of the Secular Press in America Toward Religion." Rev. Nathaniel Burton, D.D., of Hartford, Conn., said in dealing in all terrestrial affairs the church has improved. . . . Christ's disciples no longer liv a natural life, but a supernatural. . . . Worship cannot do its whole work except as it is prescribed and formulated by authority. He seemed to favor the Liturgy, as did Rev. Dr. Hopkins, Presbyterian, of Auburn, N. Y. He showed that while the "Westminster divines treated public devotion as the most important part of the service, the Presbyterians assigned it to the most inferior; the minister in the pulpit does all the praying; a choir in the organ loft do all the praising; the people constitute nothing but a silent audience." But still he "would object to the rigid imposition of liturgical forms. . . . The sermon, as a means of drawing people steadily to the house of God, has survived its usefulness The average pulpiteer presents only slight attract ons" He quoted Dr Oliver Wendell Holmes "that the essentially intellectual character of an extemporaneous composition spoken to the Creator, with the consciousness that many of his creatures are listening to criticise or admire, is the great argument for set forms of prayer; that as the congregation praise by means of a hymn-book, they might equally pray by means of a prayer-book," was his argument, "and that the changed social condition demands a concession . . . under peril of having our congregation desert the church altogether." He would hav "the clergy make this concession in good season;" that is, hurry up and "shape your creeds to the world," as a Boston minister said a few Sundays ago.

Rev. Charles C. Grafton, of Boston, said "worship consisted of prayer and sacrifice," etc. Rev. D. G. Boardman, D.D., of Philadelphia, said, "Worship is a human instinct. No man was ever born an Atheist," and attempted to prove it, summing up at that point with, "no wonder, then, that worship will be the blessed occupation of the heavenly immortality!" He "did not believe in the elaborate ritual that has been done away with in Christ. Verily, one might fancy that the story of Jacob's well were altogether a myth and the prophet of Nazareth had never been born, the church had learned so slowly the vast lesson that worship must be of the spirit . . . but even spiritual worship must take on some kind of liturgy. Beware then of pantheistic philosophy. Man's plowing is as holy as his praying. . . . . . Worship is the thing for which man was made." Then he cited the story of Martha and Mary, that "Mary's one thing needful was inward devotion to me [Jesus]." Right Rev. Bishop Coxe followed; then Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, of Elmira, N. Y., who said, "If ye stop trying to imitate, if ye borrow nothing, if ye cease all boasting and bumptiousness, and simply wait, ye shall achieve great results." President Long, of Antioch College, Ohio, and Prof. Pliny Earle Chase, of Haverford College, Pennsylvania, a Friend, ended the morning session.

The evening session was opened by Rev. Washington Gladden, D.D., of Columbus, O., who said: "The attitude of the average American editor toward religion is one of calm superiority," but comforted himself by adding, "his principal purpose being to make money, he chronicled religious news as he did dog-fights and divorces."

Rev. Julius H. Ward, of Boston, made a long speech, in which he stated, "The ethical element in religion is the chief element;" admitted changes, but claimed that "God speaks to each generation in just these silent changes. . . . This work [of unity] is possible only through channels that are not ecclesiastical. . . . People of all beliefs must look more and more for that substantial unity among American Christians which a broken Christianity constantly imperils," and so he welcomed the newspaper as one of those silent agents.

Rev. James M. Pullman, D.D., of Lynn, Mass., regretted that "full reports of Ingersoll are often given, while of the remarks of most clergymen a brief summary only is made," but consoled himself with: "Notwithstanding all flings against religion, and all jests at sacred things, ample reports are given of noteworthy sermons, sectarian theology being entirely ignored. On the whole, the secular press toward religion is reverential and fair. Hon. Joseph R. Hawley quoted Mr. Dana of the Sun as saying: "Every newspaper ought to be a religious one," and continued, "There are men doing religious work who are not inside the church at all. . . It is not for their interests [the editors] to offend any denomination as to its peculiarities. . . Editors publish almost everything—some things because they say the public will hav them. How is it so many of you know about Bob Ingersoll if you havn't read what he has said as it was published in the papers? I would not giv space to the promotion of his doctrins. I think they are cruel and cold [well, some think yours are savage and hot], and it is a crime to spread them, but they are what he says, and if you don't want things in the papers you must not let them happen [that is, not let the colonel lecture]. Some of you are saying that the press has taken so much of the field that the people do not care to hear the preacher. This is not so; there is no place equal to that of the preacher. He goes into a place dedicated to Almighty God, and in which there is preaching, music, and prayer. There he can approach and deal with his people as no political orator or editor can. So the newspaper will never be substituted for the office of the minister. If the secular paper is drawing away people from the pulpit it is your fault and not that of the newspapers." Rev. Dr. Langdon, of Pennsylvania, and Rev. Freeman Clarke, of Boston, agreed in saying that if the secular press does not help the church and the pulpit, it is the fault of the church and the pulpit. And so, as a whole, the decision was favorable toward the newspaper, that it could be used as a means of building up Christ's kingdom by uniting all sects as one, and would not supersede the creed, church, and preacher.

The closing session of the congress, Wednesday morning, was opened with prayer by the Rev. Chauncey Giles, of Philadelphia, Swedenborgian, after which Rev. Dr. Clarke began the discussion upon the "Historical Christ as the True Center of Theology." It would be impossible to report him; suffice to say orthodoxy received no blows from him while he could turn out of his way to say, "With such a united church [the Protestant that he had described] how long would the outcast heathen in our cities be left uncared for? How long would Materialism, Agnosticism, Pessimism, Atheism, the spiritual diseases of our time, resist the radiance of this new advent of Christ to the world?" And yet he had declared, "As long as we define beforehand for each other what we ought to believe about Christ, there is little prospect of church union." Why, then, should he define for Atheists, etc., what they ought to believe about Christ?

President E G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., of Providence, R I., said: "The historical Christ is a personal Christ, not a metaphysical, not an ideal Christ, but a veritable living person, the risen Christ, the glorified Christ. Christ is as real a person to-day as we who are here are persons," with much other pious fanaticism like, "Christ is the center of what we might call true ethics. To-day the ethics of Jesus Christ are the standard, the test, of every ethical theory that man has brought forth. [Aha! didn't he invent the telephone and bicycle also?] Not one solitary principle that Jesus taught has been outlived; not one has been disproved; not one essential has been added to his code. On the person of this historic Jesus we will stake all, and say to skeptics, You may explain away Jesus if you can. This Jesus . . . holds us with the grip of omnipotence." Then a bugle blast was sounded by President Porter of Yale College, another by Chauncey Giles, after which Rev. Dr. Plumb ignorantly said, for we must not suspect him of hypocrisy, that "Christ has transformed civilization, promoting its humanities and charities [like Girard college], until even Infidels seek his name to giv their utterances credence." Here the discussion closed; thanks, congratulations, and fraternal compliments ending the congress with "Godspeeds for the second congress next year at St. Louis."

Now, let me inquire what prompted this congress. Why this "effort" to promote Christian union and to advance the kingdom of God? Let me answer in their own words, disguised as they are, "Earnest men of all communions here come to see the necessity of uniting their forces against a common foe. . . . All varieties of evangelical Protestantism should be allied in defense of common interests and in furtherance of common faith. . . . From an early period the followers of Christ hav been compelled to witness the spectacle of a divided Christendom. . . . It may be that the time is near when the organization of a state church, like the national church of England, will be an impossibility, because society will be too much disintegrated to maintain it, but there can be no question but that the best feature of English life to-day is the pervasiv and penetrating influences that come from its national organization of religion" (Rev. Julius H. Ward, of Boston). There, does not that last statement divulge the whole plot? Does it not open up to our astonished vision that this congress of American churches was organized for the sole purpose of inaugurating a conspiracy by which a national religion would be established, similar to the one in Christian England, with God in the Constition, Jesus Christ as the ruler of the nation, and the Bible the law of the land? Is this not what is meant by "advancing the kingdom of God?" Is not this the reason why the clergy are so anxious to promote Christian union? Do not they see Infidelity coming in like a flood, and is not "an impossibility" to organize state and church, unless done soon, the cause of this whole action that I hav thus briefly reviewed? I hav watched this movement from its incipiency, and present it as it appears to me. Ought not a note of warning be sounded in the ears of a slumbering nation? The press, the people, the moneyed power, the clergy believe, are subservient to their wishes. Wealth is pouring into their coffers from all quarters in the form of donations, bequests, endowments, and millionaire gifts, and the immense power and influence thus gained cannot be estimated. Our only hope is in a divided church; but should Protestant and Catholic unite our doom is certain. It seems to me we hav as much to fear from the one as from the other, with equal power once in their hands. The whole aim of the church is to convert the world to the Lord, and they are working with a will unequaled by Cæsar, Alexander, or Napoleon.

Yes, I am in earnest, and hav been ever since a national God was first proposed. I shrink from the possibility of realizing that my thirty-five years of continuous, persistent labor to destroy the authority of the Bible has been of no avail in preventing this monstrous crime.

Barre, Mass, May 15, 285. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Canadian Notes.

On Sunday last a lecture was delivered in Albert Hall by R. B. Butland on "The Evolution Philosophy." A reading was given by Mr. Risser. A piano solo, "The Overture to the Caliph of Bagdad," was played by little Anna Butland, nine years of age. Christianity triumphed, reason and common sense were overthrown. There remains now only one authority, the Christian church. Beyond the pale of the church no salvation. Whoever is not Christian has no longer any rights whatever, and we must accept the most detestable doctrins if put forward by Christianity. Now we hav nothing left but the grace of God, the predestination of the elect, and original sin; the pleasure of God and the church take the place of virtue and freedom of inquiry. There is no longer anything that can be called conscience, or justice, or virtue, Authority and obedience become the formula of the word of life; the advent of Christianity, resulting in a hierarchy of slaves, professes to be the mainstay of freedom and justice. But we find their maxims to be be senseless, immoral, and anti-social. Christianity has laid violent hands on reason, on thought. If intelligence endeavors to escape from Christian bondage, it is brought back by blows and stripes, anathemas, and fire and fagot. All reason will be suppressed by the church with fire, sword, the torture chamber, and gibbet. During all periods of great public calamities, great fires, great famins, great pestilences, the minds of men are filled with awe, fear, dread, and superstitious terror. At such times prophets, supernatural revelations, new religions, spring up like mushrooms. Christianity arose during one of those periods. The Christian Christ was born just at the close of the great civil wars of the Roman world, during which neighbor was arrayed against neighbor, brother against brother, child against parent. All over the whole of the Roman empire, i. e., the whole civilized world, it was a time of universal famin, pestilences, destitution, and misery. The minds of men were filled with awe, fear, dread, and superstitious terror. This condition of humanity produced Christianity. It heralded the birth of the Christian Christ. Another cause of its rise was the utterly rotten state of society and public morals in the ancient world at the time of its advent. At such a time some great, sweeping, radical change must inevitably take place. In this case Christianity supplied the change which was imperativ. Had it not come along some other religion would hav done so. The old theologies and systems of religion were all stone dead. This caused a vacuum into which Christianity rushed, being the fittest, and having the greatest affinity to existing circumstances. Yet another cause of the rise was that Christianity was the most democratic of all the contemporary systems. It appealed to the poor and lowly, the oppressed, the weary and heavy laden. "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will giv you rest, for I am meek and lowly of heart." It appealed to the poor, the weak and oppressed, against the rich, the strong, the oppressors—can you wonder at its rise? Another potent cause of its rise was its wholesale system of bribery, in the way of rewards in the next world, in a future life beyond the grave. To a wretched, downtrodden, despised people, with no prospect of anything but misery in this world, supreme felicity in the next was an irresistible bribe. Lastly the political necessities of the usurper Constantine insured its final triumph. Usurpers in all ages hav found it necessary to call in the aid of superstitious religion to strengthen their usurped thrones.

Constantine was in this fix. Christianity was the strongest and most available superstition at hand. He invoked its aid. It helped him to be the tyrant of the whole civilized world. He helped Christianity to be the tyrant of the whole world of thought. He destroyed all political and civil liberty. Christianity crushed out all reason and common sense from the region of thought.

Shall Mr. Wakeman be Ordained?

Now that Mr. Wakeman has definitly entered upon a new career—that of advocating the principles and doctrins of Universology and its accompanying philosophy, Integralism—allow me to propose that the Liberals of New York institute a new religious society and make him their pastor.

Ordinarily it is presumed that one, unless he is regularly "prepared for the ministry," may preach himself out in a few weeks, but the doctrins of Universology, and Integralism, and Pantarchism are inexhaustible, it is claimed, so that Mr. Wakeman will hav ample room to display his keen logic and brilliant oratory, of which he unquestionably possesses a large share. Or there is in this city a Society of Humanity, of which Mr. Wakeman is already an activ member, and, if not incompatible with the purposes for which the large fund they hav was willed to them, will that not enter into the work? It is a splendid opportunity, with so able an expounder of so immense a system of doctrin, for the society to "make its mark" in the world.

The proposition suggested itself as I read in the present issue of your paper the very able review by Mr. Wakeman of "The Nature and Reality of Religion," edited by Professor Youmans, and published by the Appletons. In this review Mr. Wakeman advocates the theory of "Emphasis" to explain the diverse views on the same subject of equally able men, which is the only logical explanation possible. Now this doctrin is, as you yourself know, unquestonably Universological and Andrewsian, arising of necessity from the science as a part of the system of Integralism, and Mr. Andrews has been preaching it to more or less appreciativ ears, as often the less as the more, the past fifteen years. Now that Mr. Wakeman has taken it up, it is hoped he will keep on and popularize, if he can, other doctrins which Mr. Andrews has labored, with but little success, to make acceptable to the public. Perhaps from Mr. Wakeman's lips, in his less obscure even if less profound way, they will be more readily grasped.

If he does this he will earn and probably receive the lasting gratitude of Mr. Andrews and his school, for it will equally benefit humanity to know the truth, even though it rob Mr. Andrews of the honor that justly belongs to him. Besides, Mr. Andrews's discoveries and elaborations in the sciento-philosophical field are so immense, comprehensiv, and profound that he can well afford to share some of the minor glories with his neighbors. In time, when his work shall hav become known (and we hope and pray that Mr. Wakeman will contribute to that knowledge), there will be honor and glory enough for any one man to bear.

I say this because I know that Mr. Andrews prepared and THE TRUTH SEEKER published, just following Messrs. Spencer and Harrison's articles, a profound and labored article—too profound, perhaps, for the majority of readers—in which he set forth just the same ideas that Mr. Wakeman has made use of in his review, though Mr. Andrews dwelt more upon the fact of the double or all-sidedness of all truth than he did the on emphasis itself.

Not the least notice of that article, that I am aware of, has been taken by the chief parties in the controversy; but Mr. Wakeman seems to make good use of the ideas abstracted therefrom, only, I am sorry to say, he givs no credit. He speaks of Comte and Spencer, and even mentions "Integral Philosophy," unquestionably Mr. Andrews's system, as unquestionably as that the "Positiv" system is Auguste Comte's, but never once writes "Andrews." I for one should hav thought more highly of him had he frankly acknowledged the source of his ideas, instead of leaving the reader in ignorance; but it is only those at a distance or who are unacquainted with Mr. Andrews who are ignorant. We who are at all acquainted with the philosophy of Mr. Andrews, who hav listened to the eloquence of his profound utterances the last decade or more, recognize the fatherhood of the ideas, and sincerely thank Mr. Wakeman for his attempt to put them in a more popular form, even though he puts them forth as his own. As I said, Mr. Andrews can afford to share the glory of his work with his helpers.

But it is not specially to emphasize this point that I write. My object, as indicated at the commencement of this communication, is to suggest the establishment in New York of a society something after the pattern of that presided over by Richard Congreve in London. This church, with Mr. Wakeman as "pastor," expounding the doctrins of Auguste Comte, as interpreted and modified by Universology, would worthily lead the way toward that new and higher Integration which is the hope of the world.

CONSTANT READER.

Miss Gardener in Her Own Behalf.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I believe that I hav never before written to your paper upon any personal matter, and perhaps it is foolish for me to do so now; but in your issue of May 9th I read (in a communication from Mrs. Lucy N. Colman) this paragraph:

"As I am in a critical mood, I wish to say that I wholly dissent from the article—I should say from the spirit of the article—of a correspondent from Syracuse, who says, 'There are women (in the judgment of the writer) whose writings are superior to Miss Helen H. Gardener's, and who were not introduced by Colonel Ingersoll to the platform.' Cannot one be glad for another that she may hav had that advantage, even though she may be alone in the honor? I do not know the sex of the writer, but should be sorry to know it to be a woman. Let us be glad for all good that comes to the advocates of Liberalism, not saying paltry things that may hurt their feelings."

I had not and hav not seen the article to which Mrs. Colman refers, and against the spirit of which she so kindly protests in my behalf, but if I had, it is not wholly impossible that I might agree with the writer thereof, at least in the substance of his (or her) statement. It has certainly not been held as one of my opinions that my writings are superior to those of many other women. I should be sorry to think that they are; but I do not know how my critic can know much of their quality, since nothing beyond one or two fugitiv articles or letters of mine has ever yet been published.

It is true that certain extracts, condensed reports, etc., hav appeared in newspapers from time to time, but I suppose that one who is a critic would hardly think of judging me by such things as these.

Colonel Ingersoll knew of work which I had and hav in hand that he is pleased to think of sufficient worth to justify him in his kind introduction of me. Surely this should not appear as a hardship to any one else? And although I hope my work may not fall short of his generous estimate of its worth, I am entirely willing to concede the point at issue, viz.: "There hav been and are other women whose writings are superior to Helen H. Gardener's who were not introduced to the public by Colonel Ingersoll."

So, while I heartily thank Mrs. Colman for her kindly defense of me against what she deemed an ungenerous spirit of criticism, I at the same time desire my unknown adverse critic to feel assured that I do not claim for myself, nor has anyone claimed for me (so far as I know), either superiority to all others, or that I hav not a wide field for improvement open before me. But until what I can do is better and more fully demonstrated than has been yet possible (both for want of time and opportunity), perhaps it will be just as kind and rather more just to permit each one to go her own way, take her own course, do her work as best she can, after her own plans, and not institute comparisons (which hav nothing whatever to do with earnest honest, work), nor infuse jealousy and venom into a field where already there are thorns enough, and where there is ample room and work for all who are intent upon offering their best energy and efforts to a great cause rather than in wasting them upon personal questions, which hav nothing whatever to do with the labor which is before us all. I, at least, am willing to work side by side with those who are my recognized superiors in ability, and still be content and happy, trusting that my adverse critic may be the same. Sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER.

IT seems they still hav laws in Rome forbidding attacks upon religion. On the Friday preceding Palm Sunday the anti-clericals of Rome held a banquet to "unbelievers" in the immediate vicinity of a place where the Catholics were worshiping. This the Catholics considered an insult, which was further aggravated by articles criticising the "holy" religion in the Capitale, an anti-clerical journal. These articles offended the people of Rome so much that the Roman ladies of the aristocracy held a meeting and wrote a letter to the magistrate, requesting that he should, according to existing laws which forbid attacks upon religion, proceed against the paper and confiscate it. This letter had its effect. The procurator, who had been deaf to previous insults, was not deaf to the request of the ladies, and issued orders that the Capitale should be seized at once.

Money Needed.

The Business Manager has this week sent bills to those subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER who are in arrears. We urge upon the attention of those receiving them the necessity of a prompt response. The Truth Seeker Company has published during the past year a great deal of good Liberal literature, at low prices, and the various enterprises hav been a severe drain upon an exceedingly limited treasury. Money is now urgently needed, and we ask those owing for their papers to make a strong effort to pay up. The sums are not large to each individual, but collectivly they are all in all to us. We do not ask anyone to earn the Lord's love by being a cheerful giver, but we hav a right to expect that those who hav had the favor of several months' credit should now promptly respond to our call.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1.50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Hell.

One of the improvements made by the revisers of the Old Testament is the substitution of the word sheol for hell, the latter name for the supposed place of torment not being the exact counterpart of the Hebrew sheol.

Sheol means the under-world, but does not mean a place of torment. Hell originally meant "covered," and in that sense was synonymous with sheol, but it has become so generally used as meaning a place of punishment that it is no longer a synonym. The Greek hades, used in the New Testament, is the unseen place; gehenna is from the name of a valley near Jerusalem where refuse and offal were burnt.

The Christian world is indebted to the church for the doctrin of an eternal hell, or place of punishment. With the Jews, after the exile, sheol was divided into paradise and gehenna—the abode of bliss and the place of burning. Between the heaven and the hell of the Christians, the Catholic church places purgatory, divided, like the Jewish sheol, into compartments of more or less discomfort. The church has always and universally believed in a future eternal punishment for the unbelievers and the wicked. The Unitarians and Universalists, with the followers of Beecher and other preachers like him, are therefore heretics, and, if the dogmas of the orthodox church be sound, will upon their decease be eternally punished in the place the existence of which they do not believe in.

Like the attempt to introduce "good whiles" between the days of creation, this modification by the revising committee is a concession to nineteenth century ideas. If, in the course of a decade or two, the Bible is again revised, it is the most likely thing in the world that a committee would find good and valid reasons why all references to shéol, hell, or hades in both Old and New Testaments should be translated "heaven." There is nothing like possessing a "progressiv" religion; and if the people will not come to the religion the religion must progress to them.

This move on the part of the revising committee should not, however, create surprise. That is more likely to be excited by the fact that the eminent gentlemen hav been able to resist the temptation, which must hav been great, to make still further changes. The spirit of criticism now prevalent would hav upheld them in relegating the Old Testament to its rightful place as a crude record of the traditions, history, and religion of a nomadic and almost barbarous people.

Mocking at Misery.

A writer who has evidently been "in shallows and in miseries" all his life applies to the Christian Advocate for advice and consolation. He says:

"Would you allow a long-suffering and perplexed one to state his troubles? The writer can say that he has never knowingly wronged, defrauded, or corrupted any man, though frequently wronged. Yet his life has been a discomfort and a pain for long, long, long weary years, and yet he has prayed for relief, and endeavored to keep the scripture commandments, and yet, apparently, he might as well hav prayed to a stone. Do you think a parent would tell his child that he would be a 'present help in time of trouble' if he would call upon him, and then fail to do so when called upon? It seems a strange perplexity that such a one as you can say God is, who can behold suffering of all degrees without extending the helping hand, is sinless; but for man to do so is a gross sin."

The editor of the Advocate reads the sufferer a homily, assures him there is in the Bible no promis to remove physical suffering in every or any particular case, and then prescribes as follows:

"Carefully study the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. Acknowledge that God is wiser than you. Imitate Job, and say: 'I hav heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, and now mine eyes seeth thee, and I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' Do you think that you are better than Job or Paul? The natural law that you speak of, under whose heel you are, may be made of God, and, looked at from the point of view of cause and effect, you may seem like a worm crushed under the mighty wheel. But you are not a worm. You hav a soul that can commune with God, who has said that 'all things work together for good to them that love him.' It is your duty to believe that against all evidence to the contrary. Hold on in simplicity and piety until you get relief, or die by the will of God. If you do not get relief, by the grace of God you will hav strength to achieve persevering and victorious virtue, and when you die, your reward in heaven will be proportionate to all that you hav suffered here."

If anyone desires more frigid comfort than this, it will be necessary to wait until cold weather sets in again. Dr. Buckley has not touched upon the final consolation of Methodism. Baffled and beaten and tossed about by the winds in the wilderness of doubt, the wayfarer still has left open to him the dominions of Satan, to which Methodism dooms him unless he believes that which is contrary to all evidence.

This correspondent should bear in mind that no man ever accomplished anything while on his knees. It is not until he gets up and goes to work that his prayer begins to take effect, and work brings the same result whether preceded by prayer or not. Let him therefore arise and see if he cannot discover and remove the cause of his miseries. Failing in this, let him bear them like a man. One thing is certain—when relief comes, it will hav an earthly source.

"Socialism to the Bar."

The trial of Justus Schwab in this city last week was one of the most unfair that has ever disgraced our judiciary. The indictment of Schwab was for assault and inciting to riot, and was the result of a meeting in Concordia Hall last winter. The meeting was called by the social agitators, chiefly foreigners, who call themselvs Socialists, but use the word Socialist indiscriminately with Communist and Anarchist. The audience was divided into two factions, dynamiters and anti-dynamiters, Schwab belonging to the former faction. One of Schwab's opponents taking the chair at the meeting, he interposed, and his interference led to a squabble and war of words. Police Captain McCullagh was present, and, going to the platform, commanded silence. His presence, instead of producing silence, turned the enmity of both factions toward himself, and being a small man in civilian's clothes, he was hustled around to the great detriment of his dignity. He then sent one of his detectivs for the reserve police platoon, and, upon their arrival, ordered them to clear the hall, which they did with much brutal clubbing. Schwab was afterward arrested upon the charges mentioned.

Last week the trial came off. Mr. Fellows, of the district attorney's office, was the public prosecutor. It being his business to convict a prisoner if he can, little blame should perhaps attach to him, but upon the judge the most severe censure should be visited. From the first it was plain that the ideas of Schwab and his associates were upon trial, and not Schwab himself for an alleged assault upon Captain McCullagh. Introducing scarcely any testimony to prove the assault, the prosecuting attorney began an inquisition into Schwab's beliefs with the manifest and open purpose of prejudicing the jury against him. To this Schwab's counsel properly objected, but Judge Van Brunt overruled his objection. The inquisition then proceeded, and to such an extent was it carried that one of the jurors arose and protested. "I want to know," he said, "if we are trying this man for an assault or for being a Socialist." But the inquisition continued, eliciting from Schwab an incoherent jumble of Socialistic, Anarchistic, and Communistic ideas.

When the time came for the prosecuting attorney to address the jury, he glided over the evidence, and drew a lurid picture of the desolation that would reign should Schwab's Socialistic theories prevail in this country. He told of the dark workings of Schwab and his conspirators, and described how Socialism would rob every person of his wealth and leave him penniless. As a stump speech, his effort was successful, but as a summing up of evidence tending to convict, it was unworthy of a lawyer of his attainments.

After Schwab's lawyer had enumerated the many virtues of his client, the judge delivered his charge, which, for unfairness, must rank Judge Van Brunt with Benedict. The charge dwelt almost exclusivly upon the evidence produced against the prisoner. Schwab had avowed himself an "Atheist or Materialist, but a very religious man, because religion was nothing more than 'the reunification of many,'" and the judge charged that it was right to compel him to disclose his religious and Socialistic views, "because then the jury, by finding out whether or not any moral or religious restraint was thrown around him, could tell whether or not to believe his testimony." This insult to Schwab and Atheists was entirely gratuitous, for the prosecution, coerced by a cloud of witnesses, admitted that the Schwab's moral character was good. The prosecuting judge then touched upon a fact not brought out in the evidence, and which, of course, he had no legal or moral right to do—that "when Schwab became a citizen of the United States, he must hav sworn to uphold and support the Constitution. He must at that time hav sworn falsely, since on his examination he declared his desire to overthrow all government, and his belief that government was the badge of man's slavery." After this illegal deliverance, the judge sent the jury out, with directions that when the verdict was ready, he could be sent for. The place where he could be found, he said, was Wallack's theater.

Though, notwithstanding the judge's evident effort to convict, the jury disagreed, and Schwab will probably not be tried again, we think that every fair-minded man must protest against courts of inquisition in which a man is tried for holding certain heterodox ideas, and not for the misdemeanor set forth in the indictment.

Religious and Secular Pedestrianism.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court evidently believes in making haste slowly. The public statutes of the Puritan Commonwealth declare that "whoever travels on the Lord's day, except from necessity or charity, shall be punished by fine not exceeding ten dollars for each offense." The Supreme Court has just decided that if a man takes a short walk "for air and exercise," or to "call on a neighbor," he is not an unlawful traveler or a breaker of the Sunday law. In reaching this conclusion the court lays much stress on the brevity and innocent purpose of the walk.

This decision is encouraging, and indicates that sometime in the latter part of the twentieth century Massachusetts will hav outgrown her pantalet and pinafore days.

Church and State are Separated!

New York state's very accommodating assemblymen voted last Thursday to giv free water to all the "charitable" institutions of Brooklyn. This is a comparativly small steal—only a few thousands per year—and the churches hav such a hard time in supporting their paupers that the people will not, of course, complain.

Editorial Notes.

If Victor Nelson, a former subscriber to The Truth Seeker, should see this paragraph, he will please call on Dr. Sievers, of 202 E. 28th street, this city.

Seward Mitchell has printed a small quarto sheet containing what he thinks are "Important Truths, Preparing the Way for Coming Generations." Mr. Mitchell is an all-around reformer, an Anarchist, Freethinker, Spiritualist, Anti-Usurer, Anti-Monopolist, Abolitionist (not only of slavery, but of government), Free Trader, Labor Reformer, and Freelover, and his little paper is spicy reading. His address is Newport, Me., and five cents would be none too much to send for his "important truths."

Through the effort of a revivalist, Fort Worth, Texas, is passing through a spasm of "purity." A man was arrested two weeks ago for selling a banana and five cents' worth of candy on Sunday. The liquor stores were all closed, but this did not prevent drunkenness, rather increasing it than otherwise, for the cittzens of bibulous desires purchased supplies on Saturday. The Evening Mail says that scores of men drank twice or thrice the amount of liquor they were in the habit of doing on any other day in the week.

An American girl, writing from Berlin to a New York paper, regretfully states that "the Germans are certainly not a religious people; their way of spending Sunday is very different from ours. The ladies think nothing of having a dressmaker on Sunday, and they crotchet and sew just as on other days. Among all my acquaintances I only know a few who go to church at all. The number of state churches does not exceed sixty in a city of over a million inhabitants. The tendency of the nation is to Freethinking and living."

The New Era, a Spiritualist paper, published every two weeks at Grand Rapids, Mich., advises everyone to send for the Truth Seeker Annual. We think the advice is sound. With "The Modern Balaam" the New Era is also pleased. The picture is, it says, "one of the best illustrations we hav ever seen. We wish this picture, in all its significance, and full comprehension by them, could reach all the priest-ridden people, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, to the accomplishment of their freedom from the slavish fear of 'hell,' and the bigotry of the churches and their ministry."

For some weeks past Stephen Pearl Andrews has been prostrated by bronchial and other physical ills, and his condition has been at times very serious, but the latest reports from the attending physicians is very encouraging. We trust that their skill will be sufficient to preserve to this world for many years yet one whom the Liberals and Reformers can so ill afford to spare. Mr. Andrews has many ideas of importance yet to print, and there could be no economy of nature subserved by his going over the river. He is needed as a balance-wheel to the various sociological reforms, and we conjure him to make haste in his convalescence.

The Toronto Secular Society gave a concert and social hop, at their rooms, 9 Grand Opera House, May 20th. Mr. W. M. Scott presided over an exceedingly pleasant entertainment, in which Miss Annie Butland, the charming daughter of our Canadian correspondent; Mr. Glochlin, Mr. McFedries, Mrs. Stevens, Professor Brown, Mr. Piddington, Mr. J. Slack, Miss and Mr. Seaton, Mr. A. Tilney, Mr. T. Sewell, Mr. D. Richmond, Mr. Edwards, Mrs. Elliott, Mrs. Verrall, Mr. Gibbs, Mrs. Bell, Mr. J. Harrison, whom the Freemasons are trying to expel because of his Secularistic opinions, and Miss N. Stewart took prominent part. These entertainments are an established feature with the Toronto society. We thank the promoters for printing upon the program the wholesome advice to subscribe for The Truth Seeker.

About the most beastly sermon we ever read was preached by the Rev. Mr. Pearson, revivalist, at Fort Worth, Texas, the other day. After the choir had sung, "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood Drawn from Immanuel's Veins," the preacher announced his text from Exodus xii, 13, "And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are." The sermon was divided thus: 1. Blood; 2. Shed blood; 3. Applied blood. At the close of the sermon the choir sang, "Nothing But the Blood of Jesus." The harvest from such horrible preaching will undoubtedly be some crazy conversions, perhaps a suicide or two, the departure of the revivalist with full pockets, and a general backsliding of the converted population. Revivalists are public nuisances and will find occupation only till the mass of the people get a little common sense into their heads, and a good deal of superstition out of their hearts. We are glad to know there is at least one Infidel in Forth Worth who is doing what he can to restrain the people from going crazy.

While the subject of what Christianity has done for woman is still under discussion, the action of the Southern Baptist Convention, which assembled in Augusta, Ga., May 6th is of interest. Two ladies were in the Arkansas delegation, and a committee of five was appointed to report on the question of admitting them. Three of the committee reported in the ladies' favor, and two were adverse. The convention, however, adopted the minority report, thus placing the Southern Baptist church on record against the equal rights of women. One of the Arkansas male delegates favored the admission of ladies, who, he said, not only contributed more, but did more mission work than the men. An opponent said he based his opposition on the "customs of their fathers and the word of God." While we favor the equal right of women in all things, we cannot help thinking they hav only themselvs to blame for the persistent snubbing they receive at the hands of the clergy. Let them leave the church, and refuse to longer be the "untiring beggars for its benefit," and they will soon be offered a premium to return. Without the women, the churches would shortly be destitute.

A good many ministers are taking upon themselvs the task of "answering" Elizabeth Cady Stanton's recent paper in the North American Review. In lieu of any evidence to support the claim that Christianity has benefited woman, the most of them abuse the "heathen" nations, and depict in sentences more nerve-harrowing than true the awful condition of their females. Several of these sermons hav reached us, but men who think that abuse of one religion will rehabilitate the character of another are hardly worth serious treatment. If Mrs. Stanton lived in India she would undoubtedly berate the sectarianism of the province in which she resided as soundly as she has the nominal religion of her own country.

We regret exceedingly, and we are sure the readers of The Truth Seeker will share the regret, to learn of the serious illness of the senior editor of the American Nonconformist, a paper that has in the past done valiant service in the cause of freedom. Mr. Vincent is prostrated from continued ill-health, aggravated by overwork. His breaking down is caused in some degree by the fanatical raid made upon him a year or so since by the Christian element of his town, from which trouble The Truth Seeker family was largely instrumental in rescuing him and his Nonconformist. We hope it will cheer his sojourn in the sick room to know that he has hosts of sympathizing friends who would rejoice to hear of his speedy recovery.

A Freethinking business man of this city recently met a Methodist gentleman engaged in the same line of trade. To the inquiry, "How's business?" the follower of the "prince of peace" responded, "Bad; going to the dogs. Oh, if they would only fight!" the prayer for battle having reference to the English and Russians, a struggle between whom, it is generally thought, would advance the interests of the United States. The Methodist was earnest, honest, and sincere in his wish, and the thought that war is a dreadful thing, to be avoided at almost any cost, never entered this mind devoted to the gathering of the almighty dollar. He was perfectly willing, and even anxious, that the Christians of Russia and England should slaughter each other that the pockets of the Christians of the United States might wax plethoric.

The Observer says: "Another movement is on foot to get the museums open on Sunday. It is the old plea that the working people cannot give up their time on secular days, and therefore are deprived of all opportunity to enjoy the museums. This is an old and oft-refuted plea for wrong-doing." We do not believe there is one person in this city who desires to visit a museum of art who cannot afford to take the time on any day he pleases to go." Prime must be approaching his dotage. Either he is fool enough to think there are no workers who wish to visit the museums, or that they can get a day off when they choose. His opinion, however, is of no account one way or the other except as showing that Presbyterianism is just where it was in Calvin's time.

A friend sends the following, which we observe is also going the round of the papers:

"Stephen Bulmer, the well-known English Atheist, recently deceased, left $5,000 to his co-worker, Bradlaugh; and to his wife, who had supported him for years, he left the princely allowance of $4 a week."

On the authority of the National Reformer, Mr. Bradlaugh's journal, we can state that this is a lie. Mr. Bradlaugh inherits only the residue in reversion: the widow is given the clear income and all the personal effects. Once before Mr. Bradlaugh had property bequeathed him, but he refused to accept it because the widow was left without proper subsistence. His action in that case, if known, would stop the circulation of the above paragraph in all but Christian journals.

George Standring celebrates the completion of the tenth volume of his Republican by printing his own portrait and a modest account of how and why he has for a decade advocated the establishment of a republican form of government for England. Mr. Standring is an ardent Freethinker and his shafts are directed against the church with the same frequency and force as against monarchy. He has the further merit of having been one of the warmest friends Mr. Bennett found in England. For his many virtues we regard him as Mr. McElsander regards Mr. Winter, and express the friendliness by the same quotation:

> "Hale be his heart, hale be his fiddle;
> Lang may his elbuck jink and diddle
> To cheer him through the weary widdle
> O war'ly cares;
> Till bairns' bairns kindly cuddle
> His auld gray hairs."

Sunday, May 17th, Mr. Beecher preached the first of a series of sermons on evolution, more particularly as applied to religion. This series of discourses, he said, would be the last of his life's work. He expects to put them into a book, and then die." If the sermons are all as radical as the slim reports show this to hav been, Mr. Beecher can congratulate himself that the Inquisition is gone, or he might die in an unpleasant manner. Some of the things he said are: "The unbelief of to-day is the faith of to-morrow. Skepticism unveils truth. The theology that is rising upon the horizon will continue to rise. Each succeeding generation will find new beams. You young men and maidens are living in a morning which thousands of noble natures desired to see, but they died without the sight. A great change has taken place in the churches. No church now is as it was forty years ago, unless it is away back in the mountains, remote from railroad and telegraph, and has been kept up there like a dried-up mummy. The churches that are out in the world hav changed and are changing. Some men are greatly alarmed over this. I rejoice at what they grieve over. Sunday is not kept as it used to be. They say the Sabbath has been popularized. Religion don't forbid cheerful converse nowadays, and Sunday don't begin on Saturday night. The churches are not so awful as they once were. Children are not petrified in them. The doctrins are not so rigorous as they used to be. Foreordination and election are not preached nowadays, except by exchange. Old-fashioned doctrinal preaching is going out. Many old doctrins hav been renounced or hav sunk into oblivion. Future retribution is only alluded to; eternal punishment almost never taught in the pulpit to-day—to the honor of the pulpit and the honor of God be it said. These changes cause much alarm among old-fashioned theologians. They are slow to license a man who is not perpendicular in theology. I am too wholly gone to be licensed anew, but I preach just the same. In the whole subject of religion there is far more cheerfulness and elasticity than there used to be. There is more social life. Sunday-school life is raised many degrees above anything that was known in my childhood. Into the theology of that day the idea of happiness never entered. Fifty years ago when a clergyman walked down the street children ran into doorways and hid."

The "mind-cure" craze has reached considerable proportions in Boston. The leading "Christian scientist" is a woman. She is also a "healer." She denies the reality of matter, and the existence of all natural laws. She also denies the existence of a human body, and of the so-called senses. The mind of man, she holds, is only a belief that man has generated in himself. When he thinks he is sick, he simple deludes himself. His sufferings are all the work of imagination. If he thinks he has a cancer or a broken leg, the "Christian scientist" convinces him by argument that his ailment is wholly imaginary, and then directs his alleged mind to a consideration of God, until the cancer disappears, and the fracture no longer exists. The Christian scientists are supported by many of the clergy of Boston, but the ministers of this city and Brooklyn hav discussed the subject of faith cure, and hold a general opinion that it is a humbug. For which rational advance we think they should be commended.

The Finlanders and Swedes are making an effort to effect the separation of church and state. A "Society for Religious Freedom" has been lately formed at Stockholm. Every man or woman who wishes to work for complete freedom in religion and the complete separation of church and state can become a member. The society is undenominational, and takes up a position of complete neutrality as regards the personal opinion of its members in matters of religion. It is the aim of the society to abolish all those laws, regulations, and institutions that still bind together church and state, and this aim it will endeavor to accomplish by means of meetings, publications, petitions, and other declarations of opinion, as well as by doing its utmost to influence the elections. Among the laws the society intends to get repealed are the blasphemy laws, the marriage laws, and the oath, instead of which last a simple affirmation is to be substituted. Marriage is to be considered a purely civil ceremony, and blasphemy is to disappear altogether from the legal code as an offense.

In the case of Barbour, Sheriff, vs. Louisville Board of Trade, on appeal from Louisville Chancery Court, Chief Justice Hines reversed the action of the lower court, granting exemption from taxation of the Louisville Board of Trade. His reasons were that the act grants a separate public privilege not "in consideration of public services," and is therefore unconstitutional. "It is not every enterprise that is incidentally beneficial to the public that will authorize the state to foster it at the expense of the people at large. The object must appear upon the face of the legislation to be for the public good, and of such a character as to call for the aid of the state to forward it in the exercise of a governmental function." This decision is sound, and, it seems to us, affords solid grounds upon which to tax the churches. The teaching of Christianity is an enterprise that in no appreciable way benefits the public, and the state has no right to foster it at the expense of the people at large. If some public-spirited Liberals of Kentucky could get this matter before Judge Hines's court, it might well be that they would win.

A correspondent of the Sun of this city has been collecting notes on the church attendance of the London churches. "I had read in a religious paper," he writes, "that the total sittings provided by all the churches, chapels, mission rooms, and halls in the capital are 1,398,792, of which about half are taken advantage of on the average. Reckoning the metropolitan population at 4,769,000, this does not indicate a torrid religious fervor. I took a few interesting statistics at three of the greatest sanctuaries of the city. At All Hallows, Barking, an old historical shrine, which, however, does not really possess the lion heart of Richard I. beneath its high altar, for the heart is in the museum of Rouen, there were just six devotees, including myself and a female pew-opener, to listen to the eloquent sermon of a distinguished Oxford Don. At St. Andrew Undershaft, in St. Mary Axe, so called from the relic of one of the three axes which served to decapitate the eleven thousand virgins long kept in that church, there were seven citizens and the clergy. In St. Paul I was quite puzzled over what I saw. There were people sleeping and eating, people engaged in conversation, people reading the papers, lads larking, and there was an old, dissipated-looking woman snoring so loud that it sounded as though something had gone wrong with the organ. There were brazen lovers behaving as if they had been in an English public park after sunset, and there were also a few who came there to pray. Having been told of a mission carried on day and night with the forlorn hope of improving matters, I hastened on to St. Thomas, a holy place out of Regent street. There is a small and narrow passage leading to it from this thoroughfare. I arrived as the congregation was leaving the church. It was a queer sight. The congregation seemed almost exclusivly composed of the harlots of Regent street and Leicester square and of thieves and rogues. Why had they gone there—for a job, for the fun, or for prayers? I don't know; but everyone must hope that the mission does some good. An esthetic-looking young priest, stooping and bald like a senil hermit, stood under the porch and shook hands with every outgoer as if in view of trying also what mesmerism could do. The lights of the shrine had been put out, yet he was still standing on the darkened threshold looking in the night for strayed friends. 'Bless'd be the Lord,' respectfully uttered a bonnetless, consumptiv-looking flower girl, as she passed by the divine. 'A few coppers, Father,' begged from him in her turn a reeling and painted creature, 'just to drink the 'ealth of the heverlasting.'"

Letters from Friends.

BLACH HAWK, COL., May 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The record of another life is closed forever, and another earnest Liberal has reached "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." On the 17th of March, Mrs. Eva Russell, after a short illness, died, aged 25 years and 1 month.

The deceased was a nativ of Blair, Nebraska, was raised by very religious parents, and at an early age joined the religious body known as the Christian church, of which she was an enthusiastic member for some time. But as she grew older, doubts of its rather rigid doctrins crept into her mind, and after struggling against them a little while she gave way and was soon known among the numerons clasa designated as "backsliders." About this time, a copy of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" having fallen into her hands, and having read it in great secrecy—for such literature was strictly forbidden in the family—she was so thoroughly convinced of the fallacy of the Bible, and the arguments were, to her, so conclusiv, that she earnestly desired her father to read it, "just to see the other side," she said. But he, like the majority of Christians, shut his eyes and refused to see.

Her short life was one complete story of well doing; although many unfortunate circumstances combined to make it singularly unhappy, she cheerfully and patiently went her quiet way. Her ready sympathy and many kind acts secured her a host of warm friends, and proved to some Christians that a "love for Jesus in the heart" is not always necessary to a gentle, loving, dutiful life.

Her friends would hav liked to hav a Liberal funeral, but owing to the painful nature of the disease (small-pox) that of course was impossible. And so, very early one cold, bleak March morning, a very few of us followed the dear remains over the long, rough road to the lonely little graveyard on the mountain-side, and there we left her, with the morning sun just touching the snow-crowned peaks with a softened light; they seemed to look down and kindly guard the poor grave where after life's fitful fever she slept so well.

Many long and weary days followed her death. We returned to the city a quarantined party, and shortly after others of our number were stricken by the dread hand of the same disease, and for weeks we were shut from the world. But we were not forgotten by the outside world. Black Hawk contains many good people. The good Dr. Reed was very kind, while our stanch and true Liberal friend, W. H. Germain, exerted every means in his power to lighten the gloom of those dark days when some of our friends lay dying and the recovery of others was doubtful. Such men as he owe no duty to any unknown or unknowable. They recognize only their duty to the known humanity around them; they are true to their own ideas of right; they follow the advice of Polonius to Laertes,

> "To thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man."

And as he is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we take this opportunity of thanking him for the feeling of universal brotherhood that prompted his untiring efforts in our behalf, being strangers to him. The churches here thought it advisable to forsake "the assembling of themselvs together," fearing that too great a zeal in his service would cause the Lord to show his appreciation by striking them with the disease, and so by the exercise of a little reason and common sense they were enabled to bridge over the time of danger and until they could meet together again and thank him for his kindly protection from the threatened evil. JESSIE BREWSTER.

ORANGE, CAL., April 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The "blunt and practical question" pro pounded by G. N. Hill is misleading when taken alone. Mr. Hill is a Prohibitionist, and his object in asking the question which appears so "childlike and bland" on the face of it is to sustain his position as a Prohibitionist and to demonstrate that Prohibition is just and right. Now, if the unanswerable logic of E. C. Walker on that mooted subject has made no impression on Mr. Hill's sensorium it is useless for me to make the attempt, but being a Yankee I will answer his question by asking another. If the many murders constantly being committed by religious fanatics or monomaniacs "do not giv me a right to vote against" the further perpetuation of religion, "what would?" Rum and religion are two gigantic evils, as history fully attests; and the evidence to substantiate this statement is very prevalent these days. Can one or both these evils be suppressed by law? Mr. Hill thinks the rum evil can be, but I do not; and the religion evil we all know cannot. E. C. Walker, who may hav equals in the ranks of the Liberals, but no superior as a logician, has fully demonstrated in these columns wherein Prohibition is wrong, so I shall not touch that side of the question, but will confine my remarks to the absurdity and impossibility of its accomplishment.

First, the unequal condition of society, matrimonial infelicity, and the general inharmony which prevails the world over between man and his environments, explain the cause of his recourse to stimulants and intoxicants. Man is constantly seeking real happiness; but finding it not, except in detached and limited quantities, he resorts to that which will produce the fictitious. Thus it has always been, and ever will be, until want and woe are exterminated, and nothing exists to cause mental perturbation or tenebrious reflections. "Opium fiends" are rapidly increasing in this country, and absinthe, a fearfuly ruinous intoxicant to mind and body, is becoming a prevalent drink. The rum evil sinks into comparativ insignificance when we reflect on the alarming increase of the two mind destroyers and imbecil producers just mentioned. The hold which opium retains upon the person who once commences its use is seldom broken except by death, and San Francisco furnished the case of a young man last year who committed a crime for the purpose of being incarcerated in prison, so he could overcome the habit which was leading him relentlessly to a miserable end. Were every distillery in the world razed to the ground, and the manufacture of liquors prohibited by law, with the penalty of death for infringement, man would still find the means to gratify his morbid cravings for intoxicants. Much of the "fire-water" now drank never saw the inside of a distillery, but was made from chemicals and water; and if the pure article were entirely prohibited, does any one suppose the impure would be lessened? A law might be passed, should Mr. Hill and enough others vote for it, to prevent the manufacture of nitro-glycerin, but the three ingredients of which it is composed could be purchased at as many different drug stores, if thought necessary, and then combined, and all the officials in state and government employ could not prevent its being made. Dynamite is now taken to England with ingredients separate and there mixed or compounded, and it is something England and Russia, with all their officials and great standing armies, cannot suppress; and when anyone for an instant supposes a state or the United States would be more successful in suppressing intoxicants, they must possess a very sanguin disposition. I am strongly opposed to drunkenness, opium-smoking, hypodermic injections of morphia when not prescribed by physicians in sickness, religious insanity, religious and rum murders, feticide, thieving, arson, and many other evils that afflict society; but I do not know of any law that could be passed which would prevent them. The law can punish the evil-doer, but it can not and never has prevented his evil deeds. Morality cannot be legislated into the world. It has always resulted from the growth of intelligence and ever will. The naturally moral and conscientious man needs no law to prevent his committing arson or murder, and the vicious and immoral, though needing one, according to the logic of some, is not restrained thereby. New laws are constantly being enacted, but they don't seem to lessen the number of inmates in our penal institutions. If law prevents as well as punishes crime, why is it? The stabbing of three innocent persons referred to by Mr. Hill shows the injurious effect of excited passions, but religious cupidity, jealousy, and revenge often lead to murder, and religion has still more murders to answer for than rum, though Mr. Hill hasn't yet made the proposition to suppress it by law. The rum curse of this country is bad enough, but future generations will find a worse one in the supremacy of the Catholic church, if that time, which is now feared, ever comes. The human passions are easily stirred by various causes, and unless some device can be suggested by Mr. Hill, and such advocates of forced morality, that will regulate man's passions as a "governor" does the speed of a stationary engin, these passions will at times override reason, and work injury to life and property, whether rum is made and sold or not. We can regret and deplore this fact, but we cannot remove it by legislation or any known means. All great changes are gradual, and if the people of this world ever attain that perfection which reformers behold in their "ideal" man, it will be by long ages of growth and progression, and not by legislativ enactments enforced by the iron hand of the law.

Yours for reason, first, last, and always, C. SEVERANCE.

PRESCOTT, IA., May 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Here is $3 for another year's subscription. I hope that you can make illustrations a permanent feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as that will materially help in getting the paper into the hands of new readers; but even without that THE TRUTH SEEKER was never as good as now I like the short discussions upon all questions, but am frequently amused, and sometimes annoyed, by the efforts of Infidels, in the interests of drunkard makers, trying to make the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in other states believe that Prohibition is a failure in Iowa. It is a success, except in a few places where men who hav become criminals through and by the prohibited traffic hav been successful in electing men of their own class and calling to office.

Laws prohibiting larceny, arson, and murder are too frequently violated in Iowa, but I hav heard no one advocating their repeal yet, and I hav never heard a temperance man or woman advocate the repeal of Iowa's temperance or prohibitory laws; nor did I, during the war, see a Union man or woman that was not in favor of prohibiting disunion.

The man that advocates the whisky traffic is not a temperance man, argue the question as he may.

Very truly yours, E CLARKE.

SNOWVILLE, May 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I promised you a report of the rendition of my spirit photograph as given by Mr. Keeler (when it should come). I waited months for it, and though I dunned and redunned, it came not, but finding I was determined to hav something for my money or denounce him as a fraud, he at last sent the following.

Now I leave it to you all if the rendition is satisfactory. I leave it to you if you or I had sent strange names from a strange place—names any schoolboy could pick up, and so lame an excuse for not giving those of my own friends—if you would think you had your money's worth?

Below is his circular. Don't you think he ought to refund the money, and pay me damages for loss of time and trouble? Do you wonder that I pronounce ninety-nine out of one hundred of all the spirit phenomena fraud? My whole trip has been just of this nature, and my entire experience before it and since I came back. No one can make planchet write for me, yet the advertisment says: "It has been proved beyond question that where a party of three or more come together, it is almost impossible that one cannot operate it. If one be not successful, let two try it together" It is ten or more years since I first tried planchet. This time I got a "magnetized" one, but with no better success.

You notice Keeler says my positiv nature repels many of my own friends, yet all along my trip I was told by the mediums that my mother, father, and sisters were present at the seances. My mother died while I was preparing to go. Of course if "coming back" was possible, she would hav been at each seance, and hav compelled me to know it was she. One line in her hand-writing would be a test. But, no; I could not get a medium to even giv me her name! Well, I'll do my part, I promised Keeler to advertise him. Here it is. E. D. S.

PIERRE L. O. A. KEELER,
SPIRIT-PHOTOGRAPH PSYCHOMETRIST.
44 DOVER STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Persons having received unrecognized spirit pictures from Mumler, Keeler, Hazelton, Brown, and other spirit artists, can send same to me for psychometrization, and I will obtain, through independent slate writing, names of spirits, date of decease, reason why they appeared on the plates, etc. Terms, $1.00 and five two cent stamps per picture. All pictures promptly returned, and in event of failure, money refunded.

"44 DOVER ST., BOSTON, MASS., April 4, 1885.

"MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER: I hav had a hard tussle with your photograph. It is the worst thing I ever tackled. I get the name of the lady at your back as Eliza D. Young, deceased in Burlington, Vt., May 16, 1882. The lady at the lower right of the photograph was Julia Montrose, deceased at St. Albans, Vt., in 1870, and the one over her was a sister, Adeline Whiting, of the same place, deceased in 1879. They say you did not know them, but as they hav frequently returned to earth conditions they could come in this way. Your positiv nature repels many of your own friends from you, although they do appear elsewhere.

I expect something more, and as I hav your address, I will mail it to you. P. L. O. A. KEELER."

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEX., April 19, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Christ's lambs of the Methodist persuasion are without a shepherd at this time on the Waco circuit. Their pastor, Sam. P. Wright, is a raving maniac on the new mode of worship craze, Sam Jonesism, introduced here last fall by that great theological crank. The Rev. Mr. Wright, attending, became enthused, and has since been conducting revivals on the same plan, imitating that great "clown-preacher," Sam Jones of Georgia, i.e., holding 6 o'clock A M. prayer-meetings, talking slang, etc. The poor man is really an object of pity, as well as his family, as I am reliably informed he wished to be released long enough to kill his wife and oldest daughter, for God had demanded it. He is now in the asylum at Austin, Texas. The last report states there are some hopes of his recovery. His friends attribute his demented condition to the loss of sleep and overwork in conducting a three weeks' revival at one of our Texas towns. Mr. Wright was above the average preacher intellectually, and was liked by his people.

Sam Jones is announced for Waco again in May, and I think the better class of Christians should write the lunatic-making crank to stay away, for very many ignorant priest-worshipers are almost crazy over prospects of hearing him again, and that to the neglect of better ministers, by paying the clown preacher their money and stinting their own pastor's salary. I see from reading various religious journals the clergy are somewhat jealous of these religious tramps, and if it were not for the fact that they (the evangelists) often enlarge the class to a more remunerativ "charge," the preachers in charge would not put up with them much longer, but the more sheep they hav to shear the greater the crop of wool and mutton.

D. F. MARRS.

KANE CITY, PA., May 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for your paper for the year 285 Inclosed also find a slip cut from the Pittsburgh Commercial of May 4th, which gives a horrible picture of the only Liberal town in existence. Coming from the source it does, viz., Clark Braden, stamps it as false, as I hav heard of him before.

In the fore part of last winter there came to this place a phrenologist by the name of Fields. I attended two of his lectures, which were, instead of lectures on phrenology, lectures on Christianity. He had among his charts the head of Ruloff the murderer, and took him as an example of the terrible effects of Infidelity. He said it was on account of his unbelief that he was one of the worst, if not the worst, of murderers on record.

After he got through I asked him if it would not be a good idea to get a few more charts and be sure to get among the rest the heads of Guiteau and Frank James, so that after he had shown what very bad people Infidels were he could enlarge upon the great and grand effects of belief in Christianity. "Oh," said he, "all Infidels are wicked. Look at Ingersoll—he is a blasphemer and a drunkard."

Now, Mr. Editor, I could stand the blasphemy all right, but when he said that Colonel Ingersoll was a drunkard I got somewhat "riled," and demanded his authority. He said he did not know Ingersoll personally, but he had good authority. I told him that I must know where he got his information, and he said, "Clark Braden, a preacher of the gospel." One Christian lady said she did not think Clark Braden told the truth. I am very certain he told what was not true about Colonel Ingersoll, and I think he has done the same with regard to the town of Liberal. WM. M. KENNEDY.

[The Rev. Clark Braden is a notorious liar, and what he says cannot be depended on in any instance.—ED. T. S.]

ALEXANDRIA, ONT., May 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a letter signed "Mary A. Vore," wherein dear Mr. Bennett is represented as having been a Spiritualist, and this is not the first time that our honored founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER is referred to in this manner, which I consider very unfair, as I am positiv Mr. Bennett was not a Spiritualist. He was tolerant enough to allow Spiritualists to enjoy their belief as well as other folks. He allowed them to discuss their ism in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will even admit that he sometimes wrote quite favorably of Spiritualism, but always ended his remarks by saying that he was not one of them.

Another reason I hav for saying positivly that Mr. Bennett was not a Spiritualist is that I believe I read all that Mr. Bennett ever wrote for the public, and hav always found him to express my own opinions, and I am as far from being a Spiritualist as anyone can be.

Mr. Bennett, like myself, admired the bright side of Spiritualism as a pleasant fancy, but could not see any truth in it, and you, Mr. Editor, must smile every time you tax your kindness to insert this false claim in your tolerant TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Bennett never said that death ends all, as Brother Winter does, but the fact that he did not say it is no proof that he did not believe it. He was not obliged to giv his opinion in the matter, and it would hav been very unwise for him to do it in the position he occupied. He probably believed, like all sensible men, that disorganization is the end of any phenomenon, that when one is dead he exists no more. The substance that composed him exists still and goes into the formation of life again, but does not make over the individual that died.

What do you think of Master Thumb Medium's letter? Is he joking or in earnest? Is he a crank or am I a lunatic? One or the other must be the case, possibly both, but Brother Thumb don't seem to know that he has two eyes and that an intersecting object at the proper point will giv him a double vision. I wonder if he ever closed one eye, or if he ever tried a stick in place of his thumb, and saw a shadowy spirit stick as well as a "shadowy spirit thumb."

It is really amusing to see some of those Spiritualists accuse us Materialists of ignorance because we cannot see the ghost. I cannot see that we are to blame; think the fault is in the artist who paints it so thin that one must draw like delirium tremens on his imagination to see it, or rather to imagin he sees it. The fact that they want us to believe in spirit life on such meager evidence is to me sufficient guarantee that they themselvs hav accepted on evidence altogether too thin for me. If I was told that the air we breathe and in which we liv, and without which there could be no life, is in itself a living substance, and that the portion of this air occupied by our body during life returns to the big bulk at the dissolution of the body and livs on as part of the whole, I would say that maybe, though I do not know it, but that each individual has a separate ghost that continues to liv in an individual state after the body that caused it is dead, I hav tried the last twenty years to believe, and the more I try the less I succeed, so, brother spirits, do not blame me; it is not my fault. If the cause of it is my ignorance, then I know no cure for ignorance and my case is hopeless. I am near onto fifty years, and hav spent my life so far reading and thinking, and I believe I hav read pretty near all Freethought and Spiritualistic works issued in this America, so a plea of ignorance will hardly do in my case. The cause must be a screw loose in my organs of thought, or in the organless spirits.

Yours for truth as far as I can see it,

CHAS. LAPERCHE, Materialist No. 3.

BOSTON, MASS, May 15, A.S. 285.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to thank Brother Hutcheson, of Leavenworth, Kan., for no less than three different things, the first of which is, for his use of our glorious Freethought calendar, and which calendar, now that it has the indorsement of the Bruno Statue Committee at Rome, must soon be recognized as the only proper dating for Liberals to use, it seems to me. The next thing I desire to thank him for is his manly attempt to answer my, as he thinks, "dull" question, but which quesion has certainly shown itself sharp enough to cut his anti-prohibition fingers, and very badly too, as he will see further on. And, lastly, I desire to thank him for his satisfactory acknowledgment that "meddling" with morals, business, or pleasure, can rightfully be done when these things "interfere" with rights and privileges. Better prohibition doctrin than that I hav never heard, and all that is necessary after such an admission, is for me to request of Brother Hutcheson an answer to the following question: Did not the sale and drinking of alcoholic liquor result in an "interference" with the rights of those three stabbed people spoken of in my last.

Thankfully yours, GEO. N. HILL.

BROOKLYN, May 12, 1885

MR. EDITOR: I notice in your issue of May 19th a communication from a person who signs as his name, "A. Brass." He states among several other very remarkable things that he is acquainted with most of the following mediums, namely, Foster, Slade, Davenports, Fox girls, and Eddy brothers, and that he is prepared to say that he (referring to Mr. Henry Charles) never caught Slade, nor Fox sisters, nor Eddy brothers, in any tricks.

He is also so very gentlemanly (?) as to state that Mr. Charles is guilty of telling a "lie of the first water" when he states (in your issue of April 11th) that every one of the above-named mediums hav been caught in trickery (take notice that in his communication Mr. Charles did not claim that he had caught these mediums imposing tricks upon a credulous audience).

He (Mr. Brass) seems to imagin that if he can prove to Henry Charles that Henry Charles personally has not caught these celebrated (?) mediums at their tricks, the reputations of these gentlemen (Slade, Fox girls, etc.) will immediately become cleared. He, apparently, does not seem to realize the fact that most of the above-named mediums hav been preven to be frauds by other people than Mr. Henry Charles.

If Mr. Brass will refer to page 150 of a work by Mr. Wm. B. Carpenter, entitled "Mesmerism, Spiritualism," etc., he will there find the sworn statement of Mrs. Culver who was a connection of the Fox girls by marriage. This lady gained the confidence of the Fox girls by offering to assist in their manifestations. This offer was accepted by the Fox girls, who, completely deceived as to the real object this lady had in view, revealed to her that the manner in which they produced their rappings was by their toes, but that in case of an emergency, like that when the Rochester Committee held down Catherine's feet, they got the Dutch servant girl to rap on the floor underneath from the cellar.

Catharine explained to Mrs. Culver how they held down and moved tables. She told Mrs. Culver that the reason why she asked people to write several names on paper, and then point to them until the spirits (?) rapped at the right one was, that she might watch the countenance and motions of the person, and in that way they could almost always guess right. She also explained to Mrs. Culver the manner in which all the rest of her tricks were imposed upon her credulous audiences. As soon as Mrs. Culver found out the fraudulent practices of these girls, she wrote down a full expose of the whole thing, which she swore to and of which statement a copy is given in the above named treatis.

In regard to the following mediums, namely, J. V. Mansfield, "Dr." Henry Slade, "Dr." H. C. Gordon, R. W. Flint, "Dr." Parker, and "Dr." Foster, I would say that if Mr. Brass will refer to a pamphlet by Pendie L. Jewett, entitled "Spiritualism and Charlatanism," he will there find that all of the above-named mediums hav been found to hav practiced trickery by a committee of seven gentlemen formed to investigate as to the truth of alleged Spiritualistic manifestation. Mr. Brass can also find some interesting facts regarding the exposure of the tricks of several prominent mediums in the files of the Herald, World, Times, and Sun for March, 1873.

Fraternally yours, CHAS. F. GAUL.

MERIDIAN, TEXAS, March 18, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had a hard time this winter to keep my cows from starving, and I must say that God does not temper the north wind to a poor cow. I think I am in just the same faith as T. Winters. I can't get outside of nature and don't want to unless I can find a better God than the Bible givs. A God that begs the widow's mite and the orphan's nickel is not the God for me.

I think I will send Mr. Hill and Mr. Fred Koezly an almanac, one that will settle their differences, as I hav seen one that says that Cæsar named the months and gave us the year and date as we now hav it. Goodrich's history (ancient) says that J. C. Christ was born about the year 23, but some historians put it about four years later, which would carry it to the year 27.

I hav read a sermon by the Rev. H. N. Couden. He claims everything except Paine and Voltaire. Hear him:

"I am the owner of the sphere,
Of the seven stars, and the solar year;
Of Cæsar's hand and Plato's brain,
Of Lord Christ's heart and Shakspere's brain."

I wish I could write so as to be understood, etc., but I hav not the confidence in myself that one should hav. I feel to say this, that Liberalism wants women like Mrs. S. B. Anthony and Cady Stanton, women that will go for the parson in the pulpit, etc.

I am like T. Winter, and want to know how many Naturalists there are of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. The Salvation Army attacked Meridian on the 1st of this month; they did no serious damage only to the bell—they rung it at four o'clock in the morning.

Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am hedged in on all sides by superstition and ignorance; little hope for Liberalism. Yours, S. D. GREER.

THAT MYSTERIOUS LETTER.

CINCINNATI, O., May 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue, page 298, this strange and somewhat funny letter claims to point out the way to discover Spiritualism. Well, sir, perhaps this comical method is about as good as any other, for, as to discoveries, neither Mrs. Elmina Slenker nor T. Winter hath discovered anything as yet, although tried hard to do so, but that which is impossible to discover most remain a blank. This letter is a big burlesque on this spiritual craze, and no doubt the writer thereof knows full well that no spirits, ghosts, goblins, demons, deities, spooks, specters, angels, or any other unnatural thing, exists only in the frenzied brain of fanatics. Sir, all this antiquated nonsense is the relic of a barbarous age, which should now be consigned to oblivion. The two unswerving Materialists mentioned in this queer letter is proof against Spiritualistic bugaboo, or any superstition which exists. It's only a question of time, and the tricks and schemes of religious swindlers will cease, and Materialism, the grandest truth in nature, will triumph over deceit and falsehood. Hasten on the happy time. T. WINTER, Materialist.

GALESBURG, ILL., May 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: You will please indulge me once more to talk through your columns to my brother Liberals who are so loth to giv up the worship of the goddess of Liberty "to get drunk if they want to." Should this be taken out of their arguments there would be but little left. It is the same in friend Hutchison's reply to Mrs. Snyder's appeal to his manhood, asking him, Shall this privilege be spared you because you can use and not abuse it? He says moderate drinkers do not want their liberties taken from them.

Here I appeal to the better feelings of all such. Should they hav a next-door neighbor who had the misfortune to be born with an appetite for liquor, and gets drunk every chance he gets, and abuses and starves his family (this is the condition of thousands and thousands of otherwise respectable men), is it not selfishness in them to refuse to dispense with the use of liquor if by doing so it would cause the happiness of their neighbor? This any unselfish man will do unless the use of it would add more comfort to him and his family than the use of it produces misery and loss to his neighbor (each one exercising the liberty asked for). Here lies all the argument in the question. If the use that is made of liquor produces enough more misery and loss than it does good as to justify a radical reform, then he who has a respect for his neighbor's happiness the same as his own needs no law to reach the reform wished for. Laws are only needed for the selfish man. Do not all Liberals claim it is man's duty to make his neighbor happy if possible?

It looks strange to me to see a man who condemns the worship of a sectarian God, and demands laws and the repeal of laws to secularize our government, opposing all laws and repeal of laws that would cut off the worship of the goddess of Liberty to get drunk. Is not the worship of the sectarian God as sacred to the Christian class of the community, as the worship of the goddess of Liberty to drink liquor is to the drinking class of the community?

It is the hight of silly nonsense to claim that the privilege to drink liquor does not carry with it the privilege of getting drunk.

I hope, if I ever write again upon the liquor question, I will hav the pleasure of meeting it upon its true merits, profit and loss, usefulness and injury, good and evil, resulting from its use. It is laughable to see the ingenuity used in arguing on everything but the point at issue. Friend Hutchison covers all existing evils: "And if the evil of the use of liquor is stopped by a prohibitory law in Kansas, under a promis the people will get rid of all other evils, even the stealing of money and horses can be stopped by not having any." (This last is the best point in his argument, as no one will dispute it.) And he closes by saying, "If we persist in prohibiting all that has evil in it, we may as well petition the Great I Am to prohibit, blot out, the existence of our sin-stricken earth."

What is such argument used for. To make the idea of the prohibition of liquor ridiculous, having no other argument.

ISAAC PADEN.

P.S.—How many thumb mediums hav you on your subscription list? If not too many, I will pay their subscriptions if they will only keep quiet, and not expose modern Spiritualism any further. Yet as it was intended for the special benefit of Brother Winter and Aunt Elmina, I may be doing wrong by trying to stop further disclosures, for it truly is about as good an argument on (against) modern Spiritualism as I hav seen. It outdoes the toe-joint and knee-joint rappings of the Misses Fox. I. P.

ELKTON, DAK., May 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find ten dollars to be appropriated as directed. I was away all winter, and hav allowed my subscription to get behind. Many thanks for your sending it along. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav had it from the first. I like Freethinkers. I like the "Secular Union." I like and feel grateful to the brothers in the field. The whole scheme is developing to my entire satisfaction, but not fast enough to suit a man who has no patience with superstition. Your liberality in publishing every side is commendable, and I only smile when some one growls at Brother Winter or at Sister Elmina. I also smile when one prates about land. I guess they never heard of the homestead law, or is it not more likely they want to jump an improved claim. This government never oppressed me. It never owed me a living, but it has given me every chance to make one for myself. That is all I ask Don't we owe the government assistance and support? Did the grumblers go out in 1861? I guess not. But never mind that, let us work harmoniously to see that superstition gains no new hold upon the people, and to try to relax the hold she already has. We hav every reason to be encouraged. The revivals of last winter were in very many cases dead failures. In fact men are not converted any more. I feel it is wicked for a healthy man to sell intoxicants for his living, and it is equally wicked, and more contemptible, for men to make a "tony" living off the fears of the ignorant, but mostly by scaring women and children.

Yours with pleasure, DENNIS JACOBS.

FARLEY, IOWA, May 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The Young Men's Christian Association of Dubuque has sold its effects, closed its doors, and disbanded. Lack of encouragement—financial and otherwise—is the main reason for the steps taken. This, in a city of nearly 30,000, is encouraging to the Infidel.

The Rev. Mr. Harrison, Congregational minister of Dubuque, has been forced to resign and seek another congregation, because he would not vote for Mr. Blaine for president. The church is divided, some for and some against Mr. Harrison, and the split is likely to be very damaging to the peace and harmony of the church, as the war has got into the papers and is red-hot on both sides.

The Presbyterian preacher of our town has gone to greener pastures, as his congregation here was unable to support him; at least, that is the reason he gave for leaving, but some people are uncharitable enough to think that a certain slander suit that was brought against him by one of his members, placing damages at $10,000, had something to do with his leaving. Whatever the cause of his going, the church is almost dead and cannot last much longer unless there is a great change for the better.

The "Modern Balaam" is rich, and shows the situation far better than words can express it. The cartoon ought to be printed by the million and be posted up in all the highways and byways in every part of the Christian world. I hope that you will make it one of The Truth Seeker Leaflets so that we can get hundreds of them to scatter over the country.

It has been snowing here to-day. Ice froze an inch thick last night. Our farmers are usually planting corn by this time, but there is nothing done as yet toward preparing the ground for corn. H. GILMORE.

FRANKFORD, MO., April 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: By way of introduction, you will please find inclosed $3, which is, I believe, the subscription price of your paper for one year. This, no doubt, is all you will see or hear from me for a year, while I shall receive from your hands each week truths, facts, thoughts—truths that are truths without disbelief; facts that are facts without faith; thoughts that will stand the test of reason. Freethinkers, or free speakers, are gaining numbers here slowly. The majority clasp their holy book, and as they hav been taught believe every word. Poor souls! they do not know what that book contains only as told them by their sky-pilots. They don't know that the God they worship ever received the spoils of war, that he encouraged crime and vice in all their forms. At the same time they are gifted with power to know, to feel, that three are one and one is three, and claim the right to tell me I will go to hell if I don't believe. I say, "Hell forever, rather than a hypocrit for life," Yours truly, F. D. HUTCHINSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

May: a Fragment.

Long, long ago in yonder glade,
Beside the brook's clear flowing,
Where, all amid the leafy shade,
The violets were growing,
The twilight shadows gathered round
Two little children playing,
With careless mirth and merry sound—
Two little children Maying.

Dear little Bess—her golden hair
Fell all in tangled tresses
Upon her shoulders, brown and bare,
Or wooed the wind's caresses;
Upon the velvet of her cheek,
To music of her laughter,
The dimples played at hide and seek
With sunbeams chasing after.

. . . . . .

Oh, that above the brooklet's flow
I now might hear her calling,
As in that time of long ago
When twilight shades were falling!
She sleeps amid the violets there—
The pretty violets creeping
And singing gentle requiems where
Dear little Bess is sleeping.

An Old Proverb

Pouting, my darling, because it rains,
And flowers droop and the rain is falling,
And drops are blurring the window panes,
And a moaning wind through the lane is calling
Crying and wishing the sky was clear,
And roses again on the lattice twining!
Ah, well, remember, my foolish dear,
"'Tis easy to laugh when the sun is shining."

When the world is bright and fair and gay,
And glad birds sing in the fair June weather,
And summer is gathering, night and day,
Her golden chalice of sweets together;
When blue seas answer the sky above,
And bright stars follow the sun's declining,
Why, then 'tis no merit to smile, my love;
"Tis easy to laugh when the sun is shining."

But this is the time the heart to test,
When winter is near and storms are howling,
And the earth from under her frozen vest
Looks up at the sad sky mute and scowling;
The brave little spirit should rise to meet
The season's gloom and the day's repining;
And this is the time to be glad, for, sweet,
"'Tis easy to laugh when the sun is shining."

History of a Hat.

One day as I was passing by a shoe-shop, and remembering that I had some repairs I wished done on one of my boots, I stepped in and gave it to the shopman to mend.

I then took a seat on the outside in the shade of the awning near the window, where I observed was an old hat which had been substituted for a broken pane. It had a look of seediness and individuality that took my attention, and I began speculating upon its previous history. In the absence of any one to talk to or something to read, I said to myself, "I should really like to know that hat's career?"

"Would you?" said a voice close by me. On looking around and seeing no one near, the voice continued, and I soon perceived it came from the hat itself. "Well, if you wish it, I will tell you some of my varied life which I still remember. My first recollection is of being dipped in a black dye until I was almost suffocated, then I was pulled and beaten, and put upon a wooden block and made to stand there and dry; next a fine fur coat was given me, and that was rubbed and polished until it shone like silk. When lined and finished, I was put in a nice paper box, and, with many others, was sent a long way off, where I was taken out and placed upon a shelf in a large store, and I felt quite proud of my high position, as I ornamented the very top shelf on one side the room.

"I was so wrapped up in paper that I could not see anyone, but I could hear people call for me sometimes, but I was objected to on account of my high price.

"One day I was taken down and showed to a gentleman, who smoothed my crown, put me on his head, and surveyed me and himself in a large mirror opposit, and I looked so nice on his head of fine, curly hair, sweetly perfumed, I was delighted when he said he would take me, and put down a ten-dollar gold piece as my price without saying a word about my being too dear.

"As he walked out upon the street, I put on a most jaunty air, and began to feel quite proud to see that I was better looking than most of those I saw on the street, and to hav so many people bowing to me, or, it might hav been, the handsome face I shaded.

"My new owner soon entered a house and passed into a large room where was a company of richly dressed people that I perceived was a wedding party, and I belonged to no other than the distinguished bridegroom, there to wed a beautiful and rich heiress. The bride met him and, taking me in her soft, gloved hand, remarked that I suited her taste and was a very stylish hat. To this compliment I gave a nod of thanks as she placed me on a stand, where I was witness of the nuptial ceremonies.

"The bride looked pale and a tear stole down her sost cheek so unused to sorrow; but not of that bitter grief I afterward saw her shed.

"I cannot relate the many scenes that followed for a year or more; but, after that time, I used to be frequently doffed among a pile of hats on a table at night, most of them smelling of whisky and tobacco smoke, while my owner and a number of men sat at small tables, playing with bits of pictured pasteboard, which they held in their hands, keeping them screened from the view of those around.

"Large piles of money, laid upon the table, rapidly changed hands by some magical power of these different colored little papers.

"There were bottles and glasses filled with some kind of pungent fluid that they all drank from time to time, and, I noticed, caused my owner to use bad language and to stagger on his way home. Once he stumbled and fell, and I rolled off his head into the gutter, and received several severe bruises that sadly damaged my good looks ever afterwards, as well as my owner's.

"One night, after a mishap of this kind, on reaching home—I was always glad to get home, where soft hands smoothed out my rumpled coat and put me away in a quiet nook—but this time all was still; no one came to meet us, and I was retained on his head as he went to the bedside of his loving wife, who was deathly pale, with a look not of earth in those beautiful eyes. Placing her arms around his neck, she asked him to promis her never more to go to those bad places.

"I felt ashamed that I, too, had beent here, though it was ever against my wish or inclination. A few days thereafter, with a broad band of black crape around my crown, I bent over the white, sweet face of my dead mistress, whose loving eyes were now closed forever. Not long afterwards my owner sold me for three dollars to a man who took me to a shop and had me dressed over, and when he put me on his head and surveyed himself in the glass of his shaving-box lid, I felt no longer proud of my good looks, but believed I had fallen into good hands from the neat and benevolent appearance of my new owner. I soon learned that my present possessor was a preacher, and in time I became to look as clerical as he, and could hav repeated several of his written sermons, which I often carried about for him. After being worn for a year or two, I noticed that I was getting rather shabby, and the preacher would put me under his seat instead of on the desk, as formerly, when in my new polish. At this indignity I turned up my brim in chagrin, and refused to sit upon his head with grace or dignity. Seeing this, he sold me to a newsboy for a lot of papers, and I was pleased to exchange the bald head I had so long covered for the sunny curls of the boy, although I sat rather loosely on his little, round head, and was held on by one of his hands, when the wind blew hard down the street.

"Turning into an alley-way, the boy entered a little house where were his two sisters, orphans like himself. They took me in their hands and tried to improve my looks by pulling out a wrinkle here, and bending in a bump there, while their comments on my general appearance was not very flattering; yet, as it was all in good humor, I did not mind their remarks, but hoodwinked the younger as she put me upon her head.

"One day, as my boy owner was going his daily rounds with his newspapers to sell, he saw a man standing at the corner of the street who was intoxicated and asked the boy to lead him home. The boy, not rightly comprehending him, led him to his own home in the alley-way. On looking around the room, he espied me on the floor, and taking me up, he discovered a mark he had made on me when he first bought me for his wedding hat, and passing his hand caressingly over my dilapidated fur coat, while it trembled with emotion and dissipation, he spoke to himself in low tone something about the past that couldn't be recalled, and taking out his purse, gave the boy a five-dollar gold piece, and added, 'I will see to it that you and your sisters are sent to school, and I will try to amend my past life by doing what good I can to others in the future.'

"Soon after this, I was thrown out into the street, and this man, seeing me there, picked me up and put me in his window, where a pane of glass was broken by some boys playing ball in front of his shop, and no doubt this is the last humble use I shall fulfil."

Just then a gust of wind blew the hat out the window, and it went whirling on down the street, out of sight. I arose, went in, paid the man for mending my boot, when he remarked that he would now go and get a pane of glass and put it in his window, "for," said he, "that old hat has been very good to keep out the cold, but bad to let in the light."

It was evident that he did not know how enlightened it was.

Thus, thought I, are many persons misjudged by one act or appearance, because their better deeds are unwritten and unknown.

Home Influence.

A dirty little face peeked in at my window a few days since, and said, "Mrs. Willumms, please giv me a flower." The little hand outstretched to receive them was black with dirt. I said; "Charlie, those hands are too dirty to hav my flowers. If you will come in and wash your face and hands I will giv you some flowers." His black eyes danced as he said, "I'll do it." After washing he came back. I said, "How nice you look!" With a mischievous look he said, "It won't stay clean, for my mamma says it is no use to wash or dress me up, for I get soiled so soon." I gave him the flowers; he buried his little face in amongst them and said, "Thank you; I will go home and plant them in my garden." "Charlie," I said, "they will wither and die if you put them in the earth; put them in a glass of water." "Oh, dear," he said, "my ma won't hav them in the house; she don't love them—they make a litter. I can't hav them there." So I told him to plant them in his little garden and giv them water, and they would liv for a while. I could but think if that mother loved flowers, one of nature's most beautiful gifts, and entered into her little boy's feeling, shared with him and took an interest in what he loved, and helped him cultivate flowers, oh, how much better it would be! As Aunt Elmina says, interest ourselvs in what concerns our little ones; make them our equals; make home one of the most attractiv places on earth; and when they become men and women they will not leave it. It is the home influence that tells the story. You will often hear parents exclaim: "Why is it that my boys are so bad? Never at home only to their meals, and late at night they return from either a billiard room or some other place not half as good." I find that such young men as these are the ones that found no place for them at home, where children were sent outdoors so as not to litter the house; and when they became older they sought for pleasure outside of home. Oh, we mothers can't be too careful. We must make home one of the sweetest, best places on earth for them, enter into all of their little pleasures, furnish them with the best of books and with music. I will risk our boys and girls with such a home; they will grow up to be a comfort to us in our old age.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—Enigma.

My 1, 6, 8 is an animal.
My 2, 7, 9, 11, 3 is a vegetable.
My 4, 2, 13, 6, 1, 14 is to comfort in sorrow.
My 6, 5, 9, 10, 5 is to stain.
My 12, 9, 10, 14 is a tree.
My whole is a European city.

A. Laurie Sailor.

2.—Charade.

My dearest friend, Roxana Lee,
Has traveled far and wide;
Has been to many foreign climes,
And sailed the ocean's tide.

In traveling o'er the earth's broad fields,
My first she always longed to be;
Although my second's dangerous hand
Prevented her my first to see.

My whole with heavy hand had laid,
Miss Lee so close to death's dark door,
That when at last my first she saw
She then desired to roam no more.

Altoona, Pa. William J. Burns.

3.—Personal enigma.

An aged friend I now present,
And yet my puzzle bold
Says if his name as one be blent,
And then to good old England sent,
He is a two-year-old.
Bereft of his half sister now
A pair of equal age behold.
Again behead them, I avow
This triumph still is told,
A triumph over death and sin,
For still enough is left to win.

Rekab Semaj.

4.—Prize riddle.

You can find me in the poor man's home,
And in the palace gay;
You can see my form where'er you roam
Or wander far away.

I am found in every land on earth,
'Mid cold intense or heat;
You can find me by the dollar's worth
In the very food you eat.

To some I always am a friend,
To some a deadly foe;
While some to me a hand do lend
To scatter human woe.

To many men I bring great gain,
To others war and strife;
While some in sorrow and in pain
Through me hav lost their life.

Answer to army problem in Children's Corner, May 2, 1885.

I found within the puzzle box
A sort of soft-shelled nut,
From which I took the kernel,
With just a single butt.
Remember that the general rides,
And thus observes them all,
Just ten miles down the marching line,
To where the foot shall fall.
Ten miles back along the line,
Just this and nothing more;
Though some may think he surely rides
On down the entire corps.
The general then turns round again,
And riding toward the head,
Gets there again their camping-time,
When all incline to bed.
You see I mashed this soft-shelled nut;
Now, rodents, cast your smiles,
For the distance that the general rides
Is five and thirty miles.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. Leah Underhill, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. "'Little Lessons' are grand. I hashed and rehashed the lesson on spiders this evening in the Sunday-school. I am running two Sunday-schools. The children are slow in learning the mystery of the God-head; in comprehending the Trinity; but their eyes brighten and they take kindly to discourses on snails, toads, spiders, and lizards, so I think I'll keep it up."—Bertie Steno.

Poetry.

Free Will versus Necessity.

I never could love merely from a command,
But easy enough from affection;
Against that old saying, "Believe or be damned,"
I hav a decided objection.
Whenever an object's presented to me,
Congenial, attractiv with beauty,
I love it—as everyone plainly can see—
From necessity rather than duty.

Whence comes one's belief but by searching of facts,
And drawing from them our conclusions,
Inspecting the nature and motiv of acts
Regardless of faiths and delusions?
"Free will" is a humbug, but still how persistent
This doctrin is taught bidding man to rejoice!
While blackbirds could be just about as consistent
As the dogma of free will dependent on choice.

Is the human will free? If so, it can act
Independent of motiv or choice. And it still Must act uncontroled. Now is this the fact,
And, if not, what becomes of this boasted free will?
Love and fear both compel this free will to obey,
The former's attractiv, an object of beauty,
The latter, repulsiv, hath torment, they say;
We obey love from pleasure regardless of duty.

Love is attraction, fear is repulsion,
Between these two forces the human will's placed,
To the force that is greater it yields from compulsion,
Here's your free will in choice—how is that to your taste?
How little we know, how much we believe!
Let us only affirm what we prove in due season,
Let's banish intolerance that tends to deceive,
Accept of no faith until tested by reason.

All motion is change. Can you move and not stir?
Can you think, plan, or breathe without motion?
In fine,
Can you liv without motion? Yet Christians aver
An unchangeable God does both place and design.
If God is unchangeable how can he act—
Since an act implies change?—or how can he plan,
Design, and create, can such be the fact,
Unless he be finite and changing—like man?

Man, being imperfect, must reason and plan,
Design and contrive, separate and combine,
To accomplish his purpose, O weak, puny man!
Necessity drives thee to plan and design.
How much we are told about God and divinity,
Design and foreknowledge, and boundless infinity!
They are inferred assumptions! What know we about them?
Christians, giv us more proofs else Agnostics may doubt them. HOMER A. BILLINGS.

"BIBLE MORALS"

Mrs. Eva Barnes, secretary of Clara (Pa.) Liberal League, thus writes: "I hope never to be without 'Bible Morals.' I hav often found myself where I would hav given a fortune to hav had that to quote from in defense of my position and in opposition to clerical and orthodox false statements. It is invaluable."

"ALL IN A LIFETIME."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: May I say a word about Miss Wixon's novel? We hav still a long and bitter war before us, and this book is a new weapon in our hands. It is indeed not a battle-ax with which we can cleave the heads of our adversaries, or a lance of logic with which we can at once unhorse the knights of the cross; nor will it, like a rough (Wintery) wind, chill the heart of the Christian traveler and cause him to tighten his cloak of superstition. It is more like the gentle sun, whose warmth will render the supernatural cloak so oppressiv that its wearers will throw it off of their own accord.

It shows that belief in the Bible is no guarantee of goodness, and that true virtue is just as natural as vice, with this difference, that the former is the flower of nature, while the latter is only a noxious weed.

As a lesson in the philosophy of life, this romance will appeal to thousands who would never read our dry debates, or follow our deep delvings into the mysteries of the Unknowable. The masses will not think much, at least not correctly, for so little is known of the mental mechanism. People think in much the same manner that they eat; that is, they are guided simply by appetite, and they are perfectly satisfied with poison if it is only sweet to the taste. Like the toper, they do not consider the fever and pain of the morrow if they can only be happy to-day. They use their brains about as intelligently as a painter might work in the dark, picking up the nearest brushes and simply guessing at the colors. Such people, who liv in the dark, who only feel, we must meet in the dark. We must follow them home into the castles of their hearts, beating down, as we go, the thick hedge of ignorance which now obstructs the light of reason. In this part of our labor nothing can help us more than good works of fiction, for nothing appeals to us all more quickly than the old, old theme of love. Around this magic cord, which is the marrow of all good novels, may be woven words of wisdom which are sure to kindle thought, even though they do not continue to feed the flame. This is just what Miss Wixon has done, and she deserves all the encouragement we can giv.

The story is really excellent, both as to style and substance. Like a good play, it makes us laugh and cry with the same breath. It describes a variety of characters, in sunshine and shadow, just as they exist in the real world, and powerfully illustrates the terrible consequences to a confiding woman of allowing the accident of association and the persistence of a villain to determin her choice of a husband.

From the tone of the book, it is easy to judge that the author is personally a lady of the purest and noblest instincts, and we can proudly point to her character as a rebuke to those who assert that the highest type of woman is to be found only in the church. Let us show our appreciation of this effort in a substantial way. Yours, EDGAR C. BEAL.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

Thanks to the Truth Seeker Company for a copy of the ANNUAL of the present year, containing, besides much of the best thoughts of the ablest writers of the age, the pleasant and highly intellectual faces of the household, not of faith, but of knowledge.

I take pleasure in looking at them, two of whom I hav met on this coast—Dr. J. L. York and Colonel Kelso.

I thought it looked a little embarrassing for the colonel to be put on a page alone with five strongminded women, especially as I know him to be very diffident toward the ladies, for when I was lecturing in San Francisco in 1872 he was present one evening and was called to the platform to make some remarks. He came forward, glanced at the number of ladies seated on it, and took his stand below it. It might hav been that he thought himself tall enough to overlook the audience without taking the few steps higher.

Although the portraits are only one-third women, it is a great gain toward their intellectual equality with men, and when women hav had time for the development of their minds through hereditary instincts—the innate law of progress—men may find they hav helpmeets in the higher as well as in the lower departments of life. What brain power may not then be developed? Problems that seem now so hard to solve may be only recreation for minds then to grapple with and prove their relations to life and its destiny. What Mr. Ingersoll says of each person seeing only in accordance to his or her capacity to see is very true indeed, as when I visited the Yosemite valley and falls, and would stand enraptured before the majestic wonders of the scenes presented to view on every hand, I would hear the most commonplace expressions by those in company, that would strike my feelings like a blow upon the physical form, and I would often go out alone to commune in silence with these mighty voices of nature whose language is felt and heard by the inner sense of perception and sound.

The poem by Courtlandt Palmer is superb. S. P. Andrews, the Bishop Berkeley of our day, soars so high in his philosophy that it is hard for the keenest eye of the intellect to follow him, yet one gets glimpses of another world and a new order of things which is transcendently grand. No doubt he is blazing the way for the new highway of progress.

S. P. Putnam is truly the right man in the right place, as well as the efficient corps of workers within the Liberal ranks, with so able a band of women to aid in the grand work of spreading the truth broadcast, and weeding error from the minds of the young. I hope to be able ere long to not only, like Mr. Preston, use my pen, but to assist financially in the cause of Liberalism. All honor and success to those in the front of the battle, who are making way for the liberty of future generations.

Bishop Creek, Cal. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

"WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND," AND OTHER POEMS.

This little brochure contains nine poems written in the well-known masterly style of the author, to which is added Holdreth's "Giv Us Light," often recited with peculiar and significant emphasis by Mr. Watts. They are all excellent and Liberal reading, as indeed is all that our friend Putnam writes. The book is a little gem, to be tucked in our pocket and pulled out and read when traveling on the railway train, when we feel "blue," tired, sick of earth's racket, and still more so of its ignorance, bigotry, and selfishness, or when, of a Sunday, we "lop" on the lounge for a rest.

We can read them over and over (and we can't do that with all poems) and be rested and refreshed every time. The price is so cheap—only ten cents—that we can buy them, as we buy sugar, by the dollar's worth, and scatter them broadcast, and thus benefit the masses, and help at the same time a faithful, hard-working, and worthy friend of the cause of freedom and humanity.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

SIGNIFICANT. NEW AND BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIV.

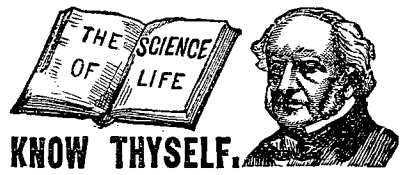
FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

(Design patented Feb. 24, 1885.)

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain tha benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

DESCRIPTION:



The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3 00, $3 50, $4 00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt. OTTO WETTSTEIN,

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

READ not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read wholly and with diligence and attention.—Bacon's Essays.

IF we are to suppose a miracle to be something so entirely out of the course of what is called nature that she must go out of that course to accomplish it, and we see an account given of such miracle by the person who said he saw it, it raises a question in the mind very easily decided, which is, is it more probable that nature should go out of her course, or that a man should tell a lie? We hav never seen, in our time, nature go out of her course, but we hav good reason to believe that millions of lies hav been told in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that the reporter of a miracle tells a lie.—Paine's Age of Reason.

VANITY FAIR is a queer place at best, and, amid all the confused outcries that rise ceaselessly from its noisy inhabitants, the screams and curses of rival religious quacks are surely the fittest to provoke a bitter smile. We may pity the poor pilgrim groaning in Doubting Castle, and despise the impotent fury of Giant Pope in his ancient den; but the empty brag of charlatans and humbugs in the fair itself, though they are masquerading in the most imposing of robes, is best met with silent contempt. Let us trust that, somehow or other, the mad bustle will subside in time, and that the great world will blunder in its own clumsy fashion into some tolerable order, and some scum of effete superstition be worked off in the chaotic fermentation.—Leslie Stephen.

IN these days mind without muscle has greater power than muscle without mind.—Walter Bagehot.

> BENEATH the rule of men entirely great,
> The pen is mightier than the sword.
> —Bulwer's Richelieu.

KNEELING or sitting at the sacrament can in itself tend no more to the disturbance of the government or injury of my neighbor, than sitting or standing at my own table; wearing a cape or surplice in the church can no more alarm or threaten the peace of the state than wearing a cloak or coat in the market. Being rebaptized no more make a tempest in the commonwealth than it doth in the river, nor than barely washing myself would do in either. If I observe Friday with the Mohammedan, or Saturday with the Jew, or Sunday with the Christian; whether I pray with or without a form; whether I worship God in the various and pompous ceremonies of the Papists, or in the plainer way of the Calvinists, I see nothing in any of these, if they be done sincerely and cut of conscience, that can of itself make me either the worse subject to my prince, or worse neighbor to my fellow-subjects, unless it be that I will, out of pride or overweeningness of my own opinion, and a secret conceit of my own infallibility, take to myself something of a godlike power, force and compel others to be of my mind, and censure or malign them if they be not.—Locke's Toleration.

I READ the other day an account of a meeting between John Knox and John Calvin. Imagin a dialog between a pestilence and a famin. Imagin a conversation between the block and the ax. As I read their conversation it seemed to me as though John Knox and John Calvin were made for each other, and that they fitted each other like the upper and lower jaws of a wild beast. They believed happiness was a crime. They looked upon laughter as blasphemy. They did all they could to destroy every human feeling, and to fill the mind with the infinit gloom of predestination and eternal damnation. They taught the doctrin that God had a right to damn us because he made us, but that is just the reason that he has not a right to damn us.—Ingersoll's What Must We Do to be Saved?

IN the history of spiritual civilization and of European progress, Arminius and his followers take an honored place, as daring to stem the current of tendency in their time, and to maintain, with their lives in their hands, that the clay, if it ceases to be clay and becomes human, has a personality not to be extinguished by God himself; a personality involving rights which, if justice admits of any definition whatever, can be pleaded against power even when infinit.—Peter Bayne.

WE grow by admiration, hope, and love.—Wordsworth. He that borrows the aid of an equal understanding deludes his own; he that uses that of a superior, elevates his own to the station of the man that he contemplates.—Edmund Burke. No one can be a great thinker who does not recognize that as a thinker it is his first duty to follow his intellect to whatever conclusion it may lead.—J. S. Mill.

THERE is nothing that we are such spendthrifts of as of health. We spare everything sooner than that, though, whatever we sacrifice, it is worth nothing without it.—Locke. We need to know how to liv more wisely, how to keep healthy, and to know and observe the laws of our being, instead of believing a theology which can make man neither wiser, stronger, nor better. We want to rid the earth of its priestly machinery, and put in its place rational laws and rational methods that consult the advancement of humanity. The Christian dogmas do not solve any of the problems of life, do not make it easier to liv, nor do not add pleasure or happiness to life.—L. K. Washburn.

"WILL it pay now for you to speak out boldly against the errors of our old religion? Will it prove any advantage to you to urge the adoption of this new faith? Look at your business, which will be wholly ruined if you come out openly as a Christian. Your old friends will desert you. Just be content to hold your peace. Entertain what views you will in secret, but, for policy's sake, keep silent." These words, which might hav been with propriety addressed to the convert to Christianity in the third century, are precisely similar to those which the majority of Radicals, Agnostics, Secularists, etc., in the nineteenth century hear daily from their friends of the (now) old faith.—Stoddard's New Faith. (No 119 Truth Seeker Tracts.)

Odds and Ends.

THE fourteen-year-old school-boy who doesn't "play truant" when Barnum's circus comes to town is about ripe enough for a pair of angel wings.

"TENNYSON can't write a poem on the American navy," says an exchange. Judging from recent developments, Lord Tennyson can't write a poem about any navy.

THEY are making rapid advancement in civilization in the far West. The citizens of Jug Tavern, Idaho, hanged five members of the local vigilance committee last week.

AN Auburn shoe factory employee, who wanted his pay raised not long ago, took occasion to touch his employer on the subject during a lull in conversation at a church sociable, and the plan worked admirably.

"PA, who was Shylock?" Pater familias (with a look of surprise and horror): "Great goodness, boy; you attend church and Sunday-school every week, and don't know who Shylock was? Go and read your Bible, sir."

AT Adrian, Mich., a lady saw an engin-house with a steeple, and innocently asked a gentleman attendant, "What church is that?" The gentleman, after reading the sign, "Deluge No. 3," replied, "I guess it must be the Third Baptist."

ONE of the converts at the Holiness Meeting went up to an old maid at church the other night and asked her "if she was ready for the bridegroom." The old maid informed him that she was ready now and had been for the past forty years.

NOT to be outdone as a medium of revised religious information, the Tribune remarks that "elaborate preparations are being made for the consecration on Tuesday, June 2d, of the Stewart Memorial Cathedral of the Incarceration, at Garden City, L. I."

"SO you hav got twins at your house?" said Mrs. Bezumbe to little Johnny Samuelson. "Yes, mam, two of 'em." "What are you going to call them?" "Thunder and Lightning." "Why, those are strange names to call children." "Well, that's what pa called 'em as soon as soon as heard they were in the house."

"NEVER go back," advises a writer; "what you attempt, do with all your strength." How about a man who has attempted to catch a train, but failed? Is he never to go back? Must he wait, no matter how long, for the next one? Ah, we fear that abstract philosophy is scarcely applicable to the events of our concrete existence.

"Is this O'Donovan Rossa?" "Yes, sir—that's me." "I called to see if I could get you to blow up something for me." "Well, I am in Chicago for the purpose of lecturing, but I don't mind blowing up a building or two in an incidental way. What is it you want blown up, an orphan asylum or the home for decrepit women?" "Neither; it's a balloon."

ONLY a penny-a-liner,
Only a business pote,
Who lives by writing humorous things
[Alleged] on the pranksome goat.

Who sings of the jointed stove-pipe,
And eke of the yellow dog,
Of Chicago feet and St. Louis ears,
And of Cincinnati's hog.

Who touches on beating carpets,
And the woodshed-pounded boy,
And the maid who devoureth the cold ice-cream
With a gusto that will not cloy.

Only a penny-a-liner,
With his pen in his nerveless hand,
And his seamy brow shows an inward grief
That his soul can scarce withstand.

It tells of a terrible struggle
In his worn and weary brain—
Of a feverish strain on his aching soul—
Of a deep, unspeakable pain.

. . . . . .

Come away out of the chamber,
Leave him alone with his grief,
Let your parting footsteps fall as light
As the fluttering autumn leaf.

He is trying to write some dainty
Vers de societe,
Of an aristocratic coaching-trip
And patrician maids in May.

He will touch up the world of fashion
In a style to suit the queen,
And the delicate work will be brought to an end
With an "ad" of "Bronchitisene."

LITTLE AND LONG.

O maid with all-encircling arms
And eyes that smile down from above,
I look upon your lofty charms
And wonder if you'll stoop to love;
O sweet and fair perspectiv dove,
Hearken to my lowly song:
I, little, love you; will you love me, long?

You see me—I am at your feet;
Bend down and hear me while I say
My heart alone for you shall beat
Until it turns to senseless clay.
O sweet, you hear my bassoon bray
Its lowest notes of yearning song:
I, little, love you; will you love me, long?

If I shall raise my eyes to thee,
Thou wilt not spurn my love, dear maid,
Nor kick my heart into the sea;
For it would drown where you could wade.
My voice floats up thy corsage braid,
And smites thy ear with gentle song:
I, little, love you; will you love me, long?

And when the roses bloom once more,
And pansies blossom round my feet,
And swallows round thy forehead soar,
I'll get upon my stilts, my sweet;
And then, when our four lips can meet,
They'll join in this old-fashioned song:
You kiss me little and I kiss you long.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 23. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, June 6, 1885. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

NOTHING makes a Boston man so mad as to say something about the hanging of witches in New England.

A CLERGYMAN indignantly announces that all the salaries of religious teachers in the country added together would not amount to so much as the country spends annually in keeping dogs.

LIVERPOOL, Eng., wishes to throw open its public libraries and museums on Sunday, but the Liverpool Presbytery will petition the mayor and town council to keep them closed. The churches there, as here, stand in the way of Sunday liberty.

PROFESSOR SWING, the noted Chicago preacher, is in favor of not allowing anybody to vote who cannot show up at least $500 worth of property. "This," says the Cleveland Plaindealer, "would hav ruled out Christ and all the apostles except Judas."

A GOOD use for a god has been discovered by Judge Case, of Connecticut. The Winsted Press reports that a "Hindoo god on one of his park buildings has frightened away the crows, and given the song birds peaceful asylum in the surrounding trees."

THE New York World has made arrangements with a certain Mr. Day, who livs a little way up the Hudson, to provide the boys of the city a place to play ball without fear of the police. The boys are specially invited to spend their Sabbaths in the field. It looks like a deliberate attempt on the part of the World to dislocate the Third Commandment.

THE Jewish Advocate thinks it "strange that if accuracy was the object chiefly desired [in the late revision of the Old Tsstament] no representativ of the Roman Catholic church was invited to assist, and still more remarkable that in translating a book, the original of which was written in Hebrew by Jewish poets and seers, no invitation was extended to a Jewish scholar, who surely might hav been expected to hav superior qualifications for the work."

ANOTHER good old Providence story is in relation to the foreknowledge of God. One of the wags of those days got into an argument with a Baptist minister upon that subject. "Do you suppose that God knew," asked the wag, "that Brown & Ives would launch the ship Ann Hope to-day at twelve o'clock?" "Yes," said the minister, "as much as that I am here now." "Well," said the wag, "he got mistaken, for they hav put the launch off till next week."

Le Journal d'Hygiene publishes a comparativ table of the probabilities of life for moderate drinkers and total abstainers. According to this, a moderate drinker at twenty years of age may expect to liv 15.6 years; at thirty, 13; at forty, 11.6; at fifty, 10.8; at sixty, 8.9. The probability for total abstainers is: At twenty years, 44 2; at thirty, 36.5; at forty, 28.8; at fifty, 21.25; and at sixty, 15.285. It is a strange fact that in spite of these figures men will continue to drink moderately.

ON July 1st the following changes will be made in the rates of postage: 1. Any article in a newspaper or other publication may be marked for observation, except by written or printed words, without increase of postage. 2. All newspapers sent from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency, to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall be entitled to transmission at the rate of one cent per pound or fraction thereof, the postage to be prepaid. 3. The weight of all single-rate letters is increased from one-half of one ounce each, or fraction thereof, to one ounce each, or fraction thereof. 4. A special stamp of the value of ten cents may be issued, which when attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage thereon, shall entitle the letter to immediate delivery at any place containing 4,000 population, or over, according to the federal census, within the carrier limit of any free delivery office, or within one mile of the post-office coming within the provisions of this law; that such specially stamped letters shall be delivered between 7 A.M. and midnight; and that the regulations for the delivery of these specially stamped letters shall in no way interfere with the prompt delivery of letters as provided by existing law or regulations.

THE book, "Nature and Reality of Religion," recently discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, bids fair to make something of a stir. Frederic Harrison writes to the London Times that the articles in the book were published in that form without his knowledge and consent, and stigmatizes their publication as an act of piracy on the part of Mr. Spencer. Mr. Spencer replies that he is willing to leave the matter to arbitration, and if three arbitrators decide against him he will indemnify the Appletons and suppress the edition.

THE REVISED VERSION.

A monkey and a parrot once,
Left in a room together,
Began to fight, and fought so hard
They nearly killed each other.

Their mistress coming home perceived
Their wrongs they had been righting,
And said to them, "I'm deeply grieved
To think that you've been fighting."

The monkey really felt quite bad
In thinking of his crime;
The parrot, gleeful, said, "We've had
A sheol of a time!"

IT is not generally known, says an exchange, that the man who refuses to pay for his newspaper can be prosecuted like any ordinary criminal for theft. A New York paper has begun suit against several delinquent subscribers under the United States postal laws, which say: "The taking of a newspaper and refusal to pay for the same renders a person liable to criminal prosecution as a thief, and the person guilty of the same can be punished as if he had stolen goods to the amount of subscription." The penalty is the same when a subscriber refuses to take a paper from the post-office without first paying arrearages.

AN old preacher, about fifty miles from Richmond, asks us to explain several things. "I wish you to tell me how a man who delights in telling all he knows to the disadvantage of his brethren can hold up his head as a preacher. Then I wish you to explain to me how a preacher whose whole conversation is on the lowest plane—who never says a wise or appropriate thing in private—how can that same man preach beautiful and sprightly and godly sermons? Is it possible for the man, as you see him in the pulpit and out of it, to be explained except on the ground that his sermons are borrowed?" Ask us something else, and let another answer that.—Richmond (Va.) Religious Herald.

AN alleged minister of the gospel is writing a continued story for the Brookville Democrat. The following is a random extract: "With a whoop and a revolver flash they are up to the boys, leaping from their heaving ponies like Comanches. Stray bullets whistle here and there, and one goes crash through the window at Sam's ear. Bottles break and the landlord swears in the bar-room. The cowboys yell and another bullet goes into the window near Jim's ear. 'What a lark!' says Jim. 'On a blizzard!' says Sam. 'Landlord!' yell the wild Arabs, 'you sneak-thief, pimple-faced, gut-starving, bottle-necked old hypocrit, out with your best smile and biled owl, or by the bones of these two city chaps we'll pipe the devil out of your tiger hole.' 'And now, you two fellows, who thunder double shot towers into one standing-eared, white-tailed jack—out with the chink.' 'All right,' says Sam; 'smile on, boys. We'll pipe the devil for you, big as Colorado. Clear the way there, rot-gut, giv the boys a chance.' Up comes the fiddle and out pulls the flute, and the bar-room rattles with a cowboy musical hell. Glasses are broken, chairs are smashed, and the ceiling riddled with bullets." Where is the Society for the Suppression of Vice? We wonder if the good Christians of Brookville, who would be horrified to see their children reading a novel, imagin that such a mass of vulgarity and profanity as the above is calculated to inspire a love for the true, the good, and beautiful, simply because it is written by a minister? Just as likely as not.—The Clarion (Pa.) Jacksonian.

THE following is the text of the resolution introduced into the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, which has excited widespread interest and discussion: "Resolved, That it is the deliberate and decided judgment of this Assembly that the Roman Catholic church has essentially apostatized from the religion of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and therefore cannot be recognized as a Christian church. And as we do not recognize it as a portion of the visible church of Christ, we cannot consistently view its priesthood as other than usurpers of the sacred functions of the ministry, its ordinances as unscriptural, and its baptism as invalid." There is no doubt about the soundness of this resolution. And if the Presbyterian church were substituted for the Catholic the statement would be equally water-tight.

IN one of the factories in Maine, a few years ago, the proprietor reduced the wages, whereupon there was a general determination to strike, and as they were obliged to giv a month's notice before quitting work, they, in the mean tine, issued a circular to the world at large, in which was the following interesting paragraph: "We are now working out our notice, and shall soon be without employment; can turn our hands to most anything. Don't like to be idle, but determined not to work for nothing where folks can afford to pay. Who wants help? We can make bonnets, dresses, puddings, pies, and cakes; patch, darn, knit, roast, stew, and fry; make beds, feed chickens, sweep out the kitchen, kindle fires, wash and iron, besides being remarkably fond of babies; in fact, can do anything a housewife is capable of doing, not forgetting the scolding on Mondays and Saturdays. For specimens of pluck and determination, we refer to our manager and overlookers. Speak quick. Black eyes, fair foreheads, clustering locks, beautiful as angels, can sing like seraphs, and smile most bewitchingly. An elderly gentleman in want of a housekeeper, or a nice man in search of a wife—willing and ready to sustain either character; in fact, we are in the market. Who bids? Going—going—gone! Who's the lucky man?"—Cincinnati Unionist.

A DISPATCH from St. John's, N. F., dated May 18th, relates that the feud between the orange and the green has again developed into flame at Conception Bay. Late dispatches from Bay Roberts say that on Monday night a crowd of Orangemen attacked the dwelling of Mr. James Dailey, a conspicuous Roman Catholic citizen and trader, smashed in his windows, demolished a large quantity of property, and compelled him to fly to the capital. Just previous to this outrage the Orangemen flung over the wharf into the harbor some valuable property belonging to Captain Henneburg, also a Catholic. A Spaniard's Bay correspondent says that on Sunday evening a number of Orangemen, at first only about a dozen individuals, but afterwards swelled to about a hundred, paraded the streets and insulted and outraged every Roman Catholic they encountered. Their hootings and yellings disturbed the tranquil Sabbath. They kept up a constant howl of execration against the Catholics, the refrain from which was that they were going to sweep every one of them off the face of the earth. They deposited the vilest of nuisances on the doorsteps of prominent Catholics, at the same time indulging in blasphemy and the vilest obscenity. They next assaulted a number of young men who were on their way to the chapel to attend evening catechism. They knocked down several of the boys, kicked them, and otherwise maltreated them. The rabble next attacked two Catholic young men named Ryan and Finn as they were approaching the house of a common friend on a friendly visit. Ryan is thought to be fatally injured. The brother of the injured man, on hearing of the affray, rushed from the house with a double-barrel gun. His appearance was the signal for the rapid disappearance of the Orangemen. The affair became the subject of a judicial investigation, and the Orange-loving judge of Harbor Grace fined the murderous ringleaders $10 to $20 each.

News of the Week.

GENERAL GRANT is about the same.

PEACE is reported to hav been ratified by treaty between France and China.

THE ministers who persisted in preaching on Boston Common on Sunday, the 23d, were arrested and fined.

JOHN TERRY, colored, was hanged at Barnwell, S. C., on the 28th ult. for the murder of the Rev. John Sessions, white. On the scaffold he said, "I hav made my peace with God, and he has pardoned my sin." Mr. Terry is therefore an angel.

THE Rev. Mr. Brown, who ministers to a flock on West Fifty-first street, wandered off last week, and his parishioners could not find him. He had considerable money with him. Several parties met Mr. Brown about town, and report that he appeared very tired. Last Sunday he was unable to preach.

A MANIAC named Reume, under the influence of liquor, boarded a train at Kansas City, Mo., last Saturday, took possession of a car, and fired his revolver at everybody who came near him. At Chicago he shot and killed a policeman and fatally wounded another, and was himself seriously wounded before his capture could be effected.

DECORATION DAY was observed in the usual way in New York. People who lived in the city went out and those who lived outside the city came in, and there were parades and races and regattas and games of all sorts. It rained in the afternoon, but not enough to seriously interfere with the services. President Cleveland was in New York and reviewed the procession.

THE family of Thomas Helriegel were starving, and he tried to throw himself from the Brooklyn Bridge, but was stopped by a policeman. His wife, being a Catholic, and fearing the baby would die of starvation, called on a priest for assistance. The priest christened the child and did not charge a cent, but did no more. A fellow-workman of Helriegel's brought in a bottle of milk and saved the baby's life.

The Cause of Planetary Motion.

I think it will be generally admitted that there has been a greater advancement made in the knowledge of the arts and sciences within the last half century than at any period of equal length in any other age of the world. If this is so, it is certainly gratifying to know that we are advancing in the right direction. There is, however, one branch of science which seems to hav been very much neglected; and that is the subject of planetary motion. It seems to be conceded that this is not only unknown but unknowable, and that every attempt in this direction must necessarily prove abortiv. We are moving at the rate of one thousand miles the hour by the rotation of our planet, and at the rate of more than sixty-eight thousand miles in the same time, in its revolution around the sun. Shall we remain forever ignorant of the cause? I propose to explain and to demonstrate the cause of planetary motion, however difficult the solution of such a problem may appear.

Various hav been the conjectures and suppositions in regard to this motion; many believing that a supernatural force produces these results, while others claim there is some mysterious property in matter itself which is the cause. But they giv us no information upon the subject.

In speaking of matter, it is sufficient for our purpose to consider it as divided into solids, liquids, and aeriform.

The planets are really little systems, and hav their positiv and negativ centers or foci, as we observe in the solar system, and of course are governed by the same laws.

It is a fundamental law of matter that as we recede from the sun—the center of attraction in our system—matter becomes more subtil and attenuated. We find it the same in individual or single planets.

Starting from the center, the home of attraction and the solids, on arriving at the surface we meet with an exceedingly elastic substance called the atmosphere. This subtil fluid surrounds all the planets, in ours to the hight of about forty-five miles, revolving with it and exerting a pressure of about fifteen pounds upon every square inch of the earth's surface.

Of the forces which perform the important parts in planetary motion, there are two to be considered which are positiv and negativ in their action. One of these, the negativ force, is attraction, by which all bodies and particles of matter tend to a center, while the other or positiv force is the light and heat of the sun, both being universal.

Now, the latter force, by its operation upon the atmosphere, establishes and controls the center of gravity of all the planets.

And here the reader will not fail to observe that these forces are the poles, where matter in its extremes of condition and the forces meet, one pole being at the center, the other at the surface. In this connection I will observe that the center of gravity and the center of the planet are positiv and negativ centers, as has already been spoken of in regard to the solar system, without which planetary motion could not take place.

These are simply statements of facts as they exist, which will be fully understood as we proceed with our investigation.

It is a truth self-evident that there is always the same aggregate atmospheric pressure upon a planet, for in a substance so exceedingly elastic as the atmosphere, wherever there is in any particular locality a greater pressure, there always is and necessarily must be a correspondingly lighter pressure at some other place not far distant. Consequently the aggregate pressure is never changed. Local barometric differences can never change the general result.

But the great difference in the aggregate pressure is between the hemisphere of the planet under the rays of the sun and the opposit side.

The greater expansion of the atmosphere under the light and heat of the sun causes it to occupy far more space, and by that means holds a great portion of it in absolute suspension as far as pressure is concerned, and of course there is a correspondingly greater pressure on the dark and cooler side opposit the sun. The immense d fference in pressure is very apparent when we consider that it embraces the whole of one hemisphere of the planet. We now see clearly that the pressure must necessarily be far greater on the side of the planets opposit the sun.

This being the case, the rotation of the planet is the inevitable result.

The reader will now readily comprehend the important fact that the center of gravity is not in the center of the planet.

The operation of the light and heat of the sun upon the atmosphere of one-half of the planet does not admit of it. Where, then, is the center of gravity, if not in the center of the planet? The answer is obvious. It is in the side of the planet opposit or farthest from the sun, where it always remains a distance equal to the difference of atmospheric pressure between that part of the planet under the rays of the sun and the opposit side.

The effect of the light and heat of the sun upon the atmosphere is rapid. To illustrate, let us suppose the light and heat of the sun withdrawn to the extent that it shall be night all round the planet, the same as it is on the side of all planets opposit the sun. What would be the immediate consequence of such a state of things? Of course the aggregate atmospheric presure would be alike all round the planet. The center of gravity would leave its natural position and be found in the center of the planet. The diurnal, and consequently its revolutionary, motion would cease, and then, according to the laws of attraction, the planet could hav but one motion, and that would be directly toward the sun. Now, if the rays of the sun be restored the revolution of the planet would commence as soon as the rays of the sun reached it. Now, under the conditions assumed, these results could not be avoided. A planet cannot liv in darkness. Without the light and heat of the sun it would, as a planet, soon cease to exist. We are now, by the operation of the forces in question, to consider the planet in motion. The light and heat of the sun—as we hav seen—cause the difference of atmospheric presure between the dark and enlightened side of the planet. Now this difference is constantly and rapidly moving upon its surface as different portions of it are being brought under the rays of the sun by the planet's rotation, which, of course, recedes from one side of the planet as fast as it advances upon the other, producing as perfectly regular and uniform motion as the mind can conceive, the same cause perpetually producing like results; while, at the same time, the center of gravity is made to, and is constantly discribing a circle within the planet at a certain distance from the center. We will now advance a step further in our inquiry and see if the principles we are discussing hav anything to do with a certain other motion which our planet is known to hav, bearing in mind that whatever motion a planet has, there is always of course a legitimate and adequate cause for it.

There is a motion of our planet called nutation; that is, as the term implies, a vibrating motion of its axis, which, at some seasons of the year, is greater than at others, operating precisely like the balance.

In order that I may be the better understood, I shall hav to speak briefly of what is very well known. At the equinoxes, which take place on or about the 21st of March and the 23d of September, the sun shines from pole to pole. But at the solstices on the 21st of June and the 21st of December, the poles of the earth are alternately in light and darkness. This is caused by the obliquity of the equator to the plane of the ecliptic, which makes an angle with it of about 23.28m., and, aside from nutation, the earth keeps in this position in its revolution round the sun, causing the various seasons of the year.

As already observed, when the sun is directly over the equator the center of gravity will be in the side of the earth directly opposit the sun, and as the equator is equidistant from the tropics, we will assume that here there is no nutation. But when the sun advances to the north from the 21st of March, the center of gravity will move to the south (as it must always be directly opposit the sun), and will continue in that direction until the 21st of June, when it reaches its farthest point to the south, and the north pole becomes elevated to a certain extent. It then returns and meets the sun at the equator on the 23d of September, and passing to the north continues in that direction untill the 21st of December, when it reaches the farthest point to the north, and the south pole becomes elevated; then it will return and on the 21st of March again meet the sun at the equator where we started. Thus we see alternately an elevation and depression of the poles of the earth the year round.

This, as we hav already said, is called nutation, and, as will be seen, can never exceed certain limits. This motion also embraces in its operation what is called the precession of the equinoxes, which we will now explain.

If there were no nutation, the tropical and the sidereal year would agree. A complete revolution of the earth round the sun, or from a star to the same again, is called a sidereal year.

From an equinox or solstice to the same again requires 365 days 5 hours 48 minutes 47.8 seconds, which is 20 minutes 22.8 seconds shorter than the sidereal year.

Now it is plain, starting from the vernal equinox, for instance, with the center of gravity moving from the equator to the north and south of it, the motion of the sun toward the tropics is necessarily accelerated and must reach those points sooner than it otherwise would, and return to the same place again before the earth can make a complete revolution in its orbit.

But when the center of gravity is moving toward the equator the advance of the sun toward the tropics is normal and governed wholly by the advance of the earth in its orbit. Thus we account for this motion, the precession of the equinoxes, precisely as it takes place.

The cause of nutation and the precession of the equinoxes has long been sought; but without a knowledge of the laws of planetary motion, explanation, of course, was impossible.

I am aware at one time it was supposed that the moon had no atmosphere. At a later date, however, the idea seems to hav been abandoned and it was admitted that it had an atmosphere, but not extensiv. But more recently, I find, the original supposition has been revived, and it is now claimed by some astronomers that there is no atmosphere surrounding that planet.

Now, aside from its being an unnatural supposition, we might not consider it strange. Indeed, under the circumstances, not knowing that the difference in the elements and condition of matter had anything to do with the motions of the planets, it would be strange if there were not conflicting opinions in regard to it. This arises from two causes, viz, the exceeding uncertainty of their observations, and, secondly, the small amount of atmosphere surrounding that planet.

The truth seems to be that the difference in the amount of atmosphere surrounding a planet is in proportion to the magnitude and amount of matter the planet contains.

Although the light and heat of the sun must hav an effect more or less powerful on the atmosphere by the planet being nearer or more remote from the sun, yet we may instance the planet Jupiter, by far the largest of the planets, with its immense atmosphere and rapid diurnal motion, compared with the diminutiv size of the moon, with little atmosphere and slow rotation. Besides, it has been shown that a planet without an atmosphere to some extent cannot exist as such, because matter and the forces of light and heat could not effectivly meet to change the center of gravity, which would be in the center of the planet; its motion would cease, except that it would be drawn immediately to its primary. It is needless to add, the supposition is erroneous. We cannot claim that natural forces hav failed, and in this case left their work unfinished. And I may say, in addition, that in matters of this kind, unless the truth sought can be demonstrated, our suppositions are of little consequence, as they prove nothing either way.

It now only remains to consider the revolutionary motion of the planet around the sun. This will require but few words, as it follows as a matter of course. In the foregoing I hav barely alluded to this motion, not because the two motions are disconnected at all, for as soon as the rotation of the planet is effected, that moment it is on its journey round the sun, but because I thought the subject would be better understood if I spoke of the two somewhat separately. It will be seen that these motions act exactly at right angles—the first principle of planetary motion. Planets do and necessarily must advance in the direction they rotate, and, were this the only force, would continue in a straight line a tangent to its orbit, but it is held in check by the attraction of the sun, and these two forces, acting in conjunction, compel the planet to describe a circle; and as the planet is compelled to revolve round both the positiv and negativ centers in the solar system, its orbit must therefore be elliptical, as the orbits of all the planets are.

And lastly, the reader will of course observe that the sun, combining both the positiv and negativ elements in this respect, is the prime cause of planetary motion.

Thus I hav, I think, in as short compass as the subject would admit, fully redeemed the promis I made at the outset, and shown conclusivly why the planets move as they do.

The Advance of Theology.

Applying, then, the method of science to an examination of theology, it appears to consist in an attempt at explaining the facts of nature, and the sanctions of duty, in distant ages of scant knowledge. Its scriptural revelations come down to us through centuries of untrustworthy custodians, and when they reach us at last they are not revelations to us, but hearsay about revelations, and must be judged by the canons of criticism which we apply to other departments of literature. Every theology, no matter how emphatic its assertion of a supernatural source, bears about it the plain marks of its human origin. The conceptions of God vary with the zones, and closely parallel the grades of culture in which they arise. The commandments called divine become more elevated as the civilization of a people advances. The disciples of a prophet or apostle direct the noble impulses he has implanted in their hearts to broaden his teachings and correct his errors. Contrast the almost human tribal God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with the lofty idea of the Deity entertained by Isaiah. Compare this latter, again, with the universal Father whom Jesus taught his followers to worship. Mark the cumbrous legality and ritualism of the Old Testament, and its silence respecting the future life; how different this from the teaching of Jesus, who exalted the spirit above the letter, valued love more than sacrifice, and assured his hearers of an immortality which made this world but a temporary scene of trial and probation! Note how the high-minded Paul saw nothing reprehensible in slavery, and compare that with the humanity of an age which givs even dumb animals rights against their owners. The evolution of thought in general is fully exemplified by thought in theology, notwithstanding its assertion of a sacred fixity. John Wesley, sensible man that he was, said that if he were to giv up his faith in witchcraft, he would giv up the Bible. Yet his followers hav dropped the witchcraft, and kept the Bible.—George Iles in Popular Science Monthly.

Why God Lets the Devil Liv.

At the Brooklyn Tabernacle Mr. Talmage devoted his sermon to the question "Why does God allow Satan and sin to liv when with one blow he could annihilate them?" "In the first place," said Mr. Talmage in the course of his remarks, "God allows Satan and sin to liv to demonstrate the long suffering of Christ. What God does is not so wonderful as what he does not do. He could take all the fraud on the west side of Broadway, and hurl it into the Hudson River, and all the fraud east of Broadway, and hurl it into the East River. He understands all the combination locks of all stolen money safes. He could blow them up. But that he does not do it is because of his divine leniency, divine long suffering. I wonder that God did not burn the world up two thousand years ago, and drop the fragments into other worlds to be kept in museums as specimens of a recreant planet. God waited one hundred and twenty years for the people to go into the ark, and warned them all that time—one hundred and twenty years of incessant warning. Why do the wicked liv? To hold up their mischief that the people of the community may see it. It has been so in the past; it will be so in the future. God will not allow sin to sneak out of the world; he will not allow it to resign or quit. It will not be a case of default because no one appears against it. God will run it; handcuff it; try it; gibbet it.

"God allows the wicked to liv also that they may be made the implements to do good to the righteous. Recently there came to me the fact that a college had been built in the far West for Infidel purposes. There was to be no nonsensical sham or prayers. Not long afterward the college failed, and it was handed over to a Presbyterian company, and this was done, and it is now run in the interest of that orthodox religion."

Eliot the apostle, as he was called, who preached to the Natick Indians, and made himself a reputation by translating the Bible into their language—a perfectly useless labor—was asked a most pertinent question by one of his Indian converts, who, whether he got a satisfactory answer or not, shows that he was level-headed. His question was: "Why does God not kill the devil?" Poor old Eliot must hav thought the devil was in the Indian, for the question underlies our theology, and strikes at the character of God terribly. Who can answer it, satisfactorily, if God is as powerful and as merciful as he is represented?

"In view of all the suffering in the world," said a gentleman to me, "as I do not like to question God's love, I am compelled to question his power." It was a reverent feeling in the gentleman that compelled this answer.

You will see that it is precisely the Indian's question that our rattlebrained, not level-headed, Brother Talmage thinks he answers, but how does he answer it? He does not leave God a leg to stand on. He takes away his "karacter" entirely. He makes him merciless, selfish, an abettor of rascality. In a word, as men generally do, he creates God in his own image, and givs us the Brooklyn braggart and ranter, Talmage, infinit in power to do evil.

A man is justly held responsible for an evil which he can, but refuses to, prevent. "God can annihilate the devil with one blow," says Talmage. If he can he is responsible for all the evil in the world, and this Talmage admits, and givs us his God's reason, which is a purely selfish one, viz., "to demonstrate the long suffering of Christ," who is supposed by men like Talmage to be God's son. Of course, all the glory from this source belongs to the family. But let us estimate this glory. Christ, until the last year of his life, was a carpenter. As a carpenter he was never heard of outside of his nativ village, nor is it claimed that he ever suffered as a carpenter. So we are limited to the last year of his life for his suffering, and whatever glory may attach to it. When the devil took him into the wilderness, we read that after he had fasted forty days he was hungry. But his hunger was appeased, and it is not claimed that he suffered, but if he did, the devil was in the same predicament, and it is only fair to call it square.

We are limited, then, to the suffering connected with his death. And here, if his biographer tells the truth about him, we are compelled to admit that it is difficult to find in history an account of such abject fear of death as was exhibited by him. "His sweat was as it were great drops of blood." But the two men who were to be crucified with him took the thing as coolly as two North American Indians could hav done. The spectators may hav pitied him, they would hav respected the thieves. So far, there is no glory in the case.

But let us look at this case in the light of the result. He was to be crucified but not to die, only lie in a swoon for three days, or, if fully dead, he was to rise again and join his disciples in a fish dinner. Look at the record and see if I misstate the fact. The worst feature of the business, the most unpleasant thing about it, was the embalming him, plastering him all over with a hundredweight of myrrh, aloes, and sweet spices. But that did not justifiy his fear. He declared that he was to rise on the third day. Who is there that would not willingly, gladly die for three days for the knowledge of another life, if there is one, to be obtained in that time? Fortitude in suffering always commands respect. But he was so completely unmanned at the prospect of only three days of death that the very thieves who were crucified with him reviled him, forgetting their own sufferings, though their legs were broken, in their contempt for his fear. Look at the record. I am describing the historical Jesus of the gospels, not the ideal Jesus of Freeman Clarke, who is a creature of his imagination. What right has James Freeman Clarke to put his theological ideals into the world under a false label more than a merchant to put his goods on to the market under a stolen trademark? The historical Jesus consigned all who did not believe in him to a hell of fire. Mr. Clarke's Jesus winks its hell out of sight. Mr. Clarke tells us that the "historical Jesus rose above Jewish limitations, and saw in all men his brethren." Mr. Clarke should, if possible, be truthful. The historical Jesus was a Jew, with all the race hatred of a Jew. He came to "save the lost sheep of the house of Israel" only. It was Paul's ideal Jesus who said, as Mr. Clarke well knows, "Go into the world and preach the gospel to every creature." And the proof of this is that when he visited his disciples after his resurrection, and found them fishing, he told them where to let down the net to get a good haul, and they got it. Had he told them to go and teach all nations, would he not hav reproved them for not doing as they were bid? His first question was, "Hav ye any meat?" The next thing he says is, "Come and dine." All the disciples were there. They all dined together. That was their last meeting, and he never opened his lips about "foreign missions;" if he had he would hav exceeded his instructions, for he says expressly, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

"Sell all that thou hast and giv to the poor, Mr. Clarke," the historical Jesus would say, but he is dead. Mr. Clarke has no right, it is not honest in him, to set up an ideal or an idol of his own, and ask us to worship it as the original historical Jesus.

"God could take all the fraud in New York and hurl it into the East and Hudson Rivers." Tweed could hav done something in that line, had he been so disposed.

"God understands all the combination locks on all the stolen money safes, and could blow them up." If he understood the combination he would not need to blow them up. But this would be as sensible as much that is attributed to him. Why sink God below the level of an ordinary cracksman? Let it be known that the night police were to be off duty for only one hour, and every safe in New York would be cleaned out.

And here I would respectfully present a label for the fragments of our planet, when God distributes them to the other worlds: "This specimen is from a planet which I made after the experience derived from the creation of millions of them. I was satisfied that I had, at last, a perfect thing, and pronounced it good. I then peopled it with my own children, chips of the old block, created in my own image, as you see, and pronounced by me good, also, and the result was exactly what you might expect from a knowledge of my character as described in the inspired volume which accompanies this specimen."

As I write, two six-year-old boys are playing near me, who show some knowledge of right and wrong. Were they as deficient in this respect as Talmage seems to be, I should tell their father that, in my opinion, it would not pay to raise them.

I suspect that the Infidel college in the far West fell into the hands of Presbyterians about the time that Paine Hall, in Boston, after having been sold four times at auction, came into the possession of the Young Men's Christian Association.

SIMEON PALMER.

Great Park Region.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Yesterday afternoon I gave my first lecture "in the heart of the 'Great Park Region'" of Minnesota. The building in which the audience assembled, Cowing's Opera House, is almost as fine as, and closely resembles, Loomis Temple of Music, New Haven, Conn., in which we used to hold our free lecture association meetings.

Yesterday morning friend Trenham and myself went to hear the Methodist parson, Mr. Ogle. He preached with reference to the Freethought lectures announced to be given, taking for his text, "Without God." In fact, he took two or three texts, one, that famous passage from the Psalms, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." What minister, with a chance to preach at a couple of Infidels, ever did forego the felicity of quoting that nonsensical text? It saves the necessity of employing argument.

The reverend would be "awfully" lonesome "without God." He admitted if there is no God the imagination of man would make one. Poor parson! he spoke wiser than he knew. Man makes gods. A god never made a man.

This Methodist parson assured his hearers that Christianity is absolutely essential to civilization, to education, to building colleges, schools, charitable institutions. Without it earth would be desolate, and a black flag would float over the ruin. All opposition to Christianity would fail. Christianity is a triumphant blessing.

I looked around over the audience to view the "triumphant" army! There were twenty children, twelve women, and five men, besides the preacher and leader of the choir, and not counting the two Infidels "without God."

It looks dubious. Such an army is enough to strike terror to the stoutest-hearted.

In the afternoon at three o'clock I was greeted by as attentiv an audience of fine-looking people as I hav met with usually. The day has come when the masses giv earnest heed to Freethought discourse. It is not necessary for a Freethought advocate to abuse any fellow-being in order to successfully present his principles. He can be as sharp as a razor without being as uncouth as a pick-ax. We can afford to leave personal abuse with the clergy. It is the best argument they hav, and the poorest weapon an intellectual being ever employed. While a public lecturer on Liberalism should never pander to prejudice, he should freely express his convictions; his profession does not require him to part company with courtesy in order to tell the truth. Unless our Liberalism makes us better specimens of manhood and womanhood than Christianity produces, of what practical value is it?

I hav just seen by a St. Paul paper that Colonel Ingersoll is to speak in St. Paul Sunday, May 24th. Although we are about 150 miles away, I want to go and hear him again, so I hav proposed that my five lectures, which I engaged to giv on Sundays, should be packed into this week. My friend Trenham, and perhaps others, will go and hear our silver-tonged orator.

Alexandria is a lovely town, built on the high banks of two pretty lakes—Lake Agnes and Lake Winona. I wish I could send your readers a picture of Lake Agnes. It is a delightful little lake, nearly three-fourths of a mile wide, a couple of miles long, with a smooth, sandy beach, abounding in white pebbles, the water as clear as ice.

Mr. N. J. Trenham, landscape and portrait photographer, a live Liberal, owns a boat. He proposed a row across Lake Agnes, which I joyfully accepted. We were boys again. Such are the hardships of itinerant's life. Oh, if the clergy could only know how we enjoy ourselvs! True, we do not get a "bloated bondholder's" salary, but we do hav a peace that passeth a minister's understanding.

Alexandria has some piety, but it is subdivided into seven churches, which makes a thin spread of heavenly manna. You can judge something of the good sense of its inhabitants from the fact that its splendid school building cost three times more than the seven churches.

At this point in my narrativ, G. A. Kortsch, a leading merchant, and his son Willie drove up with a carriage, and took the artist and myself for a delightful drive among the lakes. There are one hundred and fifty lakes in this county. We did not visit them all. We drove on the beach of Lakes Cowdry, Darling, Carlos, and Le Homme Dieu, only a roadway between them. Lake Carlos is between five and six miles long. Others are larger and many smaller. The beaches are beautiful and clean as a picture; hard, pebbly, sandy shores. Heaven can't beat the "heart" of this Park Region. The day—a May day well along toward June—is exquisit; the buds and leaves bursting into life; the birds singing throat-splitting notes; the air clear and pure enough for gods to breathe.

The artist, the merchant, and the lecturer engaged in a game of "duck," dear to a boy's heart, on the sandy beach. They entered into the frolic with the zest of boys.

"Oh, for one hour of youthful joy!"

We took two hours. Back to dinner we whirled with sharpened appetite. I am stopping at the Letson House, a well-managed hotel, with ladylike waiters and attentiv clerks.

Out again for another drive, this time to Lake Geneva and Lake Victoria. Our landscape artist, N. J. Trenham, brought along his photographic apparatus, and took half a dozen views. I will send you some by and by.

Besides Mr. Trenham and Mr. Kortsch, already mentioned, I will introduce to the family of Liberals A. W. Swenson, W. C. Roland, Chas. Schulz, N. N. Hardy, Andrew Tenger, R. J. Roth, A. Wilton, W. H. and C. J. Hutchinson, Richard Partridge, L. S. Hill, E. C. Wagoner, Willard Buck, Rudolph Wegener, and others, whose names I hav not been able to obtain. The wives, sons, and daughters of most of them are Liberals too. I hav been royally entertained during my stay, and there is a call for me to visit them again this season.

The press, Douglas County News and the Post, hav given the lectures fine notices; but many of our Christian friends are not happy. W. F. JAMIESON.

The Liberal Club.

The Three Hundred and Eighty-first Regular Meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, held on the evening of Friday, the 29th ult., was the last of the season. Everybody was there. The lecturer of the evening, Mr. George Krahmer, with his brother, who looks just like him, sat upon the platform as the man with the badge pin* dodged the treasurer and took his seat at the secretary's table.

Mr. Wakeman read a portion of a letter from Mr. Parton, in which Mr. Parton said he was pleased at the election of Mr. Wakeman as president of the club. The Krahmer brothers were then presented, and Mr. George Krahmer said:

"This is a Liberal Club,
This is a Liberal meeting,
We'll sing you a Liberal song,
And giv you a Liberal greeting."

The song was sung according to promis, and the speaker proceeded with the reading of his address. He was a Liberal, he said, because Liberalism meant liberty and progression. Liberalism depended upon development for improvement, and looked forward to co-operation as a means instead of to selfishness. We are Liberals because it givs us strength to tell the truth regardless of who likes it. We are Liberals to right the monstrous wrongs committed in the name of religion. The lecture was short, pointed, and full of good reasons why people should be Liberals. The audience enjoyed and applauded it heartily.

The brothers sang another song, the deacons took up a collection of $15 for the Bartholdi pedestal fund, and then President Wakeman suggested that in the discussion to follow each one should giv a reason for the faith that was in him.

Mr. Searing, the first to respond, was pleased with the discourse and believed it would be unkind to criticise it in any way. Continuing, Mr. Searing said he was brought up among the Quakers, who called themselvs the Society of Friends, but who were less a society of friends than any other society he was ever in. Therefore he left the society of the Friends.

Mr. McLeod esteemed the lecture highly, and thought it would hav been a credit to anybody, however distinguished. He then gave a phrenological opinion of the lecturer which was favorable, criticised Materialists for being straitlaced, and said there was an aroma of the human brain which was destined to survive the dissolution of the body.

Mr. Wakeman here arose to say that Mr. Krahmer was a self-educated young man, and a good example of what the enthusiasm of Liberalism produces.

The next speaker was a stranger to the club named Brennan. He shook hands with Mr. Krahmer as though he had it in his mind to knock him out. Mr. Brennan first paid attention to Mr. McLeod's reference to the aroma of the brain. He had never heard of anything quite so ridiculous as that. He followed this with the remark that Mr. Krahmer was an ignorant youth and had better go to school, but Mr. Brennan was generous enough to say that some of the members of the club might be possessed of ordinary intelligence. The infallibility of the pope Mr. Brennan compared to the power vested in a judge of the Supreme Court. All the facts of nature, he contended, were unreasonable; therefore, we should mistrust our reason. God would exist as long as mankind retained their imaginativ powers. It is the province of the reporter to speak descriptivly, and therefore it may not be out of place here to remark that Mr. Brennan impressed himself upon this writer as the freshest and most conceited person who has occupied the platform of the club for many a weary day. His utterances, which he delivered under the evident impression that they were facts and arguments, as compared with what the other speakers said, were as chaff to wheat.

Dr. Foote said the people of almost every faith called themselvs liberal. Monsignor Capel, who had been capeling about the country, would giv others liberty to believe as he did, and could not conceive how anyone could be more Liberal than that. Liberals, Dr. Foote held, were still to some extent illiberal. There is still among us the bigotry of wealth, of learning; we hav the bigotry of "culture," and the bigotry of high morals. In any of these ways bigotry is as reprehensible as it is in religion.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer was very glad to hear this lecture, because it introduced the element of enthusiasm and aspiration. No one could criticise, they could only supplement it. There was no higher morality than that taught by Liberalism. Mr. Palmer did not believe that Mr. Brennan believed in transferring our sins and shortcomings upon some son of God murdered by his father in heaven. He did not believe that Mr. Brennan believed that reason taught that the unknowable can be knowable, or that the irrelativ can be relativ. The creed of Liberalism teaches, not that we are fallen, but that we are rising; that the greatest happiness will be realized on earth, and that thus we may here discount the promises of heaven.

Madame Delescluze and Dr. Weeks arose simultaneously to address the meeting, but the doctor yielded with the remark, "Ladies first, until they get their legal rights." Madam Delescluze therefore had the floor. She said: "As this is the last meeting for the season, I cannot let the evening pass without having something to say. The fault that I find with the address of the evening is because it is so dreadfully illiberal—illiberal from beginning to end. Eight or nine years ago the club was illiberal. Now it is quite Liberal. It will soon rival the church for Liberality. The church is open to attack. The Christian church of to-day is not the real Christian church. It professes brotherly love and allows people to starve. The illiberality of the churches sometimes shakes my faith in them, but the Liberal Club is so much more illiberal that I come here to hav my belief strengthened. In dealing with the opinions of others we must giv all credit for sincerity and noble aims."

Dr. Weeks followed. He was glad to hear that the madam had to come to the club to grow in grace. He trusted it might continue to prove beneficial to her. The doctor had no unfriendly feelings toward that old gentleman the pope, but there was no similarity between him and a chief justice, because every one was at liberty to differ with the judge, even to denounce him and seek his removal, and still remain a citizen, while, if a Catholic, you are obliged to accept the pope as infallible, whether you agree with him or not.

Mr. Sutherland would remind those who saw no field for Liberalism, that at a recent trial in Washington (the Swaim court martial), a witness was rejected because he objected to swearing upon a book called the Bible. It was the same in Massachusetts. Over in Brooklyn the Universalist children were not allowed to parade with the orthodox Sunday-school, and Talmage was anxious to hav Ingersoll locked up. Mr. Sutherland had examined the Bible to find out where the Christians got the notion that Christ was of irregular parentage. He discovered that the whole story rested upon a dream.

Mr. Cohen made a notable speech. If Madam Delescluze found the church more Liberal than the Liberal Club, why did she not go into the churches and state her Liberal opinions.

Madam Delescluze: "I do."

Mr. Cohen: "We know better."

Mr. Cohen did not wonder that religious people objected to reason. Let reason loose in the church and Christianity would die in twenty-four hours. Sincerity was no test of truth, Mr. Cohen said. He never saw a lunatic that was not sincere. Our asylums are full of them. He did not know whether "God" would exist as long as people had an imagination or not, but he had never existed outside of the imagination, and never would. Mr. Cohen's words were replete with sharp hits, delivered with great energy, and made the audience laugh till their arms ached. The speech could not be transferred to paper with anything less cogent than a battering-ram.

Mrs. Leonard, in a brief address, said she gave people credit for sincerity, and did not discriminate against others on account of their belief. Nevertheless a lady then in the hall had refused to work with her (the speaker) because of difference of opinion. Several people here looked significantly at Madam Delescluze, and Mrs. Leonard went on to point out the inconsistency of those who preach one thing and practice another.

During the discussion upon religion, Mr. Brennan stood in the rear of the hall in a high state of perspiration. Opinions which differed from his own he characterized as the result of ignorance. He is something of a curiosity, being the first person who has brought against the members of the club the charge that they don't know what they are talking about.

It was raining when, at a late hour, the meeting adjourned, and the members shook hands and went out into the wet.

During the evening, Dr. Foote, Jr., executed the following note and gave it to the writer. It is to correct a slight heterophemy. If these reports were to be continued, letters from misrepresented speakers would form an attractiv feature of them, though doubt might be thereby raised as to their strict accuracy. Dr. Foote is quite right in presuming that Professor Denton's works are to be found at this office. They are advertised in another page.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Your reporter of Liberal Club meetings should sit on a front seat, or I should speak more distinctly, for he reports me incorrectly in writing that I recommended the writings of Professor Draper to those who are perplexed in studying the "Irreconcilable Records of Genesis and Geology." Professor Draper's writings are to be highly commended, but as A B C primers for "anxious inquirers" I recommend the pamphlet lectures of Prof. Wm. Denton, of Massachusetts. They are doubtless to be found in the lists of The Truth Seeker office, and in their line of biblical criticism are parallel to and well supplemented by Mr. Remsburg's recently published lectures. I hav to thank Professor Denton for his valuable eye-openers which enabled me to be born into Liberalism, and gratitude led me to call attention to them.

Yours truly, E. B. Foote, Jr.

May 29, 1885.

Sometime in September the club will convene again, and President Wakeman will deliver his inaugural address. There is no other place in the world where so much amusement and instruction can be obtained for a nominal sum as at the Liberal Club.

The War of the Philosophers.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Please allow me space to express my thorough appreciation of Mr. Wakeman's article on "The Relocation of Religion; or, Harrison versus Spencer," lately published by you. It is indeed able and noteworthy, and shows that Mr. Wakeman must hav been quite a student of the "Integral Philosophy," as founded by Mr. Andrews, but still not enough so to fully comprehend it, as his last paragraph shows. In it he says that "this new view of human lot and fate may, in its intellectual phase, be called the Positiv, the Synthetic, the Cosmic, or the Integral Philosophy. The names matter not." Here I beg leave to differ from him. The Positiv Philosophy is not Integral, as Mr. Wakeman in this very article has shown by his criticism upon Harrison. The Synthetic Philosophy is not Integral as he has shown by his criticism of Spencer, and, in fact, as both Harrison (representativ of the Positiv philosophy) and Spencer (representativ of the Synthetic philosophy) hav shown by their quarrels with each other. Had they been Integral, each while "emphasizing" his own side of the truth, would not hav denied the other. Only an Integral philosophy—a philosophy based upon a universal science—can be Integral. "A rose by any other name may smell as sweet," but calling a cabbage a rose does not make it one, and calling the Positiv and the Synthetic philosophies Integral does not make them so. A. C. Macdonald.

Ingersoll a Mile-Post on the Millennium Road.

From the North American Review.

I regret to learn, through his article on "Freethought in America," in your April number, that the distinguished Briton, Mr. Robert Buchanan, has imbibed so unfavorable an opinion of the United States and of Ingersoll. I, in common with the English critic, deplore the materialism of our age, and recognize the need of a more humanized humanity. This is why I support our great poet-orator. Therefore, when I find him characterized as "a devil's advocate, preaching the gospel of hot ginger, cakes, and ale," I feel like saying—little as he needs it—a word in his vindication. If our country is materialistic, who made it so? The Christian church has hitherto held almost undisputed sway. Freethought cannot do much worse. Ingersoll, rightly understood, is a modern prophet. Let us remember that it was Christ who anathematized the scribes and pharisees, and drove the money changers from the sanctuary. Ingersoll, far from "entering the temples of religion with his hat on one side, a cigar in his mouth, and a jest upon his lips," is assailing the shrines of superstition with the bludgeon of his intellect, the rapier of his ridicule, and the sword of his righteous wrath. He, happily, has no reverence for rot nor respect for pretentious pietism, but, far from "trampling on the lotus, the rose, and the lily in the garden of the gods," he would root up the deadly nightshade of error and the poison vine of ignorance, to replant in a better earth the flowers of a fairer life. Mr. Buchanan admits that "the history of Christianity has been a long chapter of horrors," and that "its priests and paid professors hav been the enemies of human progress." In this confession he givs up his case against our great champion, since to crush out such crimes and evils Ingersoll takes his sturdy and relentless stand. Two great antagonistic currents of philosophy are discernible as running through civilization: the theological and the scientific. Theology, as a body of dogma, positing a supposititious deity in an impossible heaven, erects upon such arbitrary divine authority the tyranny of king over subject, of priest over layman, of master over slave, and finds its motiv in a selfish other-worldliness. Science, on the other hand, though it declines to affirm an unknowable god and an unverifiable immortality, would make "man the master of things," would in government decree democracy, in industry co-operation, and would recognize its motiv in human mutualism. Against the one tendency and for the other Ingersoll ever lifts the magic of his voice. On the one or other of these sides all must sooner or later array themselvs; and in this holy warfare Liberals of every school, uniting on the main issues and sinking their minor differences, should show one solid front. That Ingersoll represents completeness no man claims; but were all men more like him, the world would be far nearer its millennium. To oppose him is to oppose progress. Courtlandt Palmer.

The Tent Campaign Inaugurated.

I had hoped the Tent Fund ere this would hav reached $500, as the summer campaign might hav been inaugurated under most favorable circumstances, and success insured.

The necessity for eternal vigilance and persistent effort, if we would secure that civil and religious liberty the Nine Demands of Liberalism guarantee, namely, equal rights and privileges for all, regardless of Christian faith, or the lack of it; putting an end to priestly arrogance and exactions, and relieving the gentle, true, and worthy from cruel ostracism and persecution on account of their honest convictions, prompted us to make one earnest, determined effort, even under adverse conditions.

I rejoice at the evidence of love and devotion to the cause manifested by the large number of TRUTH SEEKER readers who hav contributed to the Tent Fund. My devotion to the work shall best express my thanks and appreciation of their confidence and liberality.

Since I cannot do what I would, I determined to do what I could, knowing it were vain to seek celestial aid (although if all the angels of heaven are really interested in the welfare of humanity they would hav donated their superfluous flowing white robes to make the tent of and so saved us incurring debt, they could hav thus practically helped promote human peace, joy, and happiness). My prayer was answered by ungodly terrestrials of New York, who, destitute of faith in either celestials or Christians, nobly came to my aid and loaned me money, so that with the Tent Fund already subscribed I hav bought a new circle tent, fifty feet in diameter. (I can at comparativly small cost, whenever funds are subscribed, purchase a forty-foot center-piece, and make circle tent into pavilion, 50x90). The fifty foot circle will seat five hundred, and with seats, outfit, everything complete and of the best, most durable quality, will not cost to exceed $300.

This somewhat dwarfs the magnitude of our enterprise, as at first conceived, and quadruples our individual labor. But it will keep the car of progress in motion during the summer months when other efforts are impracticable.

I cannot this season hav our first-class choir to attract and delight the multitude with sweet melodies; I must dispense with large company of faithful co-workers in distributing Liberal literature. My effort, at least in the beginning of the season, will necessarily be confined to my poor little individual efforts, assisted by a tent-master.

I cannnot command success, yet hav no fears, for if diligence, patient endurance of privation, and persistent endeavor will do so, we will win triumphant success, despite all obstacles, and demonstrate that tent effort is the best possible method of popularizing Secularism.

I shall deliver a lecture every afternoon and evening, and do all possible in circulating Liberal literature, effecting organization, providing facilities for all to attain scientific education, especially in physiology and hygiene, and inspire a spirit of emulation among the women to advance the interests and take direction of science schools on Sunday.

Friends having clean back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers are solicited to forward them to us for gratuitous distribution. Send by mail; if by express or freight, charges must be paid. We would gladly pay express on all such gifts, and hope soon to be able to do so, but cannot at first. We must pay our tent-master's board and wages, and the running expenses of the tent, and hav pledged myself to repay the money loaned me at the earliest possible moment. This last is the one only responsibility that oppresses me. I can and will endure uncomplainingly all other burdens, but debt to me is like sand on a piston-rod—it cuts deep, and the friction wears on us. We rely on the generosity and sense of justice of those who love the cause to furnish the needed lubricator, the money to discharge the debt, so that the wearing and irritating friction may not impair my effectivness or break me down.

Any friends who desire to enjoy a week or two of holiday and change of scene, and hav a good time helping forward the work of Secularism, will be most cordially welcomed. They can greatly help by getting acquainted with people who attend the tent lectures, distributing literature, etc., etc.

Those desiring Tent effort in their vicinity are invited to correspond immediately. Address Kalamazoo, Mich.

Contributions to Tent Fund should be sent to TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. A. H. COLBY is speaking for the Spiritualists of Brooklyn.

S. P. PUTNAM delivered the last lecture of the season for the Newark Liberal League on Sunday, May 31st.

HELEN GARDENER had a large audience at her lecture in Albany, N. Y., on the 24th ult. Her subject was "Men, Women, and Gods," and its development, says the Express, "led to an unsparing denunciation of the Bible and its teachings, which were described as immoral and most cruel in their effect on women. Quotations were given to show that the Bible sanctioned polygamy, slavery, and traffic in wives. Miss Gardener is young, witty, and pretty, and adopts a style which rivets the attention of the audience and rivals Colonel Ingersoll in the humorous treatment of sacred subjects."

MARK WALSER, general manager of the Coal Company at Liberal, Mo., wishes to employ good coal miners, Liberals preferred, and promises steady employment. He can furnish work for one hundred men, he says. For further particulars address him at Liberal, Mo.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain. A. C. MACDONALD,

News and Notes.

There has been quite a lively campaign at Kansas City since the formation of an auxiliary society. The clergymen hav taken up arms and made quite a vigorous onset upon the "Nine Demands." The Rev. Mr. Croner said: "I think the platform of the Secular League the most flagrant of the century." In this style he goes on through a whole sermon. Mrs. Krekel came to the defense of Liberalism, and published an able and admirable reply in the Kansas City papers, which not only completely answers all the violent allegations of the clergymen, but will no doubt by its clear and powerful presentation of our side of the question convince thousands who read it of the truth and justice of the "Nine Demands." She says: "Natural morality is that basis of human association which has resulted from man's natural unfoldment in the attempt to solve the problem of communities living together in justice toward each other, and with deference for the natural rights of each individual. No divine aid was invoked in the formation of our secular government, and when it was moved that prayers be offered every morning before proceeding to business the motion was opposed and defeated by adjournment without a vote.

"When President Jefferson was requested to appoint days of fasting, of prayer, and of thanksgiving, he refused, and in a letter to Rev. Mr. Miller, in the year 1808, said: "I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the constitution from meddling with religious institutions, their doctrins, disciplins, or exercises'" (Jefferson's Works, vol. v, p. 236).

Mrs. Krekel concludes her eloquent letter as follows: "As Secularists, we are accused of having a platform with the 'boldness of Satan' in it, a platform 'which makes man an animal;' we are termed 'malignant demoralizers' and 'haters of religion;' our probity and honesty are questioned; our cleanliness in regard to obscene literature is doubted. We are advised if, as Infidels, we do not want the services of chaplains in prisons, to 'keep out of our prisons; cease breaking our laws,' and 'they may hav their freedom as other men.' Well, in view of the fact that our prisons show, by actual count, ninety Christian offenders to ten non-Christian, we are not much concerned about spiritual comfort inside the walls, and we submit again that it is unfair and unjust discrimination to ask Secularists and others who do not believe in a sectarian creed to pay for continuing efforts inside the prison which prove so ineffectiv outside. Let that denomination that gets a sufficient number of its children in prison pay out of its own pocket for that kind of sectarian comfort which they can administer. Reviewing the whole matter since our Secular Society was formed, no stronger proof of the necessity of such an organization could be found than in the attitude of these gentlemen of the cloth who feel it to be their Christian duty to attack our methods, our morals, and our character."

The Kansas City papers also report that the members of the Secular Union had a very lively meeting at Pythian Hall. The hall was comfortably filled with people, many of those present being young people of both sexes. Mrs. Krekel delivered an address on the object of the society. Of the prevailing system of exempting churches from taxation, she said:

"This is an encroachment upon the people. Money is taken from the public treasury to be devoted to purposes which many think useless. Every man's belief should be placed upon an equal footing. Our government was instituted not in the interest of the Christian religion or any other. Our government, which claims from the beginning a purely secular character, should be perfected in this respect. Hereafter we shall see more clearly and fully the necessity of individual and personal liberty—the right to stand for what we are worth independently of our creeds. For this, and this alone, our Nine Demands of Liberalism are formulated."

Dr. Bowker said: "The Nine Demands of Liberalism hav been formulated by men earnestly at work. The ministers promis you a lively time. They hav not got a great conception of these Demands. They simply know that they should pitch into you, and that is all. If the Christian religion is true, why not let it stand alongside of other religions on its own merits.'

Secretary Eccles said: "If the Sabbath should be destroyed, then superstition would lose its greatest hold upon the human mind. Long accustomed to many privileges, the clergymen cannot understand that the people will no longer endure their oppression."

The following pregnant sentences are from Judge Krekel's lecture on "The First Settlers:"

"The attachment to a government of their own making the colonies first showed in their resistance to encroachments upon them by the English government. Deeper than the question of taxation lay the idea of self-government which had grown up in the colonies. There is something in human nature, when properly developed, which teaches us that self-control is not only best, but the only safe guide in human affairs. The struggle for the recognition of this truth has in the past remodeled human institutions, and will continue to do so until this longing is satisfied."

Thus we see what solid and aggressiv work the Kansas society is doing.

G. W. Collins, our energetic co-worker at Wichita, Kansas, writes as follows:

"We hav had a meeting of the members of our Union since you left, and decided to get a place and hav weekly meetings. I feel that with energy and perseverance we can make them a success. All of our people express themselvs as highly pleased with the lectures of yourself and Mr. Watts. Many hav expressed a desire to hav you here again."

Joseph Lee, of California, writes:

"I hope you will receive liberally for the Campaign Fund, and be able to carry on your glorious work. I wish to see you making a tour through our own state—it would help the cause."

William Reynolds, of Utah, writes:

"I wish you could send us a field-man. I think there are a great many Liberal people in Utah—a thousand times more Infidelity than fifteen years ago; and if Liberals in every village will work, it would increase a thousand times faster. To encourage such a result is my desire."

The cry comes up, too, from Florida. There is an immense work to do there at once—if we had the sinews of war, which we hav not. If any work is done at all, it must be thoroughly done and with our best forces at the front. A brilliant battle might be fought, but not without the powder and ball.

We cordially respond to the summons of THE TRUTH SEEKER editor to follow up and attack the Christian Reform Association. This is a dangerous organization—more powerful, perhaps, than we think, and we must watch it closely. It is backed up by men and money, and is constantly at work. Wherever it holds a convention we must endeavor to do the same, and thus meet them on their own ground with public discussion and agitation. Now that I am once more at headquarters in New York city, and expect to remain during the summer, I want to hear from all parts of the country in regard to the progress of our cause. Will friends please send me word? Forward all papers in which there may be any items of interest. Inform me concerning all meetings of Leagues, subjects discussed, etc. We wish to keep up constant communication and inter-communication all through our lines. We are one grand army, and we wish to know what each corps, each regiment, each company, each pioneer is doing. Let us encourage one another with every advance that is made, be it greater, or be it less. Let us try and formulate better plans of work for the future. I realize there is much to learn in regard to the best development of the varied material in our ranks. I am ready for any criticism, however adverse, and for any change whereby a vaster good can be accomplished.

Fraternally, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Colonel Ingersoll in Wisconsin.

OSHKOSH, WIS, May 24th.—Colonel Ingersoll delivered a lecture at our Opera House on the 18th inst., and I was surprised to see the house so well filled, for there were very few seats, if any, vacant, and here, where we hav so many churches and so many foreigners, I did not expect the house would be half filled; but it seems that Freethought is on the increase even in Oshkosh. And I noticed that they all seemed well pleased, and even sorry when he got through. As for myself, I could hav stayed there all night without being tired. We had what they call Salvation meetings here all last winter and this spring, but I hav not as yet heard of anyone being saved, and I think that some of the Salvationists had better go out of the business and follow some honest occupation. Colonel Ingersoll's lecture made a favorable and a lasting impression upon all present but one, and he was a preacher, and I hav heard that he intends to reply; but so far he has failed to do so, and I guess he has concluded to let out the job.

I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly every week, and those books I bought when I was at your office hav been kept going all the time, and hav had the desired effect. I shall want more books as soon as they are published, but they must be in the shape of a novel or romance. GEO. M. HARE,

Vice Pres. Veteran L. L.

CHARLES WATTS sailed for London on the Gallia, May 23d, whither he had been preceded by his wife some two months. The directors of the League consider the summer months as the most valueless ones for lecture efforts, and the best for the lecturers to use for necessary private affairs. Mr. Watts returns for the Albany Convention. Mr. Putnam is at headquarters, and will conduct a literary campaign during the next two or three months.

THE Anti-Christian, a Freethought magazine published in Calcutta, India, Kaliprasanna Kavyabisharad, editor, contains a lengthy review of "Bible Morals," from which we quote the following: "We hav before us an admirable little book by Mr. John E. Remsburg. The author is a well-known American propagandist, and his recent publication is worthy of the reputation he has made for himself. The twenty reasons he put forth for not accepting the Bible as an infallible moral guide are beautifully arranged and expressed. The Truth Seeker Publishing Company deserve our heartiest thanks for bringing out such a work as this. It embodies in a small compass twenty hard nuts that will break the jaws of Christian orthodoxy. It should hav the greatest possible circulation, and Freethinkers everywhere should try to circulate it."

BIGOTRY IN MASONRY.

Under this head Mr. J. Harrison, of Toronto, has a long article in a recent TRUTH SEEKER, endeavoring to explain why he was ousted from the Masonic lodge in his city, and making bitter complaint because of their action in expelling him. Being a past master of Pocahontas Lodge No. 211, F. & A. M., of Seneca Falls, N. Y., and thoroughly conversant with all of the workings of Masonry, I will try to make a few explanations to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to some of their tenets, and leave them to judge whether Mr. Harrison should hav stated his case to the lodge and honestly withdrawn, or waited until charges were preferred against him.

No man can be made a mason without first declaring his belief in a God, and he also promises to take the holy Bible (!) "as a guide for his practices through life;" and the whole round of the ritual—except a few signs and passwords—is a constant exhortation to depend on God for all things, together with copious prayers and quotations from the Bible to show the great beneficence of an all-wise and powerful God, who is alleged to hav protected so carefully his chosen people for seven years, while building that great temple of Solomon that was to be dedicated to his holy name—an event that in all probability never occurred except in the mind of some crank.

When a man joins a Secular society, it seems to me that he renounces his belief in those old myths, and has but one honorable course to pursue; and that is to not run for an office in the lodge, but step down and out. To announce oneself as Agnostic is simply placing a pillow under your Christian neighbor so as not to let him down too hard. It is only another name for Atheist, and is a very just cause for preferring charges against any member of a Masonic lodge.

In my own case, when I became thoroughly convinced that Christianity and the Bible, together with the belief in the existence of a God, was a myth and a fraud, I severed my connections with Masonry, and plainly stated my reasons for doing so; and I do not find that I hav lost any friends or gained any enemies by my honesty, and my own conscience is perfectly free from the feeling of hypocrisy that could not fail to come were I trying to serve two masters. And the statement that the Masonic lodges hav "locked their doors against the intellect of the world" is not strictly true, as they never were opened to anyone except upon conditions that no person who gave the subject a careful study in the light of reason could accept. DR. H. J. PURDY.

Seneca Falls, N. Y.,

CHRISTIANS OR MASONS—WHICH?

"By their acts ye shall know them."

The action of the Master Masons' Lodge of Toronto, Canada, in expelling Brother Harrison because he lacked faith in Christianity—although all who hav the honor of his acquaintance acknowledge him to be an honest, generous, true gentleman, one who invariably acts upon the square—threatens destruction to the order; a consequence which, if produced by continued indulgence in such bigotry and intolerance, will hardly be lamented by true widow's sons.

Masonry is a system of religion with its own plan of salvation, its promis and method of securing eternal life in heaven, which utterly ignores and repudiates Christ and Christianity.

The name of Christ, or any reference to Christianity, is rigidly ignored; never, under any circumstances, is the name of Christ permitted to be uttered within a lodge of Master Masons.

Masons are taught that if they liv up to the teaching of the lodge, can keep faithfully their Masonic obligations, when death comes they shall be admitted by the Grand Tyler to the supreme lodge above; or, in plain English, if they liv up to the teachings of Masonry, they are sure of eternal life in heaven.

All Christians declare that there is no other name under heaven, that by no other plan of salvation is there possibility of attaining heaven save by faith in Jesus—the one only savior and redeemer.

How vile, false, and infamous then, for the avowed Christian to deny his master and his faith, to giv allegiance to Masonry, and not alone sanction, but teach a system of salvation that ignores Christ, for the sake of the benefits membership in the order confers.

It may be that some who hav always hired their thinking done for them by the parsons hav, hitherto, erred through thoughtlessness. But now Christians themselvs hav forced the issue; they hav attempted to expel from Masonry Liberals who really believe in the teachings of Masonry, that heaven can be attained only by a pure, virtuous, and useful life; and would retain only Christians who repudiate the teachings of Masonry, and insist that the vilest wretch is sure of heaven if, just when at his last gasp, he avows faith in Jesus.

Let every honest man at once resign—sever all connection with either church or Masonic lodge; none but the most vile, mercenary hypocrit will attempt to continue membership in both.

No conscientious Christian can remain a Mason. The New Testament declares that any who teach any other gospel or plan of salvation than through Christ shall by Christians be accursed. John declares, "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed" (2 John i, 10).

No sincere Christian can affiliate with a Master Mason or bid him Godspeed.

No honest, intelligent Mason will affiliate with a professed Christian who, within the lodge, accepts the teaching of Masonry, and in the church repudiates it. Let Christians be true, at least to something, and not claim to love Hiram while affiliating and abetting Jubalum. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

ODD FELLOWSHIP AND FREETHOUGHT.

The prime object of the order of Odd Fellowship seems to be identical with that of Liberalism, viz., to improve and elevate the moral character of man, to imbue mankind with conceptions of doing good to others, to enlighten the mind to a higher and nobler sphere of their affections and true fraternal relations than is taught by old orthodoxy. Indeed, the order is quite liberal in its requirements of its members. In common with the Masonic order, they require the applicant for membership to assent to only one article of faith, and that is belief in a supreme ruler of the universe. Its members are composed largely of Liberals, outspoken Infidels, but if Atheists they dare not say it. The order has in its membership men of every orthodox church except the Roman Catholic, although the lodge teaches in its ritual that living strictly in accordance with the Golden Rule is the whole of religion, and a safe transport to a happy life in a never-ending eternity. Yet there is nothing inconsistent for a member to become a bawling Methodist, if he thinks it will make his transport a little safer.

In consideration of the amount of talent in the order, and the prime and fundamental object of it being to advance a principle, it seems to us there is a little too much milk-and-water.

The ritual teaches all that the orthodox church teaches except the fall of man and the atonement.

It teaches God the supreme ruler, the Bible as an exhaustless fountain of truth coming from God, the necessity of sacrifices to appease the wrath of God, but in their ritual carefully guard against any sectarian belief as a saving ordinance except that advocated by Thomas Paine when he said, "The world is my country; to do good, my religion."

Again, the lodge in its secret meetings attempts to inculcate only those principles among themselvs which Liberals are trying to spread to the whole world. How small and insignificant it seems compared with the broad and noble views and language of Ingersoll to take up the ritual of Odd Fellowship and read:

"It is the duty of each member to help and support any afflicted and persecuted brother; to warn him of approaching danger; to save his property, character, or his life, should opportunity offer."

The true Liberal says this to the whole world, black or white, rich or poor.

But we are not wishing harm to Odd Fellows. We do wish to say that we think they are inconsistent in holding up the Bible as their guide as the word of God, and at the same time denouncing every creed of faith therein taught as a saving ordinance, and adopting that of Thomas Paine. W. H. PENFIELD.

Mr. Truesdell—Mr. Perry.

I hav just read Mr. Truesdell's article in this issue about the Seybert Commission and his reply to my criticism of his famous $500 offer, and will say a few words in reply, and then hope to dismiss the subject so far, as, I think, the public is not interested in the gentleman's efforts to prove me untrustworthy while he is dodging the proposition I in reality made. The letter of Dr. Joseph Leidy leaves the question just where I left it in my last article. The Seybert Commission as a body, of course, has not given any expressions of opinion, and I never stated that it had. I did say that members of it had talked privately to their friends about Drs. Slade and Keller, and I hav every reason to believe what they told me; but, as the rumors and reporters' stories were often exaggerated on both sides of the question, it was seen by the commission that unless a stop was made their report would lose much of its public interest, if it did not result in a complete squabble, and finally prevent a harmonious report altogether; but it is a fact not to be denied that Dr. Pepper has publicly lectured in an Eastern college, I think, on the very question which the commission has in hand (see Banner of Light) in which the several propositions were stated at the time, April, 1885. Mr. Truesdell should hav published their answers to his letters in full, or at least one which denied the statement as it was made.

I shall not giv the names of any of the commission, as they were not given to me, nor, as the friends are unknown to Mr. Truesdell, would it be of any public interest to parade them before THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. I feel under neither necessity nor obligations to betray their confidence by doing so.

Mr. Truesdell would like the public to think him a very humble seeker after truth, who is willing and anxious to bless some medium with $500 cash that will convince him of the reality of a future life, and that his offer is in no way a bet; but in the face of this, if my memory serves me, he does insist on being liberally paid for his valuable time while thus engaged in seeking in his "humble" way. I think one of his propositions to a Mr. Lacy was that he must have $10 or $20 an hour, with unrestricted liberty to snatch, pull, twist, and humbly try the spirits during the performance. If I am not mistaken, and Mr. Lacy can correct me if I am wrong, it was $20 for every failure. I think I read something of his conduct that was so distasteful that the medium refused to sit, and in view of those obstacles I was led to make the offer that Mr. Truesdell should select his best and most trustworthy friend, I to select mine; the medium to know nothing of a reward; the friends to be authorized to choose a third person, who should wait upon the medium I should select, and each to remain away from the sittings and depend on their report of and examinations of the slates, and if intelligent and pertinent writings occurred thereon, Mr. Truesdell would be obliged to acknowledge slate-writing without physical contact a fact, and pay over the $500.

I wrote this to Miss E. E. Gibson in a private letter, wishing to know whether the gentleman would place his disinterested offer on such a basis, and, if so, I had no doubt his $500 offer would slide away from him "as easily as a piece of greasy pork would slide down a lightning-rod."

To the above Miss E. E. Gibson replied that I ought to be willing to pay him $500 if the person failed to produce the writing, and said she would inquire and see what Mr. Truesdell would say to such a proposition, but for about a year I heard nothing from him; but of course that would be no bet. He pays $500 if I succeed and I pay $500 if I fail—but that is no bet, say they. Well, what is it?

In quoting from the private letter by permission (of whom?) he failed to quote the proposition at all, and if this is a specimen of the gentleman's fairness, I do not wonder that he is laboring to bring me into the same public estimate.

He asks pardon for writing the following: "There is hardly one among us who does not crave positiv proof of continued existence, and identity of loved ones gone before, but when evidence is offered to us in dark circles [just what he admits he did] or in very dim light, surrounded by such conditions [John has no conditions attached to his munificent $500 offer], invariably exacted, as preclude fair investigation [that's him], when our pure and loving mothers, our fair daughters, or guiltless babes appear at the cabinet window and regale us with mixed odors of onions and tobacco, unclean teeth, and poor whisky, we should at least be treated courteously by our opponents if we are skeptical as to the identity of our friends."

In my thirty years of investigations, I never hav in a single instance been regaled by onions, tobacco, or bad whisky by any spirit manifesting, and if John W. Truesdell was, it is an unfortunate circumstance for him that he attracts spirits of that low class; but as probably no other could approach him, he ought to be charitable enough toward himself to be thankful for even this opportunity to be convinced of immortality. The well-known chemical law of "like attracts like" will apply in his case. If he attracts sharpers and cheating spirits it is because he has for a long time, as he admits, and as his friends state for him, practiced deceptions on others who were just as anxious for positive proofs of immortal life as he professes to be now, and for this fact of the kind of influence he exerts at a sitting, I want to get the slate writing for him without encumbering the medium with his presence, and would not consent on any other grounds.

Our mutual friend, E. E. Gibson, in defending Mr. Truesdell, puts his case on high and patriotic grounds. She makes him a self-constituted detectiv, with the high secret motiv of helping a deluded public to first believe a damnable lie in order to effectually wipe it out by subsequent exposure. But the logic is a failure, because ten thousand big lies exposed will not blot out one little truth. It only makes the little diamond shine out with greater brilliancy when surrounded by the paste and polished ones, and it will be detected the moment it strikes the eye of wisdom in search of truth. This doing evil that good may follow is a pernicious church doctrin, not in favor in our days of moral ethics.

Personally I hav nothing against J. W. Truesdell; I only condemn his methods of investigation, and can very easily relieve him of his money on fair trial. But I do not intend to go to Rochester nor pay him $20 an hour for a sitting, nor do I want to attend where spirits regale with onions, tobacco, and poor whisky, because, if he has stated facts, while his physical side of life may be respectable, his spiritual side is in a deplorable state indeed, which no medium that wishes to retain his or her powers intact would desire to encounter. J. R. PERRY.

Canadian Notes.

The Toronto Secular Society celebrated the public holiday on the occasion of the Queen's Birthday, on the twenty-fourth day of May, by holding high carnival at Alton. The festiv season extended over a period of several days, from the twenty-second to the twenty-sixth of May. Concerts, balls, and every description of merry-making kept up a perpetual round of delight. The open-handed, open-hearted hospitality of the Algie family transcends all bounds. May their shadows never grow less!

On Sunday evening last a meeting of the Toronto Secular Society was held in the hall at the Grand Opera House. Mr. Appleton, the financial secretary, gave the paper of the evening on D'Holbach's "System of Nature," which, together with the musical part of the entertainment, made an enjoyable time.

It is curious to see the amount of faith which church-goers hav in the power of their parsons to overwhelm any number of Freethinkers. Said parsons hav made this assertion regarding themselvs so many times that their congregations believe them, spite of the fact staring them in the face that these anointed braggarts dare not venture out of their coward's castle to meet a Freethinker in debate.

The Toronto Secular Society hold a concert, ball, and general reunion once every week, on each Wednesday evening. On each occasion there is a very large attendance, and all the performers are members of the society, who supply vocal and instrumental music, character sketches, interludes, etc., etc. The talent and versatility displayed at these concerts will compare favorably with any performances of the kind.

The popular, the prevailing philosophy of the present day is that of evolution. Just as at other periods at one time it has been the Epicurean, at another the Platonic, the Aristotelian, the Scholastic, etc., so in our day it is that of evolution.

It has four main component parts—the nebular hypothesis, the theory of spontaneous generation, Darwinism, and the evolution of intelligence, the human mind, intellect, or soul, as it is commonly called. These four departments hav been advocated by various writers, some advocating one, some another, of these leading domains and rejecting the remainder; some accept the whole four. It is only these last who are evolutionists in the most complete sense of the word, the others being so only partially.

Among those who teach the evolution philosophy in its entirety are the great German philosopher, Ernst Haeckel, and the great English philosopher, Herbert Spencer.

We will now state in a few short, simple words the outlines of this the popular, the prevailing philosophy of the present day, which embraces in one consecutiv system the whole of the knowledge which man has ever acquired, so far as known in the present day, physical and mental, social and moral, regarding the whole universe around us and within us, as it includes man, physical and mental, soul and body.

On a clear night when we lift our gaze to the Milky Way overhead we are looking at matter in a nebulous condition. For although some of the nebulæ hav been resolved into clusters of stars, yet our most improved astronomical instruments, including the spectroscope, hav proved and demonstrated the existence of masses of nebulous matter—that is, matter in the most simple, the most primitiv form, at present known to us.

The nebular hypothesis is, that this earth and all the planets of the solar system, including the sun, were, at one time, in the condition of a nebulous cloud. That getting attracted closer together as it rotated, a ring was thrown off from the outer rim, which condensed and became a planet, which circled around the central sun a further condensation of which caused another outer ring to be thrown off, to be condensed, and become another planet, to circle around the central sun, the second, consequently, having a smaller orbit than the first. This process was repeated until the whole of the planets of the solar system had been thrown off which now circle round the sun. Consequently, at one time, the combined matter of the sun and planets of the solar system, when in a nebulous state, filled up the entire space at present circled around by the outermost of our planets in its orbit and far beyond. These orbs keep continually cooling, and, as their motion lessens in velocity, they will all gradually, one after the other, fall back into the sun from whence they came. The heat engendered by these concussions will again resolve the whole of our present solar system to its former state of a nebulous, fiery cloud, again filling up the entire space at present circled around by the outermost of our planets in its orbit and far beyond, again to be condensed into orbs, and so on to all eternity.

Ths history of our solar system is the history of all other systems, suns, planets, stars, comets, aerolites, and all the orbs and heavenly bodies whatsoever. So much for the nebular hypothesis propounded by Kant, mathematically expounded by Laplace, based on positiv science by Herschel. Now for spontaneous generation. As the earth gradually cooled down, land and water began to appear and organic life became evolved by the spontaneous action of the essential properties of matter. You hav all seen the common experiment in physics of loosely strewing steel filings on a paper down underneath which is lying a magnet. Immediately the fragments of steel arrange themselvs in geometrical lines. And another, where an unshaken mass of matter, previously arranged in chemical proportions, by merely waving a feather over it suddenly assumes the most beautiful crystalline forms. So, as soon as the heated matter of the earth had cooled enough to form a medium for the existence of organisms, and the hitherto unorganized, but organizable, matter (protoplasm) was ready to spring into organic life, it took place by spontaneous generation.

Secular Superstitions—The Seduction of Abysses.

"Saw the gloomy eyes of Panguk Glaring on him in the darkness."—Hiawatha.

There are few who upon the pinnacle of a precipice, or in crossing a river upon the trestles of a railroad bridge, hav not been conscious of that vertigo in which the voice of the abyss says—"Plunge!" This is the basso of an orchestra in which the Lorelei of lucid streams sings the soprano or contralto.

Such is the animal fascination of the serpent. Hope attracts, love enthrals; so do fear and hate. Certain personal presences combine these effluvia. They blend at the gaming table. they are genii of the bar-room and the bottle. Soldiers feel their weird spell in the shock of battle, and before the mouths of cannon belching a hail of deaths. It penetrates collectiv masses. Hell yawns from beneath for the faithful of the churches. The Inquisition borrowed a coal of hell-fire to kindle its auto-da-fé.

Our government craze owns a like inspiration. The French Revolution had also its fanatics and its inquisition, though purely political. And Russia! Passions—I speak not of their paroxysmal erethisms in demonstrativ phenomena of speech or action, but of their essential qualities as modes of personality—passions persist, become hereditary even, while their objects change. Born heir to a clerical superstition, education, social influence, reflection, may make one what is called an Infidel; yet unless he hav an original genius for skepticism, the chances are that he remains, without suspecting it, in thraldom to some other superstition, generally the governmental. There is Mr. Malcolm, for instance. As he writes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, no doubt he claims to hav obtained his free papers; yet it is evident to me that nothing more than an accident of circumstances prevents his being on his marrow bones every Sunday in no matter what sort of church. Every would-be reformer by authority of law—man-made law—would, in Moses's place, hav had "Thus saith the Lord" on his tongue just as glib as Moses. He has changed only the idiom of language to suit our modern prejudices. And there is Mr. Wakeman. He hardly suspects how readily, with education and position, he might hav been another Mgr. Capel. Their differences lie more in policies than in principles of character relativ to authority.

When the predatory instinct is the dominant factor in the superstition of authority, it seeks state offices and levies tributes. When conscientiousness prevails, it is still more prejudicial to liberty, requiring with inquisitorial spirit that others shall conform to our own notions of orthodox conduct; viz., legislation about marriage, about the Sabbath, about drinking, about games, about sales, about work, about private contracts, etc. It is at those epochs and among those peoples when the evils of governmental action are most poignant, that our blind leaders of the blind are heard invoking government on all occasions and for every purpose. Because among the forms of hereditary insanity, intemperance is numbered, therefore government is called on to forbid the sale of even light wines that make nobody drunk. China went farther; its government had the vine destroyed; consequently the Chinese made rice wine and distilled from it arrack, and took to smoking opium.

Mr. Malcolm, smitten with the fallacy of prohibition, but holding fast his faith in Uncle Sam, like the dying Brahman to the cow's tail, invokes government distilleries and government dispensaries of pure liquor for the administrativ providence of drinking men! Government liquor would be innocent as sacramental wine.

Some railroads overcharge for freight; therefore, government must fix the rates. The legislature of Texas forbids railroads to charge different rates within that state with a view to successful competition with other lines. In consequence, New Orleans and St. Louis receive the consignments which would be made to Galveston for export were the roads left free to manage their own business, and even Texan produce to be consumed in Texas has to make the round through other states.

In its blind idolatry of government the American people imagin that the ballot has some occult faculty of endowing with wisdom representativs ignorant of everything beyond the arts of popularity, and faithful, at best, to some petty class interest. The same state that has so neatly cheated itself in the railroad muddle now undertakes to regulate insurance. By Section IV. it puts upon insurers the responsibility of proving that a given stock of merchandise has not been decreased in amount or depreciated in value! The state, moreover, sets up at Austin an office of certification to tell the people which companies are trustworthy! Of course, the state certifier is an incorruptible person. Of course, he is incapable of bias toward his friends, or of prejudice against others. Of course, he is omniscient. Then the state must decide whether the company's agents are or are not to hav plenary powers of negotiation! See what apt pupils Uncle Sam has got!

This "infantine familiar clasp of things divine" reminds us of his own brilliant exploits with the currency, that breath of life for commerce and for war; reminds us of our faith tax in fiat creations, and the mediatorial atonement of our divine brother Jay Gould, and the scheme of salvation by the national banks.

In 1862, his great heart being aggrieved that Cuffy was debarred from the manly sport of free competition for wages, and Cuffy's dignity compromised by allowances of food and clothing; Unce Sam, foreseeing, moreover, the Malthusian catastrophe of our present 50,000,000 bellies, determined on propitiating Cerberus by a sop of at least one (1–50), and the pick of his young roosters. But the purse being a more sensitiv organ than the skin, and its sphincters contracting after Bull Run, our uncle was puzzled about raising a few paltry billions. Go a bluff game on your credit, urged Thaddeus Stevens. But to this, Republican modesty demurred, and the bankers insisted on a gold basis, which they offered to supply for a trifling consideration, about 300–100, bearing interest, and to be paid in gold, metallic fact instead of the gilded idea. With sagacity no less acute than his generous devotion to Cuffy was sublime, Uncle Sam said: "Damn the odds; the people will stand treat. Here, do you take my credit, since I havn't any use for it at present. We'll swap, and make as broad a basis of national debt as our respectable daddy Bull's."

He spoke and it was done, and his bonds are here to show for it, and still he gratefully allows the banks a bonus upon their deposits, and it tickles him so to found his currency upon a debt that he can't bear to lessen this engagement and that of paying interest, even when his surplus in the treasury could clear it off with mercantil integrity. Jealous, however, of the fortune of our national jackdaws, decked with the Samuel feathers, the Greenbackers repeat in time of peace, old Thaddeus's fiat warcry: Cheap money, cheap money, and none so cheap as faith money! Fling a thousand dollars of it at the head of each of your fifty million children, cries the kind heart of T. B. Wakeman. Let us abolish poverty! And the "capables" are ready to respond, "Oh, yes, giv them all the faith paper they want, and we'll keep the land, and the machinery, and the goods—in trust for them, you know.

A white man and an Indian went a-hunting together, like capital and labor. They shot a turkey and a turkey-buzzard. When it came to sharing, said Captain C.: "Now I'll take the turkey and you take the buzzard; or else, you take the buzzard and I'll take the turkey." Poor Lo remarked: "You never said turkey to me once." It never occurs to our green illusionists that the bill of exchange is still cheaper than fiat notes, and yet represents real, well-defined values of produce. This is now the privilege of mercantil intelligence and probity; but why should not all exchangeable values, including even promises of labor, be represented impartially in such a currency? What would it lack but the government idea?

Other illusionists fasten on the soil. Blind to the settlers' indefeasible right to what he cultivates, nothing short of a government rental will consecrate this right in their eyes. For would not the plan hav the advantage of furnishing thousands of land-agent offices for party patronage? And what could ever shake the stability of a government that owned all the soil and created all the money? Its creation would be something like that of Genesis. Nature being a theological secretion, money ought to be a political secretion, both equally fiats and founded on faith, for the state is the visible providence of the invisible God. EDGEWORTH.

Victor Hugo.

The last of a trio of historic European Freethinkers has passed away. Though separated from one by over half a century and from the other by half as long, Hugo can be compared with none but Voltaire and Goethe. Like them, he was a man of towering genius, a most wonderful literary artist, and the one man of his time and country. Like Volfaire and Goethe, Hugo believed in a God, hoped for immortality, and rejected the Christian theology. They were all Infidels.

In the obituary printed on another page Hugo's services to France and the world are briefly told. It holds the record unbroken that the most ardent friends to mankind in all ages hav been despisers of priestly shams and thaumaturgy. When it became known throughout Paris that Hugo was dying, Cardinal Guibert, the archbishop of Paris, sent specially to Hugo's residence, offering to visit him and administer spiritual aid and the rites of the Catholic church. M. Lockroy, the poet's son-in-law, who was in attendance at the death-bed when the cardinal's proffer came, replied for Hugo, declining with thanks the archbishop's tender, and saying for the dying man, "Victor Hugo is expecting death, but he does not desire the services of a priest." Hugo left a bequest that his body should be conveyed to the grave in a "pauper hearse," and without any religious rites. The Pantheon of France is an ecclesiastical institution, but it has been secularized by the Chamber of Deputies that Hugo's remains may rest by the empty sarcophagi of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Mirabeau. Let us hope that against this protection of the state the church will be unable to despoil his coffin as she has those of his immortal predecessors.

France buried Victor Hugo with tears and flowers, while the whole western world stood with uncovered head. For a day the body lay upon a catafalque under the Arc de Triomphe, inclosed with drapery and crape. At the front masts bore escutcheons inscribed with the titles of Hugo's works. The burial took place on Monday, June 1st. The funeral procession was so large that when its head, guarding the body of Hugo, had reached the Pantheon the end had not left the Arc de Triomphe. Hundreds of thousands of people crowded the streets of Paris, and the buildings along the line of march of the procession were black with people. Six orations were delivered under the Arc de Triomphe in the presence of nearly all the illustrious men of France. The hearse was preceded by twelve floral cars, besides eight hundred wreaths carried by the various deputations. It was not a funeral, said M. Floquet, but an apotheosis. Hugo was the immortal apostle who bequeathed to humanity that gospel which could lead the people to definitiv conquest of liberty, equality, fraternity. M. Goblet, president of the Chamber of Deputies, declared that Victor Hugo will remain the highest personification of the nineteenth century, the history of which, with its contradictions, doubts, ideas, and aspirations, was best reflected in his works. His character was profoundly humane, and represented the spirit of toleration and of peace.

Before the funeral the Catholics protested against the burial of Hugo in the Pantheon, which was originally the church of Saint Genevieve, but the government paid no attention to their protests, beyond ordering the priests to quit the building after the decree of secularization had been passed. The funeral was in every way worthy of France and the great poet whose memory she honored. It was right that the government should refuse to hav his religious opinions made the cause of factional strife.

A Specimen Chaplain.

Occasionally the religious press finds fault with some individual connected with the church, and thereby shows how true is the old saying that when rogues fall out honest men get their due.

About $60,000 per year is spent by our government upon chaplains in the navy. Just about one year ago the resignation from his sinecure of one Brown brought out the information that he had been paid $19,246 for three years and seven months' service. By way of a religious paper of this city another equally disgraceful case of sinecurism is brought to light. The name is not given, but the history of this chaplain's career is as follows: He has been on leave for two years. For the past six months he has occupied a pulpit on shore, and has recently received and accepted an engagement with the church for a year. He will not resign from the navy, saying he wants to be kept on leave for eight or nine years more, when he will be retired, drawing his pay (three-fourths of that of a captain), without liability to be ordered to duty. He has not been to sea for the past four years, but has drawn his pay regularly. At present he receives $1,900 per year, which is the "on leave" or "waiting orders" remuneration of chaplains who hav been over five years in the navy. He is also paid $500 or $600 by the church in which he is at work.

The objection of the religious paper to this petty swindling is that it deprives the sailors of those "Christian influences which the faithful and vigorous chaplain would giv." It says: "On what principle the government continues such a man on a salary three or four times what his ability would command elsewhere, and then fails to require of him even such performance of the duties of the station as he could render, while the prestige of his position secures admittance where it probably would not be accorded without it, it is impossible to imagin."

The objection of Freethinkers is based on much broader grounds. There is in our Constitution a positiv prohibition of the establishment of religion by Congress. Every cent paid to navy or army chaplains, or to the chaplains of the two branches of Congress, is in flagrant violation of the First Amendment. Our inquiry is, on what principle can the government employ chaplains at all?

What is Mr. Beecher?

In the course of the sermons on evolution that Mr. Beecher is now delivering on successiv Sundays, he takes particular pains to declare that he is "neither an Infidel, Agnostic, nor Atheist," but continues to enunciate sentiments that prove him to be all these. He rejects the Bible, which constitutes him an Infidel; he spurns the orthodox Christian conception of God, for doing which he is an Atheist; he has created his own God, which is very much like Herbert Spencer's Unknowable, and he is, therefore, an Agnostic. With some loose talkers, rhetoricians, and pulpit orators, words hav very indefinit significance, and they can even make assertions of doctrins which mean one thing to the audience, but upon which the preacher makes mental reservations to satisfy his own conscience. Mr. Beecher, we are sorry to say, is one of this kind. Last Sunday he said:

"I believe in God; I believe in immortality; I believe in Jesus Christ as the representativ of divinity in God. If I am anything, by the grace of God I am a lover of Jesus Christ as the representativ of God, and in no part of all my life has my ministry seemed to me so solemn, so earnest, so fruitful as this last decade will seem if I shall succeed in uncovering, in the faith of God's people, the great truths of the two revelations —God's building revelation of the material globe and God's building revelation in the history of the unfolding of the human mind. May God direct me."

To an audience of average Christians this would mean that he accepted the Christian theology. But he does not. In previous sermons Mr. Beecher has contemptuously denied that there is any future punishment; has announced his disbelief in the resurrection; has declared the atonement an impossible and immoral doctrin, and in other pulpit utterances shown himself to be no more a Christian than were Voltaire and Paine. His words quoted above even hav a double meaning. A good Christian would say, "Well, he believes in Christ as the representativ of God—his son, and that is enough for me." To a doubter the words would mean only that Mr. Beecher thought Christ to be a representativ of God, as any other man might be. Such doctrin is more heterodox than Unitarianism, and such interpretation would place the preacher a long distance outside the pale of Christianity. It will probably take an ecumenical council to decide just where Mr. Beecher stands theologically. But two things seem certain: the doctrin of evolution has in him a warm friend, and real Christianity a very powerful opponent.

For Being a Freethinker.

In the present day religious persecution has to take a different form from that of the three centuries preceding this. But that the same spirit of intolerance still pervades Christianity is evident by the occasional outbreak of some orthodox Christian who happens to be possessed of power. The latest instance that has come to our knowledge is the dismissal of Miss Kate Stephens from the professorship of Greek at the Kansas State University. The St. Joseph Herald is the authority.

It appears that Miss Stephens is a graduate of the University, where since her graduation she has filled the Greek chair in the college with great credit to herself and to the entire satisfaction of some three or four hundred students. The University is governed by six regents, who, with the chancellor, compose a board vested with almost absolute power in all matters pertaining to the University. Of this board of seven, one is a friend to the lady in question, three are her enemies, and the other three follow the lead of the inimical regents.

The reasons why Miss Stephens was dismissed are also three: 1. Miss Stephens is a Freethinker; 2. She is a woman; 3. One of the regents has a standing grudge against her father. These reasons, however, are totally inadequate, for it cannot be charged that Miss Stephens has obtruded her ideas in her duties, or endeavored to teach Freethought to the students. For the fact that she is a woman, it will probably be admitted that she is not to blame. So long as the University admits female students, it cannot consistently refuse to employ female professors, provided they are as competent as males. And in these days, discrimination against a woman solely because of her sex is a disgrace to a state. The personal malice of one of the regents toward Miss Stephens's father, a lawyer and judge of high rank and state reputation, is a matter too despicable for comment. In biblical times the sins of the fathers were visited upon the children, but it is not nineteenth century doctrin, and a man who copies the Jewish Jehovah so closely may well be looked upon with suspicion.

Heretofore Kansas has been given the credit of being a state with progressiv ideas, but this action of the government of her representativ institution may well shake that reputation. The petty persecution of an estimable lady, filling a difficult position with profit to the University, and in herself worthy any honor the college could confer, will, unless rebuked by the people and the press of the state, be a blot on the escutcheon of Kansas, and in the future not a slight impediment to her growth and influence.

The Baptists.

To meet the approbation of those indicated we will supply, so far as we can, the information desired by the writers of the following letter:

"It would meet with the approbation of several at this place for you to giv us some information in regard to the following questions:

"Who founded the first Baptist church in America? And did his church prosper or go down? What church in America was founded by John Clarke, and at what time? Benedict, Chambers's Encyclopedia, and all the school histories that we can get say Roger Williams was the founder, but a Baptist minister here denies these as authority, and affirms that Roger's church went down in four months, and that John Clarke planted the first church in America. We call on him for the evidence, and he refers us to a sermon that was delivered in Philadelphia by a Baptist minister in 1838 as authority, but we won't accept it. So you see 'the layman discusses theology with the minister and smiles.' Please answer through the columns of your paper. Very truly yours,

"ED. MUSGRAVE and J. D. FAIR."

As reference books, we use the Encyclopedia Britannica, the standard authority in nearly all international matters; Johnson's, a very fairly edited cyclopedia, in the preparation of which many Freethinking writer's were employed; and the People's Cyclopedia, a Methodist work, of considerable *un*fairness. The Britannica says that "the introduction of Baptist views in America was due to Roger Williams, who emigrated to Boston, Mass., in 1630. Driven from Massachusetts on account of his denying the power of the civil magistrates in matters of religion, he formed a settlement and founded a state in Rhode Island, and having become a Baptist, he formed, in 1639, the first Baptist church in America, of which he was also for a short time the pastor." This "short time" was four months, at the end of which he withdrew from the church, and was never again connected with any church. The John Clarke referred to was Dr. John Clarke, who came to this country, landing in Massachusetts. According to Johnson's Cyclopedia, he also was driven from Massachusetts "to Rhode Island, in 1638, and in the same year founded the first Baptist church at Newport. This church claims to be older than the first church at Providence, and therefore the first of that faith in the New World. Clarke visited England in company with Roger Williams, and together they obtained from Charles II. the charter which secured civil and religious liberty to Rhode Island." Concerning this Dr. John Clarke the Encyclopedia Britannica is silent, but the People's Cyclopedia (Methodist) says that he was the "founder of the first Baptist church at Newport, R. I., in 1638, which claims to be the first in the New World," thus agreeing with Johnson's, from which De Puy, the editor, very likely obtained his information. In describing Providence, however, the same Cyclopedia says that it contains "seventy-six churches, among them the oldest Baptist church in America, established in 1638 by Roger Williams." This, it will be observed, is a year earlier than the Encyclopedia Britannica has it, and corresponds with the date assigned by Johnson's to the establishment by Clarke of the church in Newport. According to Johnson, Roger Williams settled in Providence in 1636, and as Clarke, by the same authority, went to Newport in 1638, it is probable that Williams founded the first Baptist church in America. A man of his activ habits and burning faith in his then heretical notions, would scarcely liv two or three years in a settlement of his own founding without establishing a church in which to preach.

A Generous Man.

The Liberals of the country should be grateful to William Smith, of Geneva, New York. While contributions to the League Campaign Fund hav been quite generous, money for the Tent for summer campaigning has come in so slowly that Mr. Reynolds has been obliged to borrow funds to purchase the tent and its fixtures. This he did rather than giv up an enterprise promising so much for the spread of Liberal ideas. The tent and appurtenances cost some three hundred dollars. Simultaneously with the purchase of the tent and since the writing of Mr. Reynolds's communication in another column, we received from Mr. Smith a check for just this sum. This donation will put the enterprise on its feet, release Mr. Reynolds from debt, and enable the contributions already in, and those that may come hereafter, to be used for the running expenses, and the free distribution of Liberal literature.

The wisdom of using a tent for summer work is more than ever apparent, now that Messrs. Putnam and Watts hav been compelled to retire from the field before the hot weather. While Mr. Watts is closing up his business in England, and Mr. Putnam is engaged in the East developing the possibilities of the Albany Convention, and speaking wherever he can get a hearing, Mr. Reynolds will go on carrying the truths of Liberalism to crowds to whom such teachings are new. It is safe to say his voice and the reading matter he can scatter will reach thousands who could never be coaxed into a hall to hear a Liberal lecture, though the speaker were as eloquent as Putnam or as solidly logical as Watts. Therefore, for one, we heartily thank Mr. Smith for enabling this to be done on a secure basis.

Outside of this last contribution some one hundred and fifty-five dollars cash hav been collected. This will pay the expense of the tent for some time, should the collections and sale of books be insufficient. THE TRUTH SEEKER pledged Mr. Reynolds twenty-five dollars' worth of books to be sold for the benefit of the Tent Fund. This can now be given in tracts and pamphlets to be gratuitously circulated, should purchasers be scarce. We would suggest that this missionary work be continued by further donations of reading matter from Liberal publishers and of money from the people. Nothing would suit Mr. Smith so well as to hav his donation made the basis of a vast propagandist effort. He himself is constantly buying books and sending them broadcast. Let us all aid him and advance our common cause by supporting the summer campaign.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1.50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Editorial Notes.

ACCORDING to S. H. Preston, writing in the Day Star, Paul was "a small, swarthy, sickly, sharp-eyed, shrill-voiced, beetle-browed, hooked-nose Jew."

WE are under obligations to Lewis Rothermel for a donation of $5, and to Wm. H. Godfrey, of St. Louis, Mo., for a similar favor of $3.05. The purpose for which these sums will be used is pointed out in a note appended to Mr. Rothermel's letter in the "Letters from Friends."

THE North American Review concludes its seventieth year with its June number. The editor says that it never had so large a circulation, nor greater influence, nor a more brilliant staff of contributors. This number discusses seven topics of vital public interest. Price, 50 cents.

THAT is a gem of thought which our correspondent, Simeon Palmer, quotes from the Rev. Mr. Talmage in another part of this paper. "What God does," says the reverend gentleman, "is not so wonderful as what he does not do." Those who hav all their lives watched and prayed in vain for some slight manifestation of divine power will agree with us that Mr. Talmage has stated a cold and formal fact. Any further elaboration of the subject would be, in the language of revised scripture, "vanity and a striving after wind."

WE advise the Chicago Herald and other would-be respectable papers that hav dilated upon Clark Braden's slanderous abuse of Liberal, Mo., calling the alleged immorality of the people the "fruits of Ingersollism," and drawing therefrom a column of "morals," to revise and rewrite their editorials now that even the Christians unite in denouncing Braden as a liar. The facts being exactly opposit to what they hav based their deductions upon, it will be in order for them to giv Infidelity as much credit for promoting morality as they hav given it discredit for a suppositional production of the other thing.

IT appears from researches made by Messrs. Tucker and Appleton that the late Charles O'Conor was an Anarchist, of which fact we are reminded by Liberty. Whether he was or not, however, can no longer be of importance, as Mr. O'Conor is dead. In order to deserve the credit for being a reformer a man should assert himself during life. As far as THE TRUTH SEEKER is concerned, it has little use for that class of people who are too cowardly to proclaim their convictions, and too mean to encourage others in proclaiming them. It is hardly worth while to dig these up and load them with posthumous honors.

THOUGH Mr. R. B. Hayes has acquired a national reputation as a temperance man, it is now discovered that he owns property in Omaha upon which is located a flourishing saloon. Many papers are expressing surprise at his allowing such a business to be established upon land owned by him, but they would not did they know the contemptible, canting hypocrisy with which the man is filled. He is a veritable Pecksniff—a sniveling Methodist, with a mental capacity equal to hen farm-farming and penny-squeezing, but a man in no right sense of that word. He lied to Colonel Ingersoll in Mr. Bennett's case, and was Janus-faced in other matters all through his political career.

THERE is published in Kansas City, Mo., a religious and prohibition paper called the Centropolis. The establishment in Kansas City of a Liberal League is made the occasion by the Centropolis of an editorial contrasting the League with the National Reform Association. Of course, its views are exactly opposit to those expressed by THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 23d. But the conclusion is identical with the idea often expressed in these columns: "The aim of the National Reform Association is the very opposit of the Liberal League or Secular Union. In the light of present demands of the Secularist it looks very much as though everyone would hav to make his choice, and stand either with the one or the other. One thing is very certain, that the time is not distant when the friends of our Christian institutions will hav to unitedly stand against those who hav determined to overwhelm them."

THE luminous but somewhat dilatory Boston Liberty finds fault with the Liberal press:

"The sentiment of true religion is first set free when the ecclesiastical machine is lifted from it. So is the impulse for mutual self-government by consent first set free when the political machine is lifted from it. Strange, indeed, is it that, while the Index, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, and all the free religionists, Agnostics, Materialists, and other Infidels, so-called, constantly proclaim this on the religious side, they refuse to recognize it on the political side, and thus cowardly belie their whole philosophy. All these religious Liberals are Anarchists in theology, and zealously preach the Anarchistic gospel in that sphere; but when asked to confront exactly the same situation in the political sphere, they are stiff-necked Presbyterians, hard-shelled Baptists, and straitlaced political orthodox, of a very fanatical type. When I meet them, they politically invite me to rise for prayers, seek Jesus, and flee from the wrath to come."

We can only speak for THE TRUTH SEEKER in reply to this, but so far as we are concerned it is not so. Instead of rebuking Mr. Tucker for his political heresy, we hav on three occasions invited him to explain it. This he attempted to do, but stopped so far short of supplying the information sought that we were constrained to point out his deficiencies and renew the invitation, which last obtestation remains unheeded. By this silence we conclude that Mr. Tucker has already fled from the wrath to come, and further exhortations would be superfluous.

MRS. H. S. LAKE writes us: "In your issue of May 2d, I find an article headed 'The Apostasy of a Christian Freelover.' I write you for the purpose of correcting this misstatement. It is well known by all who hav been acquainted with Leo Miller, to whom the above article refers, that he has been a pronounced Liberal for many years, writing for its press and speaking on its platform. So far as I know, or any of his friends with whom I hav talked, he is still a Liberal. That he has held 'peculiar' views in regard to marriage, has been known, all along, by the Liberal public, and it is not just to characterize him as a Christian in order that stigma may be thrown upon Christianity. I feel certain that THE TRUTH SEEKER will not willingly lend itself to a work so reprehensible as that of doing injustice even to an opponent." If this be as Mrs. Lake says, Mr. Miller's Liberal work has been conducted remarkably quiet—a "still hunt," as it were. Judging, however, from Mr. Miller's assertion that marriage is a divine institution ordained by God, and his reference, in another part of his letter to the Sun, to Jesus as an authority, we are inclined to doubt that Mr. Miller has much spmpathy with Rationalism.

"SAM" JONES, a reformed drunkard and gambler, of Georgia, is turning the religious part of Nashville, Tenn., upside down by his wild revival talks. He is so ignorant as to believe the Bible literally, and in his sermons uses, a correspondent writes, the most insultingly vulgar, coarse, brutal, and indecent backwoods slang of the backwoods of his nativ state. But there are a few Liberals in Nashville, and they are helping him along by circulating a large poster, of which the following is a copy. It was sent to us by F. Pfister. We cheerfully giv Mr. Jones the benefit of our large circulation among people interested in religious matters by printing it:

SAM JONES'S
GREAT SHOW AND CIRCUS
WILL TAKE PLACE AT
NASHVILLE, MAY 15, 1885, AND CONTINUE TWENTY DAYS.

The laughable farce, CHRISTIANITY, will be expounded by the Clown, SAM JONES.

His great fanatical oratory will furnish lunatics for the new Lunatic Asylum, about to be erected at Knoxville, at the expense of the taxpayers, where he has already been very successful in confusing the minds of his hearers.

Seats will be occupied by religious cranks, hypocrits, unlettered men and women, fanatics, defaulters, snuff-dippers, morphine and opium eaters, murderers, robbers and thieves, besides some misguided though well-meaning men and women, most of whom will go only to see the show. It will be the grandest farce that ever took place in Nashville.

Murderers always profess on the gallows to believe in a God and devil, supposing that the clergy can send them straight to heaven from the gallows, regardless of the heinous crimes they may commit.

None will be considered eligible for the throne of grace who hav minds of their own, or are strictly honest and moral, or don't believe in impossibilities. All persons whose minds are not clouded with superstition, bigotry, and sectarian hatred will be ruled out as incompetent.

The side-show will be very attractiv for the matrimonial market and sight seers.

Tickets free, but don't forget the missionary box, for you know the action of the clergy is, No money, no preach.

HUMBUG & IGNORANCE, Managers.

RIEL, the captured Canadian insurgent, has been interviewed by a Herald correspondent. The reasons of the half-breed revolt are familiar to the public, but the part religion played has not heretofore been dwelt upon. Asked if the priests were friendly to him, Riel said: "They were not and they were. They insisted on our being submissiv to them. They were against us trying to redress our own grievances. Ever since the doctrin of the infallibility of the pope was propounded they hav been very tyrannical. They did not wish the people to do anything, but the priests to do all. If they had been in favor of peace I would hav been with them. They were in favor of fighting for the priests, but not for the people. They used double edged swords. They turned Catholic people against them because they usurped civil functions, and they turned Protestants against them because they opposed them. The priests seek power for themselvs, not for the good of the people. They are against the Protestants both politically and religiously. They are against me now, not because I rebelled, but because I did not succeed in helping them." How like the priests of all times! Riel calls the half-breeds "God's people." The creed adopted by Riel's council is given under seven heads: "1. We believe that all true believers constitute the true church. Believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are Christians, and all Christians make the church holy, catholic, and vital. We thus embrace all denominations in our faith. 2. We do not believe in the infallibility of the pope. That infallibility dogma of Rome has done much harm. The prophets and apostles were not infallible. 3. We believe in the inspiration of the holy scriptures, and the right of every man to read and learn the truths they contain. 4. We believe in a regularly ordained ministry. We would accept ministers of all denominations—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists—in our ministry without reordaining. We would be somewhat doubtful about Baptists. 5. We believe in a form of church government We prefer the Episcopal form. We would like to see a head bishop for the Dominion, or for the New World, who would be independent of Rome. We do not think that the affairs of the church can be rightly administered so far away. In fact, Rome has ceased to be the holy apostolic see. She is now a great organization of political diplomacy. 6. We pray to God, to Christ, to Mary, to the saints. Three persons of trinity are in these three first. God the Father is perfect and highest; God the Son is perfect and the savior; Mary is pure, but not perfect, and in her dwells the Holy Ghost. 7. We believe in the final salvation of all men. God's mercy will reach further than man's sin. He will not allow things to go so far that restoration is impossible. No injury can be done to a soul which he cannot repair. The agonies of hell may be endured for countless ages, but the mercy that reached earth is not beyond the reach of hell."

Letters from Friends.

ORANGE CITY, IA., April 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: An incident of some time ago has lately come to my personal notice. It has never, I think, been published by any of the Freethought journals, and may be of sufficient interest to justify publication now. Names, letters, etc., can be furnished if necessary.

A young Englishman came to this country in search of employment. He had been prominently connected in England with the Liberal movement, and had met and become slightly acquainted with Charles Bradlaugh. While visiting friends in Wisconsin he attended a meeting—a sort of union affair in which the Baptists, Congregationalists, and Methodists of the town were jointly interested. The Baptist minister was the orator of the evening, and, after the usual nonsensical and disgusting preliminaries, delivered a lecture in which he attacked mercilessly all people who were not "lovers of the Lord." In the course of his address, after making a wholly unwarranted attack on Charles Bradlaugh with regard to his virtues and morality, the speaker made these two statements: (1) that he was personally acquainted with Bradlaugh; (2) that he was a graduate of the University of London. The young Englishman waited patiently until the services were concluded, and then walked quietly up to the platform, where the three ministers were still standing. He said that he desired to make no disturbance, nor cause any unnecessary trouble, but that he had some grave charges to make then and there against the lecturer. The "representativs of God" were astounded, but made no reply. The young man then said: "I claim, and can prove that the Rev. Mr. B— is a deliberate liar; that he lies when he claims to be a personal acquaintance of Charles Bradlaugh, and that he also lies when he says that he is a graduate of the University of London." Mr. B— became angry at once, and refused to take any notice of the young man's demand for public retraction. The "interview" ended thus, but not so with the charges. These were published at once in the local paper by the young Liberal, together with the demand for retraction. Mr. B— again refused to retract in either case. The young man then wrote to Charles Bradlaugh, who replied, as he expected, that he had never seen nor heard of Mr. B—. This letter was at once published, and also one from the University of London, saying that the name of Mr. B— did not appear on the books of that institution either as graduate or undergraduate. The brazen-faced minister of the gospel then came out with a lengthy reply, in which he said in substance that, though not personally acquainted with Charles Bradlaugh, he had met and often seen and been in company with that gentleman; and that, though not exactly a graduate of the University of London, he was a graduate of the Baptist College in London, which was affiliated with the university, and that a graduate of the former was virtually a graduate of the latter. The matter here rested until the young Englishman could get a reply from the Baptist College. This answer, which cleared the affair effectually, was to the effect that Mr. B— had been at one time an undergratuate of that institution, that he had never graduated for "very good reasons" known to them and himself. Furthermore the letter said that if Mr. B— was leading a life of usefulness and uprightness in his profession, they had nothing to say, but that if such was not the case, they had some very important disclosures to make on their own part.

The result was that Mr. B— stepped down and out.

SUBSCRIBER.

SOLDIER'S HOME, WIS., May 18, 285.

MR EDITOR: I once belonged to the G. O. P., and I don't want to be a "deadhead." I hav "once embarked," and now I want to "see channels through which I can make myself useful." But alas! I am too old to "dig," and havn't the nerve to steal, and hence honesty becomes my only surviving policy, which is most uncomfortable policy when others don't "tote fair." I hav not the slightest doubt whatever about your sending all my papers regularly, as your card stated sometime ago, for Ben Parkin's paper comes; and mine sometimes fails, so I borrow Ben's and say nothing. But these few last straws hav nearly broken this camel's back. I am not sure, however, that my missing papers are not doing some secret missionary work in this place. I hav distributed many of them that were not missing, and when I get a little money I will send the balance broadcast where they will do the most good. If I had missed "Balaam" I should surely hav been compelled to deadhead for another. Yes, "Balaam" got through all right, though he looked somewhat out of humor, and the poor ass is in sorry plight. Our good friend, Miss Liberty, looks healthy yet, and I believe she means to put a flea in the ass's ear that will make him open his mouth and speak for his rights, and that to some purpose. Long liv the THE TRUTH SEEKER! Giv us more pictures.

Yours for truth, NELSON HUNT.

BURTON, MICH., May 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great and noble work in the extension of Freethought, Liberalizing the masses, curtailing the arrogant and domineering power of the churches, whose foundation stones are blood, myth, and superstition, without one scientific element on which to base their warring themes. Faith, and faith alone, is their battle cry—faith in churchal dogmas conceived and born in times of barbaric ignorance, and now sought to be fastened upon the souls of men as absolute revelations of God; a stupid acceptance and observance of which, as taught by the designing, treacherous, and truckling priesthood of to-day, are presented as the only means of elevation and salvation of the wretched, hungry, and struggling poor of every race and clime. The greatest, persistent, and, to a careful and close observer, dying struggles hav been made all over the West this past winter to induce people to accept their stale, bloody, and heathenish system of superstition. The leaders assert everywhere the fearful inroads of Infidelity and other isms, call for the most Herculean efforts to beat back the powers of darkness, and, of course, inaugurate the reign of light. If that light be darkness the people are not being saved, but surely deceived and deluded. By song, sympathy, and prayer many are psychologized and drawn into their snare. So may our splendid leaders, Ingersoll, Watts, Reynolds, Remsburg, Burnham, Chainey, Colville, Buchanan, Mrs. Richmond, Mrs. Kimball, Mrs. Britton, etc., continue their grand and noble work until the age of reason with its electric lights shall forever hide the tallow-dip of superstion.

D. HIGBIE.

SCRANTON, May 4, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 285. Each individual, Freethinker or Spiritualists, ought to do all they can toward the good that is near, to destroy the evil that oppress others, to uphold the constitutional liberty. This growth had its rapid advance, building up the grandest of all human structures—knowledge, that which distinguishes the higher from the lower type of man is what he knows. Let each one help to erect freedom's everlasting tower, as our revolutionary heroes built the capitol of Washington, D. C., the pride of the nation. The new truth marches double-quick time on our side; ere long the house of humanity will be built in the new world of America. Let us be peaceful, brothers and sisters, not like the religious sects to quarrel, to hate, to divide among themselvs. The spiritual and moral statues of the age are with us, and millions of men and women are working hard on our side to destroy the stronghold of priestcraft (so well given in your last paper), the originators of the most evil in the world. There is a physical evolution that links into one pulsating unity all along the chain of our life, from the single cell up to our great writers and orators, male and female. Yours truly, FREDERICK HENKE.

LUDLOW, ILL., May 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: For inclosed stamps please send "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" by S. P. Putnam. I am confident it will be very interesting and instructiv, like all of his writings. It is pleasing to note your fairness in giving all sides a hearing, and I see no reason for complaint. In my humble opinion, H. H. Hutcheson, of Leavenworth, is on the right side, and consequently comes out in advance. (I hav just finished reading his answer to Geo. N. Hill's question.) The Congregational church in Ludlow has been sold and is now used for a town hall. They hav theatricals there occasionally, and the pious are greatly shocked at the expectation of a ball in what was called "the house of God." But time will bring changes.

Your friend, MELLIE NEWKIRK.

TAPPAN, O., May 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: If it takes 1885 years for 33 per cent of the inhabitants of this world to hear of the savior of man and Jesus Christ being the only son of God, what time will expire, and how many souls will be in perdition, by the time the circuit is complete? Will Christians please answer, or hand us over the cake?

S. SMITH.

FRESNO CITY, CAL., May 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me space to notice the letter of Samuel Kelso in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 11th. Let him put to the believers in endless punishment the following question: "Do you hope, if your wife or your children, or your mother or father, sister or brother, or relativs or friends, die in unbelief or in sin, that God will punish them and yourself to all eternity?" If the believers do not answer Yes, then ask them if they do not hope that it is a myth and a falsehood. I hav asked the above question the past forty years Only one person has answered, "I do hope they will."

The question contained in the letter of C. Close, May 2d, viz.: "What should we think of parents who bring children into the world with a knowledge that they will be lost?" is also one that I hav frequently asked Christian mothers and fathers. It should be often repeated. GEORGE PADDINGTON.

EARLVILLE, ILL., May 15, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I hav long been contemplating sending my mite to help along the good cause of Secularism, but old age and poor health hav prevented, so I will send you five dollars, and please divide it as directed below—one dollar to Campaign Fund, one dollar to Tent Fund, and one dollar to Bruno Fund, to put my name under the eternal rock of ages, against all priestcraft. There is so much good reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER! I only wish I were able to giv one hundred dollars to Mr. Reynolds's Tent Fund. His "Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament" are so good he must be kept at work anyhow.

SARAH C. HILTON.

SAN JOSE, CAL., May 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal order for $5; apply in any way in your judgment, wherever it will assist our Liberal cause the most. Yours fraternally, LEWIS ROTHERMEL.

[Thanks. It shall go toward spreading Liberalism in the shape of TRUTH SEEKERS and tracts. Now that Mr. Reynolds has got his tent in shape he can advantageously distribute Liberal literature, and we know of no better means of convincing people than by getting them to read. We hav, also, nearly every day calls for tracts and papers for distribution. We always do what we can, and during the past winter we hav given away tracts and papers that cost many dollars to print. A little help is gratefully appreciated, and enables us to do much more than we can otherwise.—ED. T. S.]

SHERIDAN, WYO., May 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL came all right. It is just good. Whether we feel serious or saucy, there is something in it that just suits our mood, and everything in it is just splendid. It is cheap at 25 cents.

We want to send it to all our Liberal friends, but as one copy won't go 'round, and we can't afford to buy more at present, we hav concluded to keep it ourselvs and show it to all who are capable of appreciating its worth who may visit us in our mountain home.

The faces all look as familiar as old friends—we hav studied them so much already; and their writings all possess a new interest since we know how the writers look.

They certainly do great credit to the Moss Engraving Co., and honor to every Freethinker in the land by their noble intellectual faces. We would like to send copies of the FREETHINKER'S ALMANAC to some of our Christian friends, but they would hav to be made of fire-proof material, or they wouldn't last long enough for them to read and appreciate them.

Your friend, JENNIE E. TIDBALL.

READING, KAN., May 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The books, pamphlets, and TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL were duly received, and I would say that the portraits of those noble ladies and gentlemen who are the leaders and emancipators of thought, truth, and reason are well worth the price.

The cartoon "The Modern Balaam" is finely executed, and in looking at the trio I am anxiously waiting to see his priestcraft's hair stick to the branch above his head. It is a grand hieroglyphic, which should be preserved, distributed, and posted up.

Inclosed find twenty cents in stamps for two copies of the cartoon.

W. O. DAVIES.

CAN THIS BE SO?

CORVALLIS, OR., May 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: It seems that the tendency among Liberals is to criticise Christians and Christianity pretty severely. Would it not be a good plan to look to ourselvs a little? Some of our best writers and speakers are given to hifalutin theories on the happy condition of society or mankind in general when Liberalism becomes the rule. Now, really, is there anything to justify such opinions? Will a narrow-minded, hypercritical Christian be any better by becoming a Liberal? Or, in fact, can such a person become truly Liberal? THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondence and conversation with Liberals show up a large number to be far from Liberal on anything but religion, and rather narrow on that. Hadn't we better try to be Liberal on all subjects, and also leave the fixing up millenniums or impossibly perfect human conditions to Christians? L. JOY.

CLEOPATRA, MO., May 12, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find two dollars to apply on my subscription for the best weekly paper published in this age, and the Day family has been reading this paper long enough to feel assured that they hav help that will enable them to keep pace with the progressiv tendencies as the age is writing them.

And I want to say to you, and all who write short communications, that it is very instructiv and encouraging to every member of the human family that has a mind to come aboard this great train of investigation steaming up to meet the necessities of our time. Let us hav courage, tempered with fairnes, earnestness that knows no failure, for women and men are shaking off the shackles of the old bygone, and walking forth to a life full of peace and cheer and good will, and superstitious legions are being assailed from needles' point to ninepounder by the marvel-doing host which are imparting knowledge to all the people as their only salvation from sin. The strong right arm of science is hurling from the long-defiled judgment-seat in the court of Progress that cruel old Jehovah-Jove of the old, barbaric Hebrews, and installing instead the highest order of human love, under the motherlike influence of which men as gods will walk this earth, and women as seraphs will act as wardens, and every flower that opens beneath the beams of human sympathy will be cherished and protected. Now, my co-workers, East, West, North and South, let us nerve our whole being for the execution of great purposes and humane achievements. My friends, I would encourage and speak out oftener than I do, but my nerves are so unsteady from hardship and exposure of twenty-five years ago that its a hard task for me to talk to you with pen and ink. I want to go down to Liberal, that Godless town, if I liv, some time during the present or coming summer, just to find out if all or any part of the charges made by the Globe-Democrat are true. Yours, J. W. DAY.

A GOLDEN WEDDING IN MICHIGAN.

MR. EDITOR: At the pleasant home of the venerable bride and groom in Texas, Kalamazoo county, Mich., on the 17th day of May, of the present year, there assembled a large number of relativs and friends to celebrate the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. McLin.

A more genial gathering is seldom seen. They came, not in a formal way, but as warm-hearted friends and neighbors, to pay their respects to a gray-haired couple who had lived among them for over half a century.

I shall not undertake to describe the wardrobe of those present, for the fact is I could not tell to save my life whether the ladies were dressed in silks, satins, or cotton, but I can say their looks indicated a good degree of intelligence, lit up with a heartfelt, kindly feeling, as each took Uncle Allen and Aunt Eliza (as they were lovingly called) by the hand, expressing their congratulations on their living to enjoy this memorial day.

As this fiftieth anniversary, like their wedding day, came on Sunday, and as Father and Mother McLin hav been constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, their friends did not hesitate to work a surprise on them, even on the fabled Lord's day.

The gray-haired groom, after recovering from his first daze, and learning fully the intent of the incoming multitude, although the register says seventy-nine years old, danced like a boy, as he was at the age of nineteen when he married his first wife, who passed to spirit-life ere a half-score years had passed.

Just ten years adown his life-line, without any thought or prearrangement, he was married to the one who has been his constant companion through dark clouds and bright-shining sun for these long fifty years.

Uncle Allen and Aunt Eliza were formerly Methodists, and good ones too; but, like the spirit of the age, they hav progressed. They hav outgrown their belief in a personal God, and the other fellow also, the warm abode of the wicked, besides the long train of Bible absurdities. They go hand-in-hand with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are great admirers of the lamented D. M. Bennett, whose shade adorns their parlor wall.

They are truly generous in their estimate of others' opinions, and do not blame Materialists for what they cannot indorse. They claim to know whereof they speak when they say, "We know continued life beyond the dissolution of the body is a fact." The brightest jewel that adorns the crown of their honored lives is that the cause of humanity has ever found in them devoted and unflinching champions. No cause so unpopular but that they would espouse it if they thought it right; no fellow-creature so despised or oppressed but that they would help and defend him if justice demanded it; no road so long but that they would travel to the end of it to aid a friend in need.

Thus you hav an outline of the father and mother of Dr. McLin, who crossed to the further shore of the mystic river some years ago, whose widow and daughter were among the company here convened to do honor to these pioneers of Free-thought.

After a sumptuous dinner, and a formal presentation of many golden keepsakes, with a few remarks by Mrs. A. A. Fuller, of Mattawan, and the writer, the company dispersed with kind words for each other. L. S. BURDICK.

ORANGE, CAL., May 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Among the voluminous writings of D. M. Bennett, the little tract bearing the above heading ranks second to none for deep thought, sound logic, and clearness of expression; yet, I presume, hundreds, if not thousands of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers hav never perused its contents. No writer since Paine has exceeded D. M. Bennett in plain, terse language and the ability to retain the attention and interest of the common people. The common people—the bone and sinew of the world—both these men sought to reach and to teach, and most effectually did they do it. The writings of both are entirely free from ambiguity and transcendentalism, and therein lies the secret of his success, for, as Emerson said, "nothing astonishes men so much as common sense and plain dealing. All great actions hav been simple."

My object in referring to this specified tract is to induce the dogmatic Materialists of the Sir Thomas Winter school to peruse and reflect on what it contains. Presumptuous must be the man who can and will assert, after thoroughly digesting its contents, that he knows the limit and finality of nature's powers. If he be not inflated with self-conceit, and has not renounced the use of reason, the thoughts which Mr. Bennett's ideas and logic will arouse may humiliate him enough so he will admit in candor that possibly there are some things he doesn't know. I much fear, though, that some of these dogmatic deniers of infinit power to nature hav discarded reason to a certain extent, and if so, to use the language of Paine, it will be like administering medicin to the dead. When one becomes dogmatic on a mootable question his hunkerism is plainly apparent, and with him the boundary line of progress has been set. This is exactly the case with the person who ridicules the subject of a future existence, be his name Winter or Summer. We hav all heard of the "dogmatist" who refused to look through the telescope, for fear he might be convinced against his will that his opinions were erroneous; but that is just the position taken by those who ridicule the idea of nature's power to continue man's existence in a form of matter so sublimated that it is invisible to the human eye, and who refuse to search for evidence to prove it. Thomas Paine, on whom Infidels, Materialists, etc., bestow more hero-worship than any other man of the past, spoke thus: "I content myself with believing, even to positiv conviction, that the power which gave me existence is able to continue it in any form and manner he pleases, either with or without this body." But those who so believe in these days, and from evidence Paine never had, are called poor, weak-minded imbecils, and occasionally d——d fools. To be popular with the dogmatic Materialist, one must believe, or profess to, that there is nothing in the universe except matter that is visible to the physical eye, though we all know that not a force exists but what is invisible. It is said that the human body is so watery that the corpse of a man weighing 150 pounds and carefully dried would come out a shriveled mass of about fifty pounds weight, yet the Winters inform us that this shriveled mass and the evaporated water are all there was to the mind which may hav left an undying reputation for power and wisdom in the history of the civilized world. This dust and power were "organized," you see; therein lay its wonderful power. "Organized" is a good word with the Materialist, and explains the secret and mystery of life. Coal-gas, which is capable of producing intense heat and a bright light, cannot be seen, felt or weighed, and, to be consistent, a Materialist should deny its existence, because he can't see it; and electricity also. But they don't do it, and, while admitting the existence of these invisible entities, I fail to see the reason for their persistent denial of spirit simply because they can't behold it. A corpse is just as much "organized matter" as it was before the spark of life had fled, but there is something missing, and I, with ten millions or more of Spiritualists in this country, claim that that something is the invisible counterpart of that "organized" form—a spirit; and though, like coal-gas and electricity, magnetic aura and the breath we inhale, it cannot be seen, that fact doesn't prohibit its existence. When solid rocks can be made to melt and disappear in invisible gas, it isn't best to be too hasty in declaring that sublimated matter called spirit cannot exist. "He who uses the word impossible is wanting in prudence," and he who professes to know the limit of nature's power is, to say the least, prodigiously self-conceited. C. SEVERANCE.

CENTER CREEK, May 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Sunday last as I was enjoying myself studying your "Modern Balaam," I observed a gathering of people at a schoolhouse near by, which called to mind the fact that there was to be "divine services" in the aforesaid building. As I had not been to such a place for several years I did not deem it altogether out of place to enter in. Shortly after seating myself our would-be instructor, or in the words of some others, "Sky-pilot," entered. There is no mistaking one of them, for, as usual, that solemn visage, long ulster, and a measured tread, pockets stuffed with gospel songs, a Jew book, and his father in heaven knows what else. After the usual preliminaries, he opened ott like unto a sea clam in fresh water. He took for his text "The Solid Rock," the reference to which is found in Deut. xxxi.

His first remark was: "Our enemies admit that their rock is not our rock." How pleasant it is to be aware of that fact! He dwelt long and loud upon the nature of a rock, placing a great deal of stress upon the solid part, and was positiv that a rock "never growed;" in, fact had proven by actual measurement that a rock "never growed." How much better it would hav been for him had he taken the same pains to measure the doctrin he preaches, in order to ascertain the truth or falsity of it. His remarks were the "tailings" of sermons I listened to years ago when a boy in California; such stories as the death of Col. E. Allen, Thomas Paine's dying drunk, etc., the latter story being somewhat modified—instead of calling on God to forgiv him, they now hav it that he was so drunk that it was impossible for him to do so. Finding that the former lie is too well worn, they hav hashed up a new one.

Our friend also stated, should a person tell him, one who had experienced religion, that they found it untrue, he would tell that person that they lied. Wonderful! What logic!

Be a little cautious, my pious frauds, how you utter such epithets, for the side of the good book you preach from does not sanction such remarks as "fools" and "liars." It occasionally appears that these pulpit-pounders read their Bible in the wrong quarter, in order to find the most appropriate passages for the edification of their hearers.

It might be well for this one to search the scriptures more diligently, and giv us something from the other side.

It may be possible that this young man takes the Bible for his moral guide; if so, no wonder that he perverts the truth, for his God that he worships has set him the example by doing so himself, and commanding others to do so, and even rewarding them for deception.

I've no doubt could this man of God secure a position whereby he could support himself without much exertion, and be allowed the privileges that men of his cloth generally take, he might be persuaded to abandon this soul-saving "racket." I am really sorry for such young men, but the time will come when, perhaps before it is too late to reform, they will see the dawn of light, and work for things visible. I will kindly make this offer to this young man, that if he wishes any instruction concerning the Bible, I will gladly do all I can for him. It may be appropriate here to mention a fact or two for this young man's enlightenment, in case he is too puffed up with knowledge, or that he may fear becoming contaminated with Infidelism and not giv me a call. My heavenly insurance agent will find, by referring to his good book, that God could find but one man on this mundane sphere who was worthy of saving the human race from a prolonged bath, and that this same man, as soon as he had grown a few grapes, became intoxicated, and performed an act that ought to make a nineteenth century preacher blush. A thousand times better had he died before the damnable act had been committed, the record of which has been handed down to the present generation as holy writ. "How long, O truth, how long" shall this trash endure? Lot's performances would also hav been very appropriate on this occasion. But enough for the present. MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which send four copies of the ANNUAL for 1885.

A banker died here in our place not long since, who was a Liberal in sentiment. He attended the Unitarian church last season regularly; about January he was confined to his bed by cancer and died about April 1st. He had given instructions where to be buried, and to hav the Unitarian minister to preach his funeral sermon. But his wife, who was a Christian (Campbellite) in faith, took advantage of his weaker moments and persuaded him, with the assistance of her minister a few days before his death, that there was no hope only by baptism, and got the consent of the doctor that he might be immersed in a large bathing tub, the preacher telling him that it was necessary to be put "all under." He then preached his funeral sermon contrary to the deceased's instructions.

Yours truly, EPHRAIM POUND.

MR. EDITOR: The following incident, which occurred in this county a few years ago, illustrates the frauds of Christianity as practiced on this coast.

Some years ago a man by the name of Lago, who lived in the city of Los Angeles, was taken sick, having an attack of colic. He sent for the priest, who, on arriving, stated to his aching dupe that he was in arrears to the church for several years, amounting to two thousand dollars, which amount he must pay forthwith, before he (the priest) could giv him absolution—check his baggage to the New Jerusalem, and guarantee safe arrival. Lago not having that much filthy lucre at hand, but being possessed of lands and "cattle on a thousand hills," gave his note for the amount, witnessed by two good men now living in this vicinity, who will vouch for the truth of what I write. A doctor was also called in, who administered an antidote to the wind-stranded Lago, which had the desired effect, and, in a few hours, he was on the street, able again for worldly duty. But lest he might cause som e trouble and delay in collection, and, as the "holy man of God" was in great need of the coin just at that time, he rushes to a money-broker and discounts the note, rakes in the cash and starts on his holy mission for another sucker, which he finds in the person of Lago's father, who had an illegitimate daughter of sweet sixteen, whom the lecherous brute wished to marry, and applied, as usual to the priest for the desired permit. The priest informed him that it would be necessary to consult his "venerable highness" the pope, and that it would cost fifteen hundred dollars to fix the matter so that all the parties could liv respectably while here, and buy them a pair of wings for a tour of the New Jerusalem, "the abode of all those who love the Lord and believe in his holy name."

These are only two of many instances of a similar character that occur in the church, and they, the priest and clergy, hav the presumption to declare to their congregations, and to the world, that they are good and holy, and that they are delegated by this unknowable God of theirs to dictate to the balance of mankind a line of thought. And, Mr. Editor, these barnacles are not all in the Catholic church; they are to be found in every religious organization on this globe; they are willing to set aside and subvert all human law, if they believe it is in conflict with the mandates from on high. Only a few days ago the holy ire of the Young Men's Christian Association of Pomona, assisted by their right and left bowers, the Methodists and Presbyterians, and the little "joker," the Baptists, was aroused to a white heat over the rumor that there existed, on Second street, two "soiled doves" who did not belong to any of the above-named spook-house band, and that they must, for their own (the Young Men's Christian Association's) safety, be ousted. They organized a mob and, in solemn tread in the shades of night, strong in faith, but weak in virtue, they made the assault. Frightening the frail creatures out the den and their wits, they turned in the water from the city water-works. Their anger and holy wrath was not appeased until the contents of the den were destroyed and the wealth confiscated. Arrests followed, but a farce ensued, and in a few days a portion of our town was in ashes. All now is quiet, and the only reason that this holy mob are out of the state prison is because no one would prosecute them. While I hav no apology to offer for the presence of that class of women, I do feel an utter contempt for the men and the methods of their assault. If they were inspired from "on high," their acts were low and hellish. They used one of the local papers of the town to work up a sentiment that would drum into their ranks an indorsement of their unlawful acts. The thing did not work as well as they anticipated, and their hypocrisy is apparent.

WIFE AND MOTHER'S LAST FAREWELL.

Lines dedicated to his father, M. P. Thurston, by Solon K. Thurston, on the death of his mother, which occurred April 15, 1885.

Through tear-dimned eyes I can see her, with that heroic fortitude and resignation so characteristic of her, calmly facing death, while disease slowly wastes her strength away; and I fancy I can hear her saying, with her last feeble breath:

Let me go, my work is finished,
All my labors now will cease;
And in nature's welcome bosom,
I shall slumber in sweet peace.

Let me go, dear children, from you,
Fold my arms across my breast;
Sighing winds are softly whispering,
She has earned eternal rest.

Let me go, kind husband, won't you;
Still that bosom, hush that sigh;
Children ask your counsel longer,
But you'll follow by and by.

Spring for you again shall blossom,
Summer flowers, their fragrance bring,
While above my form unconscious,
Birds their sweetest songs shall sing.

You will still go on achieving
As the night givs place to day;
Loving hearts and hands are with you,
Let them cheer your lonely way.

And when you've reached life's journeys end
And to all you've bid adieu,
Side by side, without a murmur,
Nature's course we'll then pursue.

If it be where rounds of pleasure
In undying echoes roll,
Or, unconscious through the ages,
Help to form the wondrous whole;

Or if it leads us to some haven,
Where enraptured we'll behold,
While the ceaseless sweep of cycles,
Nature's wonders shall unfold.

But now farewell, my life companion,
Children, friends, adieu, adieu;
In your hearts my memory cherish
As I hav cherished love for you.

Other Mays

How sweet, on the far away highland,
Woven under and over with blue,
The morning mist down from the skyland
Wakes the Mayflowers for me and for you.

Through dim ether spaces of amber
Slow-sailing are silver-white cranes,
False dreamers from rival September,
When 'tis May with her bells on the plains.

Oh! here are the lost days of childhood,
Floating in on a hitherbound stream,
Bringing back the gay blooms of the wildwood,
Replaced by youth's roseate dream.

And the mosses and pebbly treasures
We bore with the burdens of noon
Exchanged for the heart-beat that measures
The dawning horizon of June,

The peach-trees that blooms by the garden
Rain pink spells on fences and bars;
How sweet is the hawthorn's white burden,
How frail are the elder-sown stars.

Come into the porch where the shadow
Is dark on the door-stone below.
Hark! the blackbirds yet sing in the meadow,
Where the brooklet is bent like a bow.

Still green is the crest of "ho se-heaven,"
And dim are the portals beyond;
Our one mystery morning and even
The duplicate world of the pond.

Such a halo of gold-bearing lilies
Has the spring 'neath its maple and beech,
And the flow gliding down where the mill is
Sings a song that no mortal may reach.

Yet dearer the songs we remember
Falling over the roof with the rain,
And the little white beds in the chamber
Repeating a mother's refrain.

The brown house of honest old Martin,
A busy hive, set on the hill,
Where braw lassies wove the gay tartan,
The wealth of our own mother's wheel.

What bright shawls and plaids for our dresses,
Quaker hues for the boys and the men,
Bestow mem'ry's lingering caresses—
Such mother comes never again.

And sweetly she sang, till her singing
Fills all the sad years with her chime,
As the dream of a golden harp ringing
Through the fault-finding echoes of time.

That Maytime with incoming billows
Blooms sweet on the isles of to-day,
Where the soul of the soft-whisp'ring willows
Has lured my spirit away.

I shall wait through the years coming a'ter
For the dream of its beautiful sea,
That the double light gilding each rafter
Return with its meaning to me.

Birthday Verses.

Tenth of May, happy May!
That brought to us a little fay,
Nineteen years ago to-day.
Dearer was she then than gold:
And as round the years hav rolled,
We hav found a wealth untold,
Richer with each coming May,
That does our warmest love repay.
As the May brings birds and flowers
Loveller after April's showers,
So, throughout thy life's long way,
May each April bring thee May.

The Way They Made a Fire in the Olden Time.

Before me is a circular box of tin—very dark. dingy, and rusty. It is said to be one hundred and twenty years old, and I guess it is. Inside the box is a piece of flint and another of steel, with some bits of inflammable material called tinder. The box itself is known as a "tinder-box." You and I, dear reader, would never know that this box contained hidden fire if some one did not tell us.

An aged lady picks up the piece of flint and steel, and strikes them together with a sharp click, click, click. This action throws bright little sparks of fire into the box, and then by blowing quickly it very slowly ignites the tinder, when a bit of wood with some brimstone on one end is applied, and thus is made a dim but solid little blaze. It would take some minutes, at times, to catch the tinder, says our aged friend, and in the dark, of a cold winter's morning, the waiting for the fire or the groping for the tinder-box was anything but agreeable.

Wild rushes dipped in tallow were once considered the hight of ingenuity in lighting dwellings, and after them the tallow candle was the glory and pride of the age. But the tinder-box was in use for some time after candles were in vogue. And after a good deal of clicking of the flint and steel, the fire, often dying out to be struck into life again, was builded on the hearth. The kettle hung upon the crane, and, no doubt, breakfast then progressed as rapidly as does that meal in modern times. How different in our day, when a touch, and in an instant the electric light makes a room at night as brilliant as noonday! —when the scratch of a match and its application to a few kindlings start the kitchen fire in an instant of time!

In the old time, care was taken to heap the ashes over the coals at night in order to keep them alive till morning, so as not to hav recourse to the tinder-box, but in spite of all precaution the coals would frequently fade and die out long before morning.

When we survey the long line of disadvantages our ancestors labored under, we can but congratulate ourselvs on our good fortune in being born in the modern time, with its many improvements and inventions. S. H. W.

A Ride in the Country.

It was a lovely morning in the bloom-time of the year, one of the days when it is altogether too pleasant to stay indoors, and so we started out for an airing and a ride in the country.

The stillness of the Sunday, with all its calm restfulness, lay like a blessing on the houses and on the long granit cotton mills, where the big engins that set all the machinery in motion had been whirling and buzzing for the six working-days just passed. All was quiet as we rode along past the rows of tenement houses, pausing a moment beside the "rolling rock," so delicately poised on the edge of the granit quarry, to look down where the great rocks had been cut in pieces, smooth and square, like so many huge slices of cake, where the wide seams, and layer upon layer of stone, indicated the wonderful age of the solid earth. Below, deep down, grew mosses and grass, and a few early wild flowers on the margin of the little pools where two or three boys were lolling with rod and line, trying to catch some sort of fish that mayhap inhabited the shallow water there. The rocky fields, near by, and little hills seemed alive with goats grazing and frolicking soberly, while little girls and boys stretched out on the new grass drank in health and sunshine with the bearded billy-goats and the gentle nannies around them.

Three girls in a little clump of trees that might answer for a grove where groves are scarce, were making preparations for a picnic on a big flat rock, upon which they had spread a clean, white cloth, or it may hav been a late breakfast that they had in the baskets and tin pails near by. Anyway, it was a genuin good time that their faces anticipated, if one can judge by appearances. On the other side of the road was erected a canvas tent, and we inquired if it was a camp-meeting or a circus. "'Tis a show," said our informant. "What kind of a show—snakes, two-headed calves, and such?" I asked. "Oh no, ma'am; 'tis a 'riety show—singun', and dancin', an' cuttin' up. But t'night," he added, solemnly, "'tis a sacreed consart. Fifteen cents admussion!" he screamed, as we drove on toward the bridge that spans Watuppa Lake—the "Narrows," it is called.

The bright sun kissed the blue waters, and sent thousands of bright sparkles all over the wide bosom of the lake. On one side of the bridge the water was placid, and gentle as the quiet day, while on the other side they seemed to jump and swing as if they played at rough-and-tumble every hour. On the right some workmen were repairing the long railroad bridge where a smash-up occurred a day or two before. We could see the terminus of the road at "Eight-Rod Way," and the gingham mill, as well as print-cloth mills, dotting the margin of the lake and extending out to "Rattlesnake Hill," which was adorned with lovely forest-trees and, perhaps, infested with rattlesnakes, from which it may hav received its name. There are no vipers of that sort there now, however, and the stranger would never know that Sunday meetings, picnics, and clambakes were once held beneath the trees long since gone beneath the woodman's ax, and where now is heard the busy hum of the loom and spindle.

The "Scotch Hole," near by, would never be taken for a paradise, but industry and thrift hav made a sweet home amid its bogs and brakes. On the left of the bridge are wide stretches of woodland and meadow, the tall trees making shadows of themselvs in the water whose borders they adorned. From this lake comes all the water used by the inhabitants of Fall River. The lake covers five thousand acres, and is supplied by many ever-existing springs. It is eleven miles long, and its hydraulic power is very great. It is said that this power and the navigable waters of Fall River make this city without a parallel on the American continent. The term Watuppa is Indian for "boats," or "place of boats;" but the Indians did not dream to what grand uses would come this lovely sheet of water.

Across the bridge we went—there were four of us in the carriage, Bethiah, Martha, Charley the driver, and myself, besides Bonnie, the dog—and thence on past many lovely little farms and green meadows. Early vegetables were above ground, and pease and potatoes seemed to be laughing roguishly and tossing their young heads at us as we bowed good-morning to them. There were mothers in the orchard, surrounded by troops of lively little pink babies—cunning little black-and-white pigs, and, oh, such darling little bossies played in the fields, brown, speckled, and white! Now and then a young colt kicked up his heels and galloped across the pasture while his mother looked on with grateful pride in her offspring. Jersey cows, and other kinds of cows, nipped the grass contentedly, and seemed to be in love with themselvs and all the world beside, while all kinds of fowl chatted together in the barnyards, little chickens looked for bugs and flies, and proud chanticleers mounted the rostrum of the fence and nearly split their throats crowing good-morning to everybody, and telling to all that good children lived at their house.

And the apple orchards were just a sight to behold! They were full and running over, fairly alive with bloom and beauty. I never saw such wealth of blossoms. It seemed as if every old scrubby tree, as well as the young and handsome ones, had dressed itself in pink-and-white buds and blossoms. Cherry and pear trees were snowy-white with bloom and beauty, and the peach blooms wore soft, pink dresses. Such masses of color and wealth of perfume as filled the air and made us almost intoxicated with delight and wonder! Great clumps of purple lilacs grew along the road-side and in the gardens, and tulips, many colored, looked brightly up from flower beds and smiled a blessing on all beholders.

We stopped briefly at the house of an eccentric old gentleman whom we used to be acquainted with, but the house was closed and he had gone.

Upon inquiry we found that he had become quite feeble and had gone to liv with his son. His furniture had been sold, and his house was to be sold also. He had been living alone several years, and had once adopted the name of "Quadrilateral"—which means having four sides—as a nom de plume, which title still remained in large letters on his woodshed. We walked around his garden, and picked some specimens of house-leek from the rocks where he had planted them, as souvenirs of the old man. We found a white rose bush, too, that he had promised us in other days, and brought it away to place in our own garden in the city.

From there, after chatting with a neighbor of the old man's, we went on all the way through a road with lovely blossoming trees and flowers on either side, until we came to the pine woods, where the trees are tall and straight, and massed with great green plumes of pine. Dark and cool was the road, and we stopped to refresh ourselvs with a lunch that we had had the foresight to bring with us. We gave Bonnie a cookey, and the silly little dog tried to bury it under some leaves near a log, but as he might never come that way again to dig it up, we took it, knowing he would be hungry ere long.

The woods were fragrant with spicy odors, and healthful, beautiful influences made the hour and scene a most enchanting one. Further on, we stopped again to gather blue violets that grew in thick clusters on both sides of the road and then on, through long stretches of wood, until we came to the upper bridge that spans the Lake Watuppa again. Over the bridge we went, passing more farms, at one of which we stopped to borrow a bucket and to giv Blackey, the horse, a draught of cool well water. We turned into the New Boston road, and downward toward the city, always seeing the buds and the blossoms of this glorious springtime.

"This will be a great year for apples," Martha said, as were passing the last farms.

Groups of merry children were scattered here and there along the roadside, and clung to the back of our carriage as we dashed on and reached our home about four o'clock in the afternoon, refreshed and strengthened by our ride amid so much sweet, fresh beauty and rare loveliness, and wishing that we had all the children who will read this account, to enjoy the day and the ride. Our Puzzle Box.

1.—PUZZLE.

I sing The Mother of The Nine,
In this poor ragged rhyme of mine.
A thousand pleasant memories twine
Around her mother-head divine.
But not alone her head shall shine
In living luster through my line;
Her body's beauty here I shrine.
A mermaid moving moving mid the brine—
Even Venus—were, to her, a swine.
From where its equal parts combine,
Like wedded jewels from the mine,
To left or right, behold a "sign,"
And that, alone by sense define;
But this, by type in "Auld Lang Syne."
Rash youth will crave hope's frothy wine.
Sage Age to Memory's cup incline,
A riper vintage of the vine.
A nectarous draught to calm, refine,
And fit us for our life's decline.

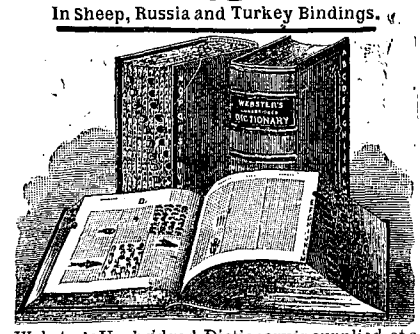
Correspondence.

CLEARWATER, NEB., May 18, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I come with a poem for May, which reminds me of what Horace Greeley once said of Margaret Fuller, that she was "always a day after the fair." My lines for June describe our western country, where there are so many thousands of timber claims being planted to trees that are now beginning to make a beautiful showing. The principal kinds of trees planted are cotton-wood, ash, box-elder, walnut, and willow.



For the benefit of those who care to know more about it, as did a Chicago woman once, who wrote to us for information and asked if "all the land out here was not timber claims," and for those who, like one Eastern man on his arrival in Nebraska, mystified on hearing people speaking of "sections," "half sections," and "quarter sections," will say that a section is 640 acres, making a mile square, and that only 160 acres in each section can be taken under the Timber Culture Act, the remaining 480 acres being reserved for homesteads or pre-emptions, homesteads predominating. Let me further add that 36 sections make a township, and that the numbers 36 and 16 (they are all numbered) are invariably set apart for the benefit of schools.

When the first settlements are begun in a new country in the West, a traveler on inquiring for a friend's residence will be told that he livs on "10" or "18," as the case may be, and meaning the section so designated, but sounds odd to a stranger. That is soon done away with, however, when villages appear.

Very respectfully, MARY B. FINCH.

Death of Victor Hugo.

Victor Hugo, the greatest man of the present France, died at one o'clock on the afternoon of May 22d. The following sketch of his life is from the Herald:

Comte Victor Marie Hugo was born at Besancon on February 26, 1802. Victor was the youngest of three sons, and their father being engaged in the various campaigns of Italy and Spain up to the time of Napoleon's defeat and exile, Mme. Hugo and her children followed him into both countries, and amid the sights and scenes of war their earlier years were passed. After the fall of the emperor, General Hugo was deprived of his command, and coming to Paris he placed Victor and his brothers in a preparatory school in the Rue Sainte-Marguerite. Before reaching his fifteenth year Victor competed for an Academic prize. The subject was "The Advantages of Study," and his poem was unquestionably the best, but as he had signed it "A Poet of Fifteen" he was denied the prize, though the judges allowed him honorary mention. He lived at this time in the ancient abbey of the Feuillantines, where he studied privately under Lahoni, a proscribed general. At this age the one woman in the world for him was his mother. To her he addressed the best of his early poetry; from her he derived the passionate royalism which in his youth held the place of creed. She was an ardent disciple of Voltaire, and her influence asserted itself upon the boys from their earliest years. When placing them for a time in a Catholic school in Spain she objected to the rule compelling all scholars to attend mass daily. And later on, in Paris, when the rest of the school went on Sundays to mass, Victor, by special permission, remained at home and wrote verses.

His mother, Madam Hugo, died suddenly in 1821, and General Hugo, who had allowed his wife the entire charge of his sons, now stepped in and offered them a regular allowance if they would quit the path of literature and adopt some regular profession. Victor gave an unconditional refusal, and cut himself adrift from the paternal guidance. For a time he earned but a scanty subsistence by his pen, and those who desire to know his style of housekeeping hav only to refer to the budget of Marius depicted by himself in "Les Miserables." In 1822 he published the first volume of "Odes and Ballads." He awoke to find himself famous. Louis XVIII. bestowed on him a pension of 1,000f., and on the strength of this income he married Adele Foucher, the daughter of his father's oldest friend, a charming girl of sixteen summers, who had been brought up with him at the convent of Feuillantines. He was thoroughly happy. He adored his wife, and in a little house, No. 42 Notre Dame des Champs, concealed by trees, he received his large and increasing circle of friends. His books had commenced to sell, and although he could not be said to be rich, his means were sufficiently ample for all his wants. In this delightful retreat two beautiful children were born, and here the wife and mother welcomed in a graceful manner the friends of her husband. They were such men as Dumas, Alfred de Vigny, Mery, and Sainte-Beuve, and they formed a powerful art coterie, of which Hugo was chief.

In 1826 the "Odes and Ballads" were published in two volumes, bringing increased fame and fortune, and it was about this time that his political opinions underwent a change. He had not ceased to be a royalist, but his loyalty was a matter of sentiment rather than conviction. "Cromwell," a drama, with its striking preface, was composed, and it was the signal for a terrible battle. The newspapers proclaimed that he was a barbarian, and that he persistently violated the rules of good taste. The "Dernier Jour d'un Condamne" was issued in 1829. It was a work of terrific grandeur, and was the first manifestation of those sympathies which side with the malefactor rather than with society outraged by his crime. Its success was triumphant.

In one of his prefaces he has declared that his three romances, "Notre Dame," "Les Miserables," and "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," are the expression of his revolt against the threefold tyranny of religion, society, and nature. "Notre Dame" is probably the most artistically complete of his works. It contains noble thoughts portrayed in words of burning eloquence, touches of intense pathos, and vivid and brilliant word-painting. It abounds with passion and power.

The little family established themselvs in 1830 in the very heart of Paris, in the house No. 6 Place Royale. Hither flocked all his old friends and a host of new allies, eager to join the new school of literary men, of which Hugo was the acknowledged chief. Alfred de Musset, Alphonse Karr, Theophile Gautier, Arsene Houssaye, Jules Sandeau, and twenty others formed a brave phalanx under the banner of "romanticism" eager to do battle against the hated ogre of "classicalism," the conventional rules of which could not restrain the younger writers of an age that was to literature what the Revolution was to politics. Against this school "Hernani" was written. On its first representation in 1830 it was an assured success. The whole audience enthusiastically rose to it, and a publisher gave the poet 6,000f. for it, an amount, by the bye, which was very opportune, as the author, on that memorable occasion, had only 50f. in the world.

"Marion Delorme" was played two years after. After its eighteenth representaton, in accordance with the public wish, the last magnificent scene was added, in which Marion is pardoned. Its reception was as flattering as that of "Hernani."

From this date his success was assured. "Ruy Blas," "Le Roi s'Amuse," and "Lucrece Borgia" for the stage: "Les Orientales," "Les Feuilles d'Antoinne," and "Les Chants du Crepuscle" in verse, and a vast quantity of miscellaneous writings issued from his facil pen, and delighted the world. But all was not destined to be delight. In 1843 he experienced the harrowing sorrow of losing Leopoldine, his only daughter, the wife of M. Charles Vacquerie, of Havre, a young man of great talent. She was drowned in the Seine near Villequier, and her husband perished in the endeavor to save her. It was a singularly gay boating party that had this tragic end.

Hugo's literary reputation was so brilliant that, despite the strenuous and determined opposition of the members who worshiped at the shrine of the old classic school, he attained the highest distinction in literature, and was elected to the French Academy in 1841. In 1845 he was created a peer of France by King Louis Philippe, and the revolution of 1848 found him also an officer of the Legion of Honor, and a rantier. He was elected to the Constituent Assembly as member for the city of Paris by the partial election of the 4th of June. His votes at this time were far more conservativ than democratic. He twice declined to sanction proceedings against Louis Blanc and M. Caussidere. He demanded that the penalty of death should be abolished. He refused to declare that General Cavaignac had deserved well of his country. He rejected the draft of a new constitution, and, acting with the conservativs, he supported the decree of July 28th against the clubs, and opposed the principles on which were based the droit du travail, progressiv taxation, and the abolition of military substitutes. He pronounced against M. Grevy's amendments, by which the president might be revoked, and which required that the constitution should be ratified by the people.

His attitude in the Legislativ Assembly was very different. He was elected tenth among twenty-eight candidates for the Department of the Seine, and it was supposed that Emile de Girardin converted him to the platform of the social and democratic republicans. The ardent young royalist of 1822 was transformed into the vehement republican of 1851, and in burning words of fire he opposed the policy of the prince president, and denounced the coming empire with impassioned eloquence. He endeavored to turn the forces of legitimacy and of imperialism against each other, and to save France from the ascendancy of either.

His penetrating mind perceived at last that republican principles were the only ones possible for his age and country, and that the sole question was as to the best method of applying them. His conversion occupied about five years. It was in 1853, when there was no such thing as liberty in his country, that he seized the opportunity to proclaim himself a "democrat." He told a friend about this time that there was no phase of his career of which he felt prouder than this. "I had to giv up," he said, "many cherished prejudices, and many fair illusions, and to part with some dear friends. I had, too, to confess myself mistaken Now I am proud to look back on it all. I dared, I spoke, I conquered." In 1848 he started a daily paper called L'Evenement. It was prosecuted, condemned, suppressed, resuscitated (under the title of L'Avenement) in the customary manner. Among the many attacks made upon this journal was one against his son, who, in a vehement leading article, had insisted upon the abolition of capital punishment. Victor Hugo defended his son in person, and his speech on that occasion enlisted all the better feeling of his countrymen. His personal quarrels with Montalembert, lasting three years, his bitter and sometimes terrible vituperation against and denunciation of the prince president, gave rise to some violent scenes, and evoked a great deal of recrimination from the majority.

On the coup d'etat of December 2, 1851, Hugo was one of the Deputies who attempted to assert the rights of the Assembly and to preserve the constitution. This conduct led to his proscription. He fled to the Island of Jersey, and resumed his literary pursuits. His opposition to Louis Napoleon continued as bitter as ever, and in 1852 he published "Napoleon le Petit" and "Les Chatiments," a scathing and bitter satire, in the following year. But in vain were all his attempts to rouse the people of Paris and the country at large into some practical form of resistance against a usurper whom he compared to Nero and Tom Thumb.

Very intense was his scorn and loathing of the third Napoleon. He looked upon him as a blood-stained adventurer. In this hatred he had the sympathy of nearly every man of letters in France. Napoleon, who aspired to be a third-rate Augustus—a patron of literary men and artists—felt this scorn deeply. It wounded the egregious self-love which was perhaps his chief characteristic.

In Jersey the Hugos dwelt in a pretty English house, very simple, but comfortable. Behind it lay a beautiful garden, ending in a terrace bathed by the waves. From the windows the exile could see the shores of France. He had tried Belgium and England, but could not be content in either. The fogs and bad weather of London annoyed him excessivly. "The good God who has deprived us of country," he wrote, "will surely leave us the sun." In Jersey he resided until 1855, when he was driven out for having protested against the expulsion of some French refugees. He went to the more hospitable island of Guernsey, where, in Hauteville House, he lived until the fall of the empire. When Victor Hugo discussed with his son, Francois Hugo, the occupation of their exile, he declared he would spend his time in watching the sea. His son replied that he would translate Shakespere, a promis which he kept. His father did not spend the whole of his time in watching the sea, for in 1856 appeared, "Les Contemplations," a collection of lyrics ranging over twenty-five years of the writer's life, and containing some of the most melodious poetry ever written in the French language. He refused to accept the amnesty offered to political refugees in 1859. Associating himself with MM. Edgar Quinet, Louis Blanc, and Charras, he replied to the imperial pardon by an indignant manifesto. In August, 1869, he haughtily rejected the last amnesty it was in the power of Napoleon III. to offer him. His friend Felix Pyat pressed him earnestly to return, and offered to accompany him. He answered in the well-known line "S'il n'en reste qu'un, je serai celui-la." In his "History of a Crime," he has given his own version of the coup d'etat, and it is a version that has been variously reviewed.

On his return to Paris after the fall of the Empire, he issued an eloquent address to the German people, inciting them to proclaim a Teutonic republic and free themselvs from the thrall of the iron emperor, and to extend the right hand of friendship to France, their sister republic. He was received with enthusiasm by the revolutionary government of the 4th Sept., 1870. On the 10th of October he pronounced against the municipal elections. Three weeks afterwards his name appeared on the Committee of Public Safety, but the next day he protested it had been used without his authority. He refused to offer himself as a candidate at the general election of the mayor of Paris, which took place on the 5th of November.

On February 8, 1871, he was elected one of the representativs of the Department of the Seine to the National Assembly at Bordeaux. There he opposed with all his characteristic vigor the parliamentary treaty of peace between France and Germany. The party of the "right" were infuriated at this, and so violent was the opposition that Hugo left the tribune and resigned his seat, sending at the same time the following characteristic note to President Grevy: "Three weeks ago the Assembly refused to hear Garibaldi; to-day it refuses to hear me. I resign my seat." Within a brief space he lost his favorit son, Charles Victor, who died suddenly on March 16th. He took his corpse to Paris on the same day that the Communist insurrection commenced.

In the Rappel he vainly appealed against the destruction of the Vendome column, and did his best to calm the madness of the rioters. Seeing that his efforts were vain, he repaired to Brussels, and on May 26th he wrote a letter of protest against the Belgian government, censuring them for their action as regards the insurgents of Paris. He also offered an asylum to the soldiers of the Commune in his own house. The government became alarmed at his violent writings, and the populace also were up in arms against him. Surrounding his house, they threatened his life. The police intervened, and the authorities ordered him to quit Brussels immediately. He retired to the little secluded town of Vianden, in Luxembourg, where he composed "L'Annee Terrible," a volume of poetry depicting the sorrows of his country, and afterward went to London. The leaders of the Commune having been condemned to death, he again went to Paris, and interceded with M. Thiers on behalf of Rosel, Rochefort, Ferri, and the other Communists, but in vain. The radical newspapers advocated his election as member for the city of Paris at the election of 1872. He refused to accept the "Mandat Imperatif" which his constituents desired to impose upon him, but offered to accept a "Mandat Contractuel," which he eloquently defined. Only 95,000 votes were recorded for him, and he was defeated.

In 1877 the Emperor Dom Pedro, who was in Paris, sent Victor Hugo word that he was desirous of making his acquaintance, and the poet replied by expressing his regret that he himself had given up paying visits, but at the same time intimated that he should be at home on Friday, May 22d, and happy to receive his Majesty. "Monsieur Victor Hugo," said the emperor to the bard on arriving, "you must excuse me—I am so timid!" When Hugo motioned him to a seat by his side on the sofa the emperor bowed and remarked, "A sofa shared with Victor Hugo is like a throne!"

But little more remains to be told, and that may be told briefly. The evening of his life, although not passed in repose, was free from the storm and strife of his earlier days. Since 1878 he lived in a little house in the Avenue d'Eylau, close to the corner of the Rue des Belles-Feuilles. There, among his pictures and his books, he entertained his friends in the most delightful manner. As an ordinary rule he published a new work on the anniversary of each birthday, which of late years has been observed as a triumphal fete. In 1881 3,000,000 people marched in procession to the old poet's house. A deputation of little children also did him honor. "Hernani" was played to an enthusiastic house at the Theatre Francais, and "Lucrece Borgia" filled the Gaite. "L'Ane," a poem, "La Pitie Supreme," and "Religion and Religions" were among his last works.

His eighty-third birthday was celebrated in a manner characteristic of Paris. It was almost a national holiday. The Avenue Victor Hugo was thronged with visitors. Arsene Houssaye, in the Figaro, compared him to the Oak, the King of Trees. Jules Claretie, in the Temps, recalled the circumstance that he was only a puny babe at birth, his mother having likened him rather to a table knife than a human being. He related how the puny babe had become a giant, and paid a high tribute to the genius and character of the poet. Hugo received his guests as usual, and seemed strong and full of life as he shook hands with and smiled pleasantly on the distinguished visitors assembled to do him honor. The festival furnished M. Albert Wolff with the opportunity of sketching the old master at home, which he did most graphically as follows:

"It was on returning from his last trip to Guernsey, at the end of 1878, that Victor Hugo, to whom his medical adviser, Dr. Emile Allix, had recommended plenty of fresh air, went to liv in the Avenue d'Eylau. The hotel in which he installed himself stands close to the corner of the Rue des Belles-Feuilles. It is small. The salon is on the ground floor, hung from top to bottom with stuffs of harmonious tone. On Thursday evening that house whose intimacy was so charming, that artist's nest, was open to the good friends and to some of those on whom the master let fall a little of his kindness, as a title of glory and of pride. Before the great fireplace, hidden under the hangings like all the rest of the apartment, stood the poet in a dress coat; a white foulard, tied carelessly, replaced the horrible white cravat which is de rigeur in our evening costume. Age had given an incomparable sweetness to the face of the grand old man; you felt that in the hand which he offered you with so much cordiality there was a little of his heart. It was not the commonplace welcome of the master of the house overwhelmed with visits, but rather a few charming words which put you at your ease and lessened distances; the respect with which you felt yourself penetrated on entering was immediately mitigated by a more intimate sentiment which the poet encouraged by a benevolent look. Hugo had reached that noble apotheosis of privileged old age when it spreads around it, as it were, a radiation of kindness to which there responds a sympathy so great and so respectful that it has the emotion of tenderness. The gallant poet kissed the finger-tips of the ladies as do the heroes of his pieces clad in silk and velvet; the young daughters of his most intimate friends contributed to this salon the grace of their eighteen years, and it was a sweet sight to see that youth blooming forth under the eye of the master, which soared over a life so long and so great that its beginnings already belonged to history, while the present had already passed down to posterity. The dining-room, separated from the salon by a small ante-chamber, was also very homely. In the middle was the square table on which the twelve candles of a brass luster shed a soft light; on the walls some old pictures; a profusion of shifting colors all around. The master placed himself at the head of the table after having kissed the hand of the lady to whom he had offered his arm; he would do the same at the end of the meal after having led her back to the salon. The dinner passed in unpretentious chat; the guests brought to the poet the echoes of the great town, the gossip of the Boulevard, the event of the dry, the scandal of the morrow. Victor Hugo, like all men of superior intelligence, had the gift of knowing how to listen, and it was that which gave so great a charm to his hospitable house. If the newcomer was not a fool he felt at once that it would be absurd to seek effects and round off his phrases in this milieu bon enfant. After dinner the poet installed himself in the big armchair to the right of the fireplace, and conversation began more freely between the master of the house and that guest whom he had signed to sit beside him."

When in Paris Victor Hugo's mode of living was very uniform. He got up early, and practically at daybreak, winter and summer. During the finer half of the year, in fact, he rose at four in the morning. Directly he had performed his toilet Victor Hugo took an early breakfast, invariably consisting of coffee and eggs. The former he was inveterately fond of and indulged in, not only after each meal, but at intervals during the day. Having refreshed himself by this slight repast, he set to work, having always been accustomed, even from a very early age, to get through his work in the morning, though once the hour for the midday meal has arrived, the poet broke off for the day. His study was on the first floor. It was large and fitted up without method or order—with tapestry on the walls, old furniture in every corner, chandeliers in one place, pictures in another, and portmanteaus all over the room, so to speak. These latter articles form the receptacles for the manuscripts of all Victor Hugo's works, these documents passing by will to the Bibliotheque Nationale after his death. The manuscript sent to the printer was generally recopied either by its author's old friend, Mme. Drou, or by M. Gabriel Richard Lesclide, his private secretary. M. Hugo always wrote on one kind of paper—large sized Holland—made expressly for him, of which he had an enormous stock on hand. As he worked standing before a high desk he was enabled to diversify his literary labors by a little muscular exercise, which formed a part of his daily course of hygiene. He paced about and up and down his study, stopping now and then to swallow a mouthful of coffee or vin sucre, but never by any chance sitting down. After breakfast on the days when he had not to attend the Senate, M. Hugo sets out for a stroll through Paris, taking the first omnibus or tram he came across, getting down whenever the fancy struck him, walking along with no definit goal in view, like a lounger who was in no hurry and took interest in everything, happy enough in being able to breathe the open air in freedom. On the "literary" evenings, when he was about to read some unpublished fragment, he never sat down to his table, covered with lamps and candles, without previously drawing a large pair of spectacles from his pocket. This always produced a series of exclamations all around him, on which the poet never failed to say: "But I am 900 years of age, children—an old man."

Superstition in All Ages. By JOHN MESLIER, a Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastorate of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his last will and testament to his parishioners, and to the world, the work entitled "Common Sense." Price, cloth, $1.50; paper, $1.

Marriage and Parentage and The Sanitary and Physical Laws. For The Production of Children of Finer Health and Ability. By a Physician and Sanitarian. "The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children." Price, $1.

The Bible—Whence and What? By RICHARD B. WESTBROOK, D.D., LL.B. The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation. Whole libraries are here concentrated into one little book. Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price, $1.

The Bible of the Religion of Science. By H. S. BROWN, M.D. "This volume is most respectfully dedicated to those persons who will cordially unite with others to establish the religion of truth and a just government, by the scientific methods of reason, experience, experiments, and observations. For this is the way to wisdom, and to the material, mental, moral, social, and spiritual sciences, that make peace on earth and good will among men." Price, $1.50.

OTTO WETTSTEIN'S

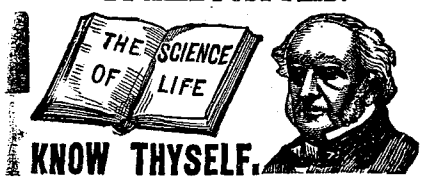
SIGNIFICANT. NEW AND BEAUTIFUL AND EXPRESSIV.

FREETHOUGHT BADGE.

(Design patented Feb. 24, 1885,)

Dedicated to Progressiv Minds of every School of Thought and Religion.

When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies,



DESCRIPTION:

The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3 00, $3 50, $4 00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Sent postpaid per registered mail, and cash refunded if not satisfactory and returned fifth day after receipt. OTTO WETTSTEIN,

Something for Invalids to read and stud over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

THEN gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Tho' they may gang a kennin wrang,
To step aside is human.
One point must still be greatly dark—
The moving, why they do it;
And just as lamely can ye mark
How far, perhaps, they rue it. —Burns.

TO found any hopes of an emancipation from superstition upon a belief in the elevation of the average intellectual standard is, indeed, to build upon a flimsy foundation. I am quite unable to see that the cultivation of the masses has reached a point at which—I will not say Catholicism, but—paganism is made impossible by the intelligence of mankind. If even witchcraft has became obsolete, it is not because its absurdity has been demonstrated, but because men's imagination has been directed elsewhere. Indeed, the phenomena of a survival of superstition in the upper classes is too common to excite astonishment. A mind that can be edified by the tricks of a "medium" is saved not by intrinsic ability, but by the accident of time and place, from sharing the grossest superstitions of Zulus or Eskemos.—Leslie Stephen.

ALL fair contenders for the opinions they hav I like mightily, but there are so few that hav opinions, or at least seem, by their way of defending them, to be really persuaded of the opinions they profess, that I am apt to think there is in the world a great deal more superstition, or at least want of concern for truth, than is imagined.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

THERE are habits not only of drinking, swearing, and lying, and of some other things, which are commonly acknowledged to be habits, and called so, but of every modification of acting, speech, and thought. Man is a bundle of habits. . . There is not a quality a function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature?—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

CHATHAM rejoiced when our fathers rebelled. For every single reason that they alleged, Russians can now count a hundred, each one of them ten times bitterer than any that Hancock or Adams could giv. Dr. Johnson's standing toast was "Success to the first insurrection of slaves in the West Indies," a sentiment re-echoed by Robert Southey. "Eschew cant," said the old, sturdy moralist. But all of the cants that were ever canted in this canting world, though the cant of piety may be the worst, the cant of Americans bewailing Russian Nihilism is the most offensiv and disgusting.—Wendell Phillips.

To be happy in old age it is necessary that we accustom ourselvs to objects that can accompany the mind all the way through life, and that we take the rest as good in their day. The mere man of pleasure is miserable in old age, and the mere drudge in business is but little better; whereas natural philosophy, mathematical and mechanical science, are a continual source of tranquil pleasure, and, in spite of the gloomy dogmas of priests and of superstition, the study of these things is the study of the true theology; it teaches man to know and admire the creator, for the principles of science are in creation, and are unchangeable and of divine origin. —Paine's Age of Reason.

RIGHTLY it is said
That man descends into the vale of years,
Yet hav I thought that we might also speak,
And not presumptuously, I trust, of age,
As of a final eminence. though bare
In aspect and forbidding, yet a point
On which 'tis not impossible to sit
In awful sovereignty.
—Wordsworth's Excursion.

TOLERATION has become a popular name, and I sincerely hope that it is being slowly drilled into people's minds. Yet it would be hard to prove that it really rests upon any stronger basis than that of general indifference. We don't burn people for not believing what we don't believe ourselvs, and so far we are right; but is it quite plain that, if the world were again agreed in believing anything, it would refrain from enforcing it by the old physical arguments? When struggles between rival classes are developed, involving deeper issues than those of tariffs; when Lazarus and Dives come, if they ever come, to a downright tussle, I cannot feel certain that philosophers will be allowed to arbitrate. . . But I fear that their best arguments may be as ineffectual as the trumpet-blast of modern times to the destruction of a city wall.—Leslie Stephen.

TIME was when nature's every mystic mood
Poured round my heart a flood of eager joy;
When pageantry of sunsets moved the boy
More than high ventures of the great and good;
When trellissed shadows in the vernal wood.
And little peeping flowers, so sweet and coy,
Were simple happiness without alloy,
And whispered to me things I understood.
But now the strange, sad weight of human woe,
And all the bitterness of human wrong,
Press on my saddened spirit as I go,
And stir the pulsings of a graver song;
Dread mysteries of life and death I scan,
And all my soul is only full of man.

WE are so framed, so constituted, that any employment of mind, any exercise of body, will weary and unfit us to continue longer in that employment. The springs by which all our operations are performed are finite, and hav their utmost extent, and when they approach that, like watches that hav gone till their force is spent, we stand still, or move to little purpose if not wound up again. And thus, after labor of mind or body, we hav need of recreation to set us going again with fresh vigor and activity.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

THERE is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures.

KARL: "Mamma, mayn't I go into the street a bit? The boys say there's a comet to be seen." Mamma: "Well, yes, but don't go too near."

A BROOKLYN lawyer givs as a reason for not going to Europe this summer that a rich client of his has just died, and he is afraid the heirs will get the property.

MAMMA (pointing to some unclothed cherubs): "Lizzie, if you are a good girl you will go to heaven and be like those little angels." Lizzie (who has a strict sense of propriety): "Well, I hope I'll be better dressed than they are."

WOMAN enters grocery store. "What can I do for you, madam?" asks the grocer. "I hardly know what I want. Let me see. We are all going to giv our minister a pound of something. I declare—well, just giv me a pound of anything; it makes no difference."

"FATHER," inquired a young lad, "who wrote the new edition of the Bible?" "It is the work of a number of eminent scholars," replied the father, very much pleased that his son should show an interest in such matters, "but the old edition, such as we hav on the parlor table, was written by King James of England."

BOSTON girl (to Uncle James, a farmer): "Do you like living on a farm, Uncle James?" Uncle James: "Yes, I like it very much." Boston girl: "I suppose it's nice enough in the glad summer time, but to go out in the cold and snow to gather winter apples and harvest winter wheat I imagin might be anything but pleasant."

BELKINS to his friend Cobbleton: "Say, I hear that you hav married your washerwoman." Cobbleton: "Yes." B.: "What on earth prompted you to so lower yourself?" C.: "Well, it was this way: I owed her for washing. Said that if I didn't pay her she would sue me. Married her to prevent litigation. Now she'll never get a cent."

"How do you like the character of Saint Paul?" asked a parson of his landlady, during a conversation about the old saints and apostles. "Ah, he was a good, clever, old soul, I know—for he once said, you know, that we must eat what is set before us and ask no questions, for conscience' sake. I always thought I should like him for a boarder."

A GOOD deacon of a city church meandered along one of the docks last Sunday, and noticing a crowd of boys fishing he commenced to reprove them for breaking the Sabbath. In the midst of his harang he stopped suddenly to ejaculate, "Look out, Bub, you've got a bite!" to a small boy whose attention had been distracted from his line. Human nature was too strong for him.

"YOU ought to hav your baby baptized, 'Rastus," said a member of the church to a colored father. "Yes, sah; but I can't afford de cost." "It doesn't cost anything." "I know it doesn't cost nuthin' fo' de mere act of baptism, sah; but yo' see I owe de minister two dollars for perfo'min' de weddin' ceremony a yeah ago, an' he might object, sah, to baptizin' a baby dat hadn't been paid fo'."

DURING a revival effort of "the boy preacher" in Chicago last week an invitation was extended to all in the congregation who wanted special prayers offered up for them to arise. An old fellow stood up and the revivalist asked. "What shall we pray for, brother?" "Well, I'm out $20,000 on wheat." "Yes, but we can't pray for the price of wheat to go up." "I don't want you to. I'm into hogs, just now, and it's pork I want to see boomed." The revivalist passed on to "next."

A CLERK of one of Boston's courts tells a very good story of a somewhat flighty lawyer, who was once trying a case in which there was a great scarcity of witnesses, and the evidence was about all circumstantial. Finally the lawyer got excited and exclaimed, "Well, judge, the angel Gabriel came to me last night and said this man is innocent." The judge, who happened to be writing, did not even look up, but said, in the most matter-of-fact way, "Let him be subpœnaed."

A DISTINGUISHED divine, of unusually solemn and impressiv appearance, went out from his city to a country town not long ago to lecture. He arrived early in the afternoon, and all the town of course "spotted" him within five minutes as a very great and very saintly man. He went into a drug store, and, in tones that froze the young blood of the clerk behind the counter, said, "Young man—do—you—smoke?" "Y—yes, sir," said the trembling clerk; "I'm sorry, but I learned the habit young and havn't been able to quit it yet." "Then," said the great divine, without the movement of a muscle or the abatement of a shade of the awful solemnity of his voice, "can you tell me where I can get a good cigar?"

A YOUNG lady at a party at Boston the other night gave the following advice to a young man in reference to the use of big words: "In promulgating your esoteric cogitation, or articulating your superficial sentimentalities and philosophical, psychological observations, beware of platitudinous ponderosity. Let your conversational communications possess a rarefied conciseness, a compact comprehensivness, a coalescent consistency, and a concatenated cogency. Eschew all conglomeration of flatulent garrulity and jejune babblements. Let your extemporaneous descantings and unpremeditated expatiations hav intelligibility, psittaceous bacinity, ventriloquial verbosity, and vaniloquent rapidity. Shun double entendres, pestiferous profanity, obscurant or apparent. In other words, talk plainly, briefly, naturally, sensibly, truthfully, purely. Say what you mean, mean what you say, and don't use big words."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 12. No. 24. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, June 13, 1885. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} {$3.00 per year.}

Notes and Clippings.

THE Prince of Wales will in a few days unveil a statue of Darwin in the Natural History Museum, London.

BOSTON still refuses to allow Sunday preaching on the Common. This is right. The sacredness of the Christian Sabbath must be preserved!

THE Rev. Dr. Stanton, of Washington, having the malaria, started for London to attend a faith cure convention. He died on board ship and was buried at sea.

A TRAMP who put up in the Newburyport police station the other night was seveuty-four years old. In his day he had been worth twenty-five thousand dollars, and had been a minister of the gospel. Rum had fleeced him of everything.

THE directors of the Philadelphia Academy of Music, according to the New York Tribune, hav refused Colonel Ingersoll the use of their hall "for the dissemination of Atheism or Infidelity." The number of people for whom golden harps loom up in the near future is rapidly increasing.

THE Synod of the Reformed church of America, in session at Syracuse, N. Y., last week, passed a resolution condemning the "desecration" of the "Sabbath" by excursions, amusements, and secular newspapers, and urging the synod to frown upon it and lend its opposition thereto.

THE Rev. Dr. Sunderland, chaplain of the United States Senate, refused to preach because Fred Douglass, the colored statesman, has secured a pew in his church. But Douglass is a greater man than Sunderland, and can get even with the preacher by staying away from church altogether.

A STATUE of the "Pilgrim," by Ward, the sculptor, was unveiled in Central Park last Saturday, representing a typical New England Puritan as he looked when he reached Plymouth Rock in 1620. It is presumed that Mr. Ward imagins he has found something in the make-up of a Puritan that is worth perpetuating.

THERE is in this city a religious organization known as the "Society of the White Cross," the object of which is to promote personal purity among young Christians. The thought suggests itself that if the society would revise its constitution so as to include some of the older Christians, it would greatly enlarge the horizon of its utility.

FREDERIC HARRISON has written another letter, apologizing for having called Herbert Spencer a literary pirate in publishing their recent discussion without his consent. Mr. Spencer prefers not to let the matter rest, though, and has cabled the publishers to suppress the work. The publishers hav not as yet made their decision in the matter public.

THE sexton of St. George's Episcopal church, one of the fashionable worshiping places in New York, is in jail charged with criminal assault on two girls aged about twelve years. When parents suffer their little children to come unto St. George's hereafter, they should notify the Stuyvesant Park policemen to keep a close watch on the officials of that church.

THE clerical papers of Paris are claiming that Victor Hugo, while upon his death-bed, called for a priest, but that his cruel relativs would not admit one. There is no reason for believing this claim, and it would seem to be contradicted by the fact that Cardinal Guibert, Archbishop of Paris, has published a protest against the body of the great heretic being deposited in the Pantheon.

ACCORDING to the Toronto Week, the royal family of England are Spiritualists. People tell tales of the queen; they know that the Princess Louise has been at seances; they recall the story of the Duke of Albany's death-warning from his sister Alice. They put down the whole royal family, therefore, as Spiritualists. The claim is that the queen and several of her children are believers in communications between the next world and this.

ON the occasion of the dedication of the Stewart Memorial Cathedral at Garden City, Long Island, N. Y., Mrs. Stewart was allowed to lay the deed of the property upon the altar, which is said to be the first time a woman was ever admitted inside the chancel of an Episcopal church. Her presence there has always been regarded as an abomination, which it is —to the woman.

THE Bishop of Tonquin, China, writes a letter to the Missions Catholiques, in Toulon, France, reporting that Catholic priests and residents are being massacred in great numbers by the heathen Chinee. These reports are supposed to be preliminary to a general passing of the hat for the benefit of the sufferers, the proceeds, of course, to pass through, or at least into, the hands of the bishop.

TALMAGE recently preached a sermon on the use of tobacco, in which he asserted that Jefferson hated it, and that many men had died of cancer caused by its use. Somebody has been unkind enough to hunt up a letter of Jefferson's written in praise of the weed, and medical men declare that no case of cancer on record can be traced with certainty to the use of tobacco. All of which goes to show that Mr. Talmage, however good or bad his intentions may be, is in a measure unreliable.

WHEN General Grant was very low one day, and the family thought he was dying, Parson Newman took advantage of the sick man's helpless condition, and baptized him in the name of Father, Son, and others, and then went down on his knees and prayed with all his might. Meanwhile Dr. Shrady hustled about, procured some brandy, and gave General Grant a hypodermic injection. The general rallied and opened his eyes. "Ah!" said Parson Newman, "my prayer has saved him." Said Dr. Shrady, "Excuse me; I think it was the brandy." Thus General Grant is unable to decide whether it was the holy spirit or the ardent sort that preserved his life.

La Livre, a French periodical, in its May number say that Count Clesieux lately addressed an eloquent appeal to Victor Hugo to return to a belief in Christianity. He received the following reply at the hands of M. Richard Lesclide: "M. Victor Hugo, with whom intentions are the prime consideration, instructs me to thank you for your beautiful verses. The idea of death is one of those with which he has made himself most familiar. He will die as he has lived, a Deist, and he often repeats to us, with perfect serenity, Dei voluntas. But he is absolutely convinced that priest and dogma are bad in all possible religions, and that their influence has always been fatal to humanity."

IN Miss Rose Elizabeth Cleveland's forthcoming book occurs the passage quoted below. Though somewhat submerged by words, it will be observed that an idea is therein attempted to be expressed unfavorable to Catholic conventual institutions. She says: "The medieval monastery has passed away. It will not return. But monachism remains, and will remain while human nature bides its time. Over and over again will a wretched phantasy of conscience bid the conscience-stricken turn his back on homely present duty in the battle plain of world life, and make the same old experiment at self-salvation in unhallowed renunciations, spite of this mighty monument of its folly, the medieval monastery. Over aud over again will the same stupendous sacrifice of energy be made, is making in manifold ways about us every day, in vain!" To this the New York Tablet, a leading Catholic journal, replies: "The opinion Miss Cleveland expresses on conventual life is made up of gross ignorance, narrow observation, inherited bigotry, and intolerable insolence. The worst assailants—the most blasphemous, the most illiterate, the most vicious—of religion never wrote aught more expressiv of individual ignorance and bigotry than the characteristic paragraph quoted above." Thus it will be seen that if Miss Cleveland is not destined to be damned in the next world for attacking Catholic institutions, her damning in this is already an accomplished fact.

IT is reported that Prince Mirza Gholam Ahmed, an Indian potentate of fabulous wealth and a Mohammedan of great proselytizing zeal, proposes that Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the eminent English Freethinker, shall come to his domain iu the Punjaub and put himself uuder tuition with a view to his conversion. The prince agrees to furnish the neophyte with a suitable palace, and a retinue of servants, to provide for all his household expenditures, which shall be on a scale of magnificence consistent with the honor due to a prince's guest, and to furnish him an allowance of two hundred rupees per month during the entire process of conversion. Mr. Bradlaugh is said to be seriously considering the invitation, although he says that the task of getting converted would probably be a life-long job.

THE Reverend Henry Ward Beecher, gibes Puck, has come nobly to the front to try to giv us something like a decent, respectable, clean sensation; but we grieve to say that we fear his praiseworthy attempt will prove futil. The trouble with his sensation is that it is a very old sensation. Bless our poor old theology racked soul! how many an excellent minister of the gospel hav we seen march smilingly up to do this very same act. And the act remains undone, and the circle is yet unsquared, and the old orthodoxy and the new science are just as much at variance as they ever were. The successful performance of the feat may be reserved for Mr. Beecher; but we don't believe it. It will take something more than a plank from Plymouth church platform to bridge the chasm between Darwin and the first chapter of Genesis.

"FREETHINKERS claim the right to express thought whether the words are music to the most cultivated ear, or filth and slime and horror to even the reprobate or gutter snipe. The Freethinker bows before the well-filled purse of Mammon's chosen few, grovels at the feet of railroad kings, whines before the door of the gambler's den, and brazenly asserts his independence and freedom while senselessly ridiculing those who ascribe praise to the author of our being."—Our Christian Visitor. It would be hard to concentrate more vindictiv meanness and downright falsehood in the same space than is contained in these few lines. And the Christian Visitor is a journal "devoted to moral, religious, and philosophic thought." Possibly the editor considers such blackguardism religious, but it is certainly neither moral nor philosophic.—Sunday Gazetteer.

A GOOD many honest people are halting between respect for George Eliot, and the authority of religion and custom. Professor Everett, in the Andover Review for June says: "It is not necessary to speak at length of her relation to Mr. Lewes. The world seems to hav settled down to the view that in this she was acting conscientiously, and with the highest motivs, but that it was unfortunate that she suffered herself to be drawn into a position that was in itself considered a false one. Certainly, we must admit that nothing can be more technical and artificial than many of the minute regulations in regard to marriage and divorce which differ among different peoples occupying a like stage of advancement. A violation of such technicalities cannot be confounded with a disregard of those fundamental duties of life which are everywhere the same. A reference in one of her letters to 'Jane Eyre' shows that the principle upon which she acted was early formed and thus was not the result of personal considerations. While she was wrong in the eye of the law, she believed that she was right with reference to any true standard of living. It must be remembered, however, that such laws as hav been referred to, however imperfect they may be, are yet the barriers which society has raised against evils more to be dreaded than almost any other. Behind them securely stand the stability of home and the purity of human intercourse. The dyke which has been built to keep out the waters may seem to us to hav been stretched needlessly far into the sea. It is, however, all the protection that we hav, and a breach in it would be perilous."

News of the Week.

IT is rumored that the ameer of Afghanistan has been assassinated.

THE redemption clerk in the sub-treasury at New Orleans, La., is $60,000 short in his accounts. He has abscouded.

EX-GOVERNOR HALE, of New Hampshire, has failed for nearly $1,000,000, and attachments aggregating $277,000 hav been filed against his property.

THE Russian war vessel Strelok has weighed anchor, left New York Harbor, and put out to sea. Russia and England show no disposition to go to war.

THE pleasant weather last Sunday caused the Sabbath to be broken into a large and picturesque variety of fragments. Notably there were picnics, games, and concerts.

Dr. BYRON TEMPLE, of Amelia, O., committed suicide June 6th, by taking morphine. He is reported to hav been a noted Infidel. His notoriety had not reached this office. He very sensibly left word for his relativs to permit no hypocritical cant over his dead body.

THEBE were tornadoes last Monday night at Utica and Canajoharie, N. Y. At Woodstock, Va., a church was unroofed by the wind. Damage was also done done by storms at Owatona, Minn.; St. Thomas, and Port Hope, Ont., and at New Albin and Victory, Wis.

THE printers had an international convention in this city last week. They interspersed business with festivities of various kinds, and one day had a type-setting match in which a compositor named McCann set over 6,000 ems of solid type in three hours, beating all previous records.

WALTER C. WHIPPLE, a young medical student, son of Adjutant-General Whipple, U. S. A., committed suicide by shooting himself last Monday morning. He had recently been converted. He showed symptoms of religious mania; his pockets were found stuffed full of tracts, and he died making pious remarks.

HENRY VARLEY, an English revivalist, now in America, alarmed New Yorkers last Sunday by saying in the course of his harang: "The United States and England are not Christian countries. We Christian people are a small minority. These countries are not Christian except in a formal sense. I think we are on the verge of judgment for our sins."

SANFORD SISCO, a colored murderer, was hanged at Hackensack, N. J., June 5th. He was accompanied to the scaffold by two clergymen, and had no doubt about the salvation of his soul. Robert Williams and Foster Chase, also colored, were hanged on the same day at New Orleans. Both confessed and were shrived by a priest, and are ready for the bridegroom.

A DRUNKEN fireman went strolling through the Chinese quarter of this city last Sunday in company with some sailors in the same condition. One of the sailors tried to pick a quarrel with a "heathen," and the fireman pulled out a pistol and shot three of them, one, Ong Ah Mon, fatally. He was locked up. The dead Chinaman was possessed of considerable wealth.

THE Central Labor Union of this city gave a concert last Sunday to aid the girl carpet weavers of Yonkers in their strike against a reduction of wages. J. W. Bogert, who used to work on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who is now prominent in labor circles, was master of ceremonies. Edward King, of the Liberal Club, was the orator. Madam Delescluze was expected to recite an original poem, but illness prevented. The Karl Sahm Club furnished music. All the performers gave their services free; the landlord did the same with the hall, and the concert was largely attended and successful. Great numbers of attractiv looking working girls were present. Next Sunday evening Miss Lillie Hall and other eminent artists, to help along the cause of industrial liberty, will appear before the Labor Lyceum at 361 Broome street, at 8 o'clock.

A Theory of the Universe Plainly Stated.

There are many religions. All cannot be true; all may be false. All agree that it is the interest of the human race to believe the truth; that truth leads to virtue, and virtue to happiness; that error leads to vice, and vice to misery. As a person cannot take the happiness of another to himself, nor transfer his misery to another, and as each person is more interested in his own happiness than any one else can be, it is to the interest of all that each should examin whether there is any true religion. In making the examination each person should depend upon his own judgment, and not depend upon the advice or judgment of anyone else. Preliminary to the examination, it is requisit to dismiss from the mind all preconceived opinions instilled into the mind in youth; all prejudice for or against, and all fear. The inquirer should feel that as he is doing his duty, the result, whatever it may be, cannot be sinful. Faith is the root of all religions—a belief, not in supernatural being, but that there exist such being; a first cause, a creator.

If there has been creation, it is reasonable to suppose there is a creator. But if there never was creation, it is equally reasonable that there is no creator. The whole religious question turns upon this point. If this question is answered affirmativly, then there is one religion that may be true. But if the answer is negativ, all religions must be false.

The religionists make assumption the basis of their reasoning. The fact of the existence of the universe to them is a proof that there was a time when it did not exist, but that a personal being had existed from eternity, that by his will-power brought all things into existence. If that assumption is true, then there was a time when he was alone in nothing, nothing but himself. Then it is legitimate to ask how he came to think of creating the universe. He could not be the cause of the thought, for he would then be cause and effect at the same time. Hence the thought came by chance. It is as conceivable that nature came by chance, as that a thought should come by chance. Besides, if the thought of creating came by chance, the thought of annihilation may come by chance. But if it is said that the thought, the design and plan were eternal, then there was thought but no thinking, design but no designing, plan but no planning. All were necessary. If necessary, then the creator had no volition. He could not do otherwise than he did. Creation was necessary to verify the design, for the design could not be the design of the universe if the universe was not created. Creation was a process. There was a beginning and an end to it. The beginning was not the end, nor the end the beginning.

The first part created was limited; if it was unlimited there would be no room for the other parts that were to be made. By adding limited to limited it will never be unlimited. Hence the universe has an outline and center and is in nothing; nothing outside of it to keep the parts from separating.

It was necessary for the creator to pursue one or the other of two courses. He had in organizing nature set two forces in the center, an attraction and repulsion, one to attract to the center, and the other to repel from the center. These two forces must be equal in power. If the repelling force is more powerful than the attractiv, then the parts would separate and keep separating until they became inconceivably fine. Or if the attractiv force is more powerful than the repelling force, the parts would be attracted toward the center until the universe becomes inconceivably dense. But if the forces are equal the universe would be motionless. Hence it is obvious that the creator had to exert his almighty power personally, to keep the universe in its proper size and form. The movements of all its parts from the largest planet to the smallest particle, are fast or slow, start or stop, by his direction. All phenomena are produced by his personal activity; all his action is necessary to verify the eternal design; nothing can take place by chance, not even a thought; for one single thought, to take place by chance, might by its influence in time derange the whole universe.

If it is true that the universe had a beginning, it necessarily follows that it will come to an end; for it is as unreasonable to suppose that it has a beginning and no end, as it would be to suppose an end but no beginning. The proposition that a thing that has a beginning will hav an end is as plain as that a part is less than the whole. It is so plain that it cannot be made more plain by any argument. It is self-evident.

This theory of creation is so contrary to facts that religionists are under the necessity of making many assumptions in their effort to bring their theory to correspond with facts. Among their numerous assumptions there is a very conspicuous one. This is that the Creator has created a being who is as powerful as himself, and has so organized him that he has a quality that the Creator himself does not possess—a power of volition. He was able to change himself from a being intrinsically good to a being intrinsically bad, and his whole after-life has been spent in influencing humanity into wickedness and misery. Much more might be said on this point.

Religionists in their efforts to make their theory of creation correspond with facts of nature hav made it so complicated that they are in a confused state of mind. They assert dogmatically that there is an eternal design, and that everything is to go on according to the design. At the same time they are constantly sending up petitions asking that the design may not be acted on. They argue that the universe is governed by infinit wisdom, and yet constantly complain that almost everything is going wrong. They insist that this theory is the perfection of wisdom, and yet they educate young men to explain it; instead of doing which they quarrel amongst themselvs, and cause the uneducated classes to hate and despise each other. This theory of creation, in connection with the theory of especial salvation, has caused incalculable misery to humanity. And, worse than all, it makes immortality impossible, destroying all rational hope in consequence of the annihilation of all things, as has been previously proved.

Up to the present men hav not attained absolute truth, but they may attain reasonable faith by a very simple method, the method in use in secular transactions—a balance of probability weighed in the scale of experience. The wage-worker does not know in the morning that he will be paid in the evening; but he has been paid before, consequently he has faith that he will be this time. The farmer in the spring takes his team, his plow, and seed to his field. He does not know that he will reap a crop in the fall; he knows there are many contingencies, hence he has some doubt whether to go on with his work. Finally he puts the contingency in one end of his scale, and his experience in the other end. If the experience end of the scale is heavier than the other end, his doubt will vanish, and faith takes its place. Under the stimulus of faith he works full of courage.

The case of the farmer and the day laborer is the case of all humanity. Probability is not a perfect guide; there is possibility of mistakes; but it is the best we hav, and is the only reasonable guide; consequently it is the best method to decide the question of creation or non-creation of the universe.

No man knows that the universe was in existence a thousand years ago, yet every person believes it to hav been, because they know by experience that it exists now. This belief, in its effect on the mind, is equal to actual knowledge, because it is more probable that it existed than that it did not. There is an equal reason for believing that it existed five thousand years ago as one thousand. It matters not to what point in duration one may go in imagination, the belief that the universe was in existence is as rational at five thousand as at one thousand years ago. The unbelief in its existence at any point in duration is irrational. Time will not change the rational into irrational, or the irrational into rational, any more than it will change truth into error, or error into truth. There is as much reason for past eternal existence as there is for future eternal existence of the universe, or its infinit extent. It is often asked, How came this or that? Questions may be asked that cannot be answered until the whole universe, with its past and present activity, the relation of every particle to every other particle, and the effect of every movement of every particle, is understood. The sixty-two chemical elements admit innumerable changes, and each change will be an antecedent to an event. It must be evident from what has been said of the sixty-two chemical elements that the ultimate potency of nature is unknown and unknowable. Hence it is rational to believe that nature is competent to produce all phenomena that take place, and irrational to assume a cause outside of nature.

The theory of past and future eternity of the universa admits the possibility of immortality, which special creation does not. Hence it is a consoling theory to believe in as human nature is constituted.

An eternal conscious existence after death, to some minds appears probable; they may be in possession of facts that warrant the belief; their belief is therefore rational. Others that are not in possession of such facts are in doubt, yet they may desire continued existence, and would be glad to attain facts to warrant the belief. But if they hav no facts for bases to reason from, their skepticism is reasonable. The majority of mankind believe in immortality as a result of authority, and their belief is superstition and not rational.

The rationalists are charged with being unbelievers, and promotors of immorality. The question is not a question of how much or how little belief, but of rational or irrational faith. Probably the Atheists believe as much as the religionists; the difference is in kind and not in quantity. As to morality, doubtless it is true that there are too many immoral persons of all beliefs, and of no belief. If it is immoral to persecute, then the religionists should forever hold their peace, for persecution has come down the ages in connection with religion. It is recorded that Moses commanded the sons of Levi to put every man his sword by his side, and slay every man his brother, his companion, and every one his neighbor, and the result was that about three thousand were slaughtered.

It is remarkable that religion has caused more wars than any other one thing. The religionists hav exerted their ingenuity to its utmost capacity in inventing cruel methods to destroy life, and yet outside of religion they were amiable and kind. Even Jesus (whether an ideal or historical person) was most amiable when teaching natural morality, but when teaching religion he was ferocious. He tells his followers that he did not come "to bring peace, but the sword; to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." All religions hav generated persecution, and persecuted when they had power, even the Deists when they undertook to set up a new religion in France. The Atheists never persecuted. In ancient times theologians and philosophers thought the producers of wealth had no rights that they were obligated to respect. Epicurus, the Atheist, was the only one that we hav any account of that recognized manhood in the slaves, and invited them to attend his lectures. He was an interrogator of nature, and hence he could not do otherwise than see that all men were organized of the same elements, and consequently were entitled to the same rights. For this the religionists from that day to this hav vilified him.

The theory of past as well as future eternity of the universe based upon experience is simple, and easily understood by the uneducated as well as by the educated.

WILLIAM JONES.

Freethought in Australia.

The champions of liberty are as busy as ever fighting for their cause in these young colonies, while the representativs of ancient tyrannies are equally busy in opposing them. Since I last wrote to you, several episodes of interest to Freethinkers hav occurred, and I shall relate them to you as briefly as possible.

The most remarkable event has been the publication of an extremely Liberal book written by a local judge named Hartley Williams. The title of the work is "Religion Without Superstition." It has come like a bomb into the camps of the various religious bodies, producing the greatest consternation and horror in the minds of many of the "unco guid," who would not hav condescended to dip their holy noses into its pages had it not emanated from one holding such a distinguished social position. The judge treats his readers to a diligent study of some of the most vital points of Christian theology, viz.: the Trinity, the Incarnation, Miracles, the Atonement and Advent, the Inspiration of the Bible, and the question of Deity. All these doctrins, except the latter one, are carefully analyzed, scriptural quotations and references being freely given; and I need scarcely add that they all suffer, as the natural result of logical scrutiny. Of course such a production could not pass unchallenged, and "replies" hav been given from many quarters. Amongst these is a printed reply by Rev. D. M. Berry, a Church of England clergyman, wherein he talks the customary twaddle of his cloth, but nevertheless makes at least one very good point—and that is, against the judge's Theism. After Judge Williams has thrown overboard the doctrin of Biblical inspiration, he has to seek elsewhere for evidence of his "God of love" on which to build his "pure faith," as he terms it. The reverend Berry thereupon asks him if he has gone through the world with his eyes shut, or if he has been living in an unreal world, when he finds evidence of this "God of love" in the study of nature around him. He informs the judge that this study of nature is one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, of obstacles to such a belief, as it reveals the existence of so much evil, which, if anything, predominates over the good. The reverend critic then jubilantly refers to revelation for proof. Mr. Berry has yet to learn that "children and fools shouldn't play with edged tools," for in overthrowing Theism he adopts a line of argument which upsets the dogmas of his own trade at the same time.

This same judge, Mr. Hartley Williams, has just heard the two cases against Mr. J. S. Robertson and Mr. Joseph Symes, for conducting and delivering a lecture one Sunday night at the Hall of Science, Melbourne, upon which occasion money was charged for admission. He gave judgment against them in each case, but recommended them to carry the cases to the Full Court. This they hav decided to do, and so the matter stands at present. Another court case is threatening: the government is taking steps to prosecute the Liberator for publishing without the necessary sureties against blasphemy and sedition as required by the local act.

Mr. Symes continues his course of Sunday evening lectures for the Australasian Secular Association; the subject dealt with lately being of a political character as well as theological. This departure has proved very successful, one lecture in particular, which strongly condemned the public character of Queen Victoria, being honored with a leader in the pious Daily Telegraph, wherein the police authorities were called upon to interfere. Another novelty to which Melbourne lecture-goers hav been treated lately is that of lectures before male audiences upon Phallic worship and its supposed connection with present-day beliefs. We hav had three lectures on this subject by as many speakers, and all hav proved highly successful. The Mutual Improvement Class of the Australasian Secular Association, and the secular Sunday-school continue to fulfil the functions for which they were started; although the latter does not meet with anything like the patronage its importance deserves —freethinking parents in too many instances being indifferent to the great importance of juvenil education upon the spread of their principles, and as frequently being the slave of that lazy and selfish sentiment which causes them so often to say, "Oh, I grew out of superstition, and my children can do the same." We need a few Miss Wixon's to teach them a lesson.

The Melbourne Free Discussion Society has suspended operations; and it is uncertain whether they will re-commence in the winter season or not.

The bigoted Wesleyans hav been hard at it petitioning parliament to discontinue running Sunday trains—this practice having been greatly extended lately, and with the most gratifying results. The Presbyterian bigots hav also been activ, having expelled one of their number, the Rev. G. Dods, from his pulpit, for heresy. The Rev. Chas. Strong, another outcast from the same body, has returned from England, and is delivering a series of Sunday lectures in the Temperance Hall, Melbourne.

A new branch of the Australasian Secular Association has been started at Ballarat, and has made fair progress.

The South Australian Freethought Association (which stands unique as an "incorporated" Freethought body) continues to move along smoothly.

Mr. Thomas Walker is lecturing at Sydney, N. S. W., with great success—his recent utterances on the Soudan campaign having earned him the encomiums of the daily press. The Free Discussion Society in the same city continues to hold satisfactory and successful meetings each Sunday; while the Hall of Science at Newcastle continues to supply the inhabitants of that progressiv district with a steady supply of Freethought knowledge. The Sydney Liberal has ceased publication, but the society which it represented is still flourishing. Miss Ada Campbell has paid a visit to Tasmania, and is endeavoring to wake the pious inhabitants of that unenlightened little isle to the stores of knowledge which await them.

Of Queensland and Western Australia I can giv you no intelligence, as the Melbourne Secularists hav not yet sent their missionaries to preach their gospel to the heathen in those parts. But in New Zealand no such state of affairs exists, and the action of Freethinkers there can better be estimated than in any of the other Australasian colonies. Freethought Associations are dotted all over the colony, and the doings of each are regularly chronicled in the Wanganui Freethought Review. From this source I learn that there are four professional Freethought lecturers activly engaged in their oratorical capacity. They are: Mr. Isaac Selby, "Ivo" (whose correct name I forget), Dr. Hughes, and Dr. York, the latter of whom has lately arrived from your own country, intending to make a lecturing tour of the Australian colonies.

Christianity is meeting with a certain amount of competition in New Zealand, the Maoris having got up a sort of religious "rival." A Maori Messiah, or rather Messiahess, has arisen, and she informs the defeated Maoris that their millennium is close at hand, when they shall assemble together on the ranges of Hokianga. A great river shall suddenly flow down from heaven and wash them white—whiteness being, according to the prophetess, a necessary qualification for obtaining entrance to heaven. When all the Maoris hav been white-washed in this manner, they shall go to heaven and reign with Christ one thousand years. It is reported that a daily sacrifice is made of cats and dogs (and some say children) to the deity. Fortunately, in this instance, the Christians are on the side of reason, and are endeavoring to check this superstitious mania. With this I must conclude, and again send you my best wishes for the prosperity of your cause. DAVID A. ANDRADE.

Timber Famin Near.

If I could convince people that by going into silver mining there is a probability of rich returns in a few years, I could get thousands of capitalists to contribute though knowing the risks are dangerous.

Here is a speculation where there is not any risk, and profits are immense. Large interest on investments is sure. In a very few years our timber supply must be consumed, in spite of all human effort. Governor Morton says we destroy over twenty thousand acres per day. Kansas, with all her efforts for twenty-five years, has planted but two hundred thousand acres. Soon timber will become immensely valuable. As fast as substitutes are invented, new inventions call for more timber. Ten thousand dollars will buy and plant a thousand acres. After three years some of the states repay two or three dollars per acre for every acre so cultivated in timber. This will pay interest and all expenses. In seven years the prunings will pay several dollars per acre yearly. Soon the thinnings will furnish railroad ties. By the time the timber is growing, if I can count, there will not be a spare stick on this continent. The timber will be worth from five hundred dollars to one thousand dollars per acre, as sure as we liv.

The Power of Organized Labor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Among the various schemes proposed for securing to workingmen their rights as opposed to the greed of capital, probably none has shown itself more efficient than that which goes under the name of trades unions. "In union there is strength," and never has the truth of this maxim been better illustrated than in the organization of the Newsdealers' Association in defense of their interests against the attempt of the New York Herald to crush them. The Herald commenced its existence some fifty years since, a small, puny sheet, edited by an erratic Scotchman in defiance of public opinion, never for a moment troubling his brain as to "what other people thought about him;" ever on the alert to turn to pecuniary advantage in his journal any indignity offered him. To read the Herald at this period was to lose caste. But the editor thoroughly understood the power of a newspaper coupled with a "one-man power." He had a complete knowledge of human weaknesses and knew that the "free and enlightened people" shouted as loud for the man mounting the steps of the scaffold, as for the one mounting the steps of the White House. With the frugality inherent in his race he determined that for all this shouting they should pay him—the fiddler. So notorious had the Herald become in its catering to the masses, making a speciality of certain items necessary to the business community, it soon became the legitimate channel for advertising—the cash box of all daily papers.

A generation having passed away, and with it its conservatism, the best talent money could procure was employed to write its editorials, and the Herald became a paper for all classes, from the street sweeper to the merchant prince, from the most fervent teacher of Christ's precepts, to the most effectiv agent of his satanic majesty. The editor, James Gordon Bennett, passed away respected as a success in life, leaving one son, his namesake, who became the possessor of the Herald and its emoluments, valued at one million yearly. Young Bennett possessed all his fathers eccentricities minus his astute discernment or frugal habits and industry, and abandoned himself to excessiv pleasure; becoming satiated in one he would in the absence of another direct some new innovation in the management of his paper. In one of those freaks he orders the Herald to be sold for two cents per copy it having previously been sold for three cents per copy. At the old price the newsdealer realized three cents net weekly; at two cents, he realized two cents weekly. The newsdealers did not object to Mr. Bennett selling the Herald at the reduced price to the public, but they did object to its being done at the expense of their labor. They well knew he could afford to serve the Herald gratuitously in view of its immense advertising patronage, and they took no stock in his pretended philanthropic interest in the public. They first endeavored to arbitrate with the editor and telegraphed to him at Newport. The arrogant reply of this one man to four thousand laborers was, "If you do not like the Herald on my terms let it alone," and all attempts to compromise were repelled in like manner.

It now became a war of right against supposed might, commencing in October, 1883, and ending in April, 1885, in a complete victory for the newsdealer and the public. The Herald was sold at two cents, and the newsdealer got his three cents weekly net per copy.

Details of the fight would fill a volume. The newsdealers called a meeting, and enthusiastically pledged themselvs to stand by each other and to use every means to protect the bread earned by their toil. They well knew the Herald owed more to the despised newsdealer than the newsdealer to the Herald.

Nothing was left undone to force the newsdealer to the wall when it was found he had the temerity to assert his right. It was claimed the newsdealer had no right that the Herald was bound to respect. On the other hand the newsdealer claimed that capital was derived from labor, and that the latter should not cringe or humble itself to the unjust demands of the former. The weekly meetings of the fraternity were becoming the school for a class who never before had thought upon the rights of man or the great industrial cyclone of the day, with a few exceptions. Industrial questions were given a thought. Brain and talent were brought to the surface that would honor any rostrum.

The Herald started a delivery company, with office in Beekman street, to deliver not only the Herald, but all other papers. This conflicted with the American News Company—that monster monopoly dependent on the newsdealers—from whom went up a howl. The newsdealer would take the papers from the wagon when it suited his convenience, but invariably leave the Herald. This proving abortiv, a gigantic company was formed, composed of four millionaires, called the Kiosk Company. This company went before the board of aldermen and offered to pay ten thousand dollars yearly for the use of the street corners. Another yell went up from the American News Company, who offered fifty thousand dollars for this privilege. Able counsel was employed on both sides. It was found this august body of disinterested aldermen had no more right to the street corners than the devil had to all the land he viewed from a mountain top and offered to a certain individual if he would fall down and worship him.

What next? A company was started, called the Mutual News Company, in which every newsdealer should hav a share for the sum of twenty-five dollars But through the able discussions at the weekly meetings the newsdealer had become an old bird, and could distinguish chaff from the real article, and took no stock in it.

Whatever were the feelings of the Associated Press on the question, they were not made apparent, with one or two exceptions, which exceptions were not forgotten by the newsdealers.

The Herald all at once claimed to hav great love for the blind, the lame, and the halt, erecting little stands over the city for them to sell the Herald, but the blind wouldn't see and the lame wouldn't walk, and the Herald halted. The next philanthropic measure was to enlist the street Arab, putting on his head the emblem of the Commune, enticing him with a square meal daily, and all the Heralds he could sell. He ate his dinner with a relish, sold the Herald, and divided the money on the Communistic principle.

Sharp practice on the part of the Herald was met by sharp practice on the part of the newsdealers. One Sunday morning the newsdealer found himself cut off from the Sunday Herald and a scarlet-headed boy parading in front of his stand with the desired paper. But the newsdealer knew the weak spot in the street Arabs. The Herald soon passed from their hands to the newsdealer's, and the young Modocs retired to their lava-beds to count their money. This ruse of the Herald thus proving abortiv, the next Sunday the newsdealer could hav all the Heralds he wanted. But he didn't want any, and the junk market was glutted. During all this play of finesse on the part of each the Herald editor loudly blew his horn in his journal, but the blowing and the practical showing were at variance. The newsdealers claim that the Herald circulation was reduced one-half at the close of the contest. They also claim the prestige of the Herald as "the paper" is gone. The animosity engendered during the trouble will tell on the paper, and James Gordon Bennett, Jr., will leave off where James Gordon Bennett, Sr., began. The readers of the Herald, with few exceptions, paid the newsdealer the old price during the struggle, so that pecuniarily he suffered no loss. The loss was all on the side of the Herald, not only in money, but in its lost respect, self-reliance, and, best of all, its swagger and bombast. Its editorials are not as logical and reasoning as formerly, a fact apparent to the most casual reader. While the work was going on, to coerce the newsdealers, the advertising rates advanced five cents per line. Did the slow shilling beat the nimble sixpence?

The Herald previously had never permitted newsdealers to return copies of unsold papers. Its minions were allowed this privilege, and they availed themselvs of it by returning not only the most of what they received, but those unsold by the newsdealers.

MORAL.—Producers of all property, the newsdealers of New York hav shown you the power of organized labor. Will you profit by it? PAXTON.

GREAT POETS THE FOUNDERS OF SCIENCE.—The two mightiest intellects our country has produced are Shakspere and Newton; and that Shakspere should hav preceded Newton was, I believe, no casual or unmeaning event. Shakspere and the poets sowed the seed which Newton and the philosophers reaped. Discarding the old scholastic and theological pursuits, they drew attention to nature, and thus became the real founders of all natural science. They did even more than this. They first impregnated the mind of England with bold and lofty conceptions. They taught the men of their generation to crave after the unseen. They taught them to pine for the ideal, and rise above the visible world of sense. In this way, by cultivating the emotions, they opened one of the paths which lead to truth. . . . Since the seventeenth century we hav had no poet of the highest order, though Shelley, had he lived, would perhaps hav become one. . . . If we except his immature, though miraculous, efforts, we may assuredly say that for nearly two hundred years England has produced no poetry which bears those unmistakable marks of inspiration that we find in Spenser, in Shakspere, and in Milton.—Buckle.

Funeral of T. C. Leland.

It was a sad company that gathered at the hall of the Liberal Club last Sunday morning to attend the funeral of Theron Chapman Leland, ex-secretary of the National Liberal League, who died June 3d. Every seat was occupied and many people remained standing throughout the services. At half-past 10 o'clock the body, borne by those who had been his associates and friends in life, was brought into the hall and placed upon a catafalque near the platform. The pall bearers were Alonzo Van Deusen, William U. Dame, Henry M. Parkhurst, Edward F. Underhill, William Rowe, and G. S. McWatters.

The hall rapidly filled up while the voluntary was playing, and then a hymn was sung by Mrs. Chamberlain, Mrs. McCune, and Mr. Jones, the latter of the Spiritualists' Society in this city. Mr. S. P. Putnam read with deep feeling this poem:

I see thee in the silence of great death,
Calm as the eternal hills upon whose front
Shines the soft radiance of the pure white day;
I see the crystal beauty of thy soul
Unclouded in the marble of thy face;
The glowing ardor of thy life full set
In diamond stillness, with no flaw to dim;
And to my heart I say, He is not dead,
But living in the glory of his work,
In things accomplished that no fate can kill,
Linked with the endless process of the world;
For he has lived for truth with manly deed,
And grown to hights of virtue through long years,
Touched with the spirit of our common weal;
And so he passes, not like petal blown
Or like the floating mist on summer's sky,
But is immortal in the glorious life
That beats from age to age in deathless man.

Ah, memory's halls are beautiful for aye,
Crowded with treasures ever sweet and new,
Bright as the morning's freshness of heaped gold,
In earth and sky, in flower and sailing clouds—
In this fair memory he is blazoned now,
And cannot fall or fade to nothingness;
He is a part of the illustrious past
Which naught can change and naught annihilate.

With what a solemn glory over life
Death draws its mystic and unfathomed grace!
We know it not, nor ever hath the veil
From its unsounded deep been put aside;
No music from its endless ocean drops
In harsh or mellow accents on our way—
But 'gainst that awful silence life bursts bright
And wonderful, and seems more excellent,
More fruitful for the dark unknown wherein
Its wealth appears to perish, but, transformed,
Becomes a grander luster, purer stream.

Humanity dies not, and in its soul,
O noble friend, thou hast thy royal grave;
The labor thou hast done is ours, is man's,
The dear possession of the race to come;
Within our thoughts and zeal thou art alive;
Thou hast struck hands with generations far
In the ennobling purpose of thy work.
The stream dries not; invisible it flows,
And makes more swift the upward steps of men.
Thou art at rest; no storm can shake thy frame;
But the unresting motions of thy soul,
Like pulses of the summer air, still touch
The world to beauty and our hearts to hope.

Following the poem came a second song. Then Mr. T. B. Wakeman stood near the head of the coffin and delivered the funeral discourse. He spoke earnestly and at times eloquently, and the absence of the bursts of applause that on other occasions never failed to greet his glowing periods, made the address particularly impressiv.

At the close of the address another hymn was sung and opportunity was afforded for the audience to take a last look at their dead friend. The body was placed in a vault at Cypress Hills, to which it was followed by carriages containing the family and nearer relativs of the deceased. There were no services except those at the hall.

The following telegram, expressiv of the sentiment of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League, was received from Mr. Frankel:

"S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Friend: Though it is impossible for me to be with you, I mourn the loss. Such men as Leland are hard to spare. May his works be emulated.

"J. W. FRANKEL."

The Albany Convention.

I expect to be at Albany June 21st to make arrangements in conjunction with the Albany Liberal League for the September Convention. As soon as the executiv committee hav decided upon the list of speakers, the names and subjects will be published. Of course, we cannot hav all the speakers that we desire—the funds and the time will not permit—but the executiv committee will endeavor to secure representativ speakers who shall present our cause to the attention of the public with eloquence and power.

The general ticket agent of the Boston and Albany Railroad writes that with a guarantee of fifty or more names the round trip tickets will be as follows:

Boston, $6.80;
Worcester, $5.35;
Springfield, $3.75.

Let the Liberals in these and neighboring places be on the alert and secure at least fifty to attend the convention.

The New York, Lake Erie, and Western Railroad Company will accept one-third of the regular rates on return tickets to those who pay full fare going to convention on that line.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company will make the same rates.

We expect to make equally favorable arrangements with other railroads, and will publish in due time.

I call attention to the following important letter from H. L. Green, who has been such a faithful worker in the interests of our association for the last eight years. In losing the official services of our honored president, Dr. Brown, and secretary, Mr. Green, we can only hope that those whom the convention shall choose as their successors will be equally earnest, able, and efficient in the administration of affairs. The Liberal movement in this state owes much to the work of these indefatigable officers, and the success of the future will be largely the fruit of their devotion in the past. S. P. PUTNAM.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., June 6, 1885.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Chairman of the Executiv Committee of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, Dear Sir: On account of impaired health and editorial duties I feel that the interests of the New York State Freethinkers' Association and the cause of Freethought generally will be advanced by my resigning the office of corresponding secretary of the above-named association, and by having some younger and more energetic person elected in my place. I do therefore herewith file with you my resignation of this office, which I hav held for the last eight years; and when the association meets in annual convention at Albany, next September, please convey to that body my most sincere thanks for the many tokens of kindness that I hav from year to year received at their hands.

It will be doubtful if I shall be able to be with you, but I hope you may hav a grand, good convention that shall result in advancing the cause that every friend of humanity must love when they understand it. Fraternally yours,

H. L. GREEN.

The Tent.

Sound the glad tidings! Hosanna to the Liberal hearts that giv practical proof of their desire to advance "peace and good will toward men," by enabling us, in the tented field, to proclaim the glorious truth of Secularism to all classes—FREE, without money and without price; who by their contributions continue the good work of propagandism through the summer, insuring the judicious circulation of our best Liberal literature, arousing the people to the necessity of thinking for themselvs, and awakening the masses now soothed to indifference by the lullaby of the church to realization of their dangers and the stern truth: "Eternal vigilance is the price of Liberty!"

How bright and glorious are the true, loyal, generous hearts who, released from the fetters of faith and the dark, dismal prison of superstition, learn and liv out the ennobling principles of Secularism, and bravely, perseveringly, do all in their power to help others to the joy of that freedom they hav attained! Justice becomes their creed, their religion, their standard, their god. As they realize in their enfranchisment the sad condition of so many of their fellow-creatures; as they look back with gratitude to the brave, noble hearts who dared risk not alone money and social position, but liberty and even life itself, to advance the cause of universal mental liberty, their sense of honor prompts them in their turn to do all in their power. Justice demands, and with glad alacrity and cheerful liberality they devote time and means to the cause, so that the priceless legacy they hav received from the pioneers of liberty shall be preserved and augmented to bless generations to come.

It is one thing to admit the truth; it is quite another thing to possess intelligence sufficient to hav the truth take hold of the inner life, to recognize and obey its claims, to struggle out of the ruts of error and turning from the way of evil, patiently, perseveringly, climb the steep hill of rectitude, and with love, tenderness, and a spirit of self-sacrifice, giv of time and means to assist and encourage others to ascend with us.

Brave efforts hav been made—honest hearts hav generously responded to the appeals for funds to sustain Messrs. Watts and Putnam in carrying on propaganda work during the fall and winter. They hav done good and faithful work. But we feared if all effort stopped during the summer the good seed sown would fail to germinate, so long neglected, or the black-cloth crows of the church would pluck up and devour it.

Thanks to the princely liberality of such whole-souled friends of humanity and Secularism as William Smith, of Geneva, New York.

The Tent is bought, pitched, equipped, doing its work, and we hav no fears now as to its being sustained. And while words are all too poor to express our gratitude to Brother Smith for his timely assistance and confidence in our ability to carry on this momentous enterprise, we do not the less appreciate the spirit of self-sacrifice of the friends who, at detriment to the interests of their own business, voluntarily risked loss, and loaned funds sufficient to make up amount needed to purchase the Tent. Nor do we fail to appreciate the contributions of even the smallest amount, freely given in many cases, contributed from scant resources absolutely needed in many instances to supply necessities.

We realize it is no light burden we hav assumed. It shall be our earnest endeavor to insure to one and all good and satisfactory returns for their investment. By winning honest hearts to our ranks, judiciously circulating large quantities of our best Liberal literature; promoting efficient organization; securing to all additional facilities for obtaining scientific education, promoting sociability, and building up and popularizing the cause of Secularism, so that the Nine Demands shall be secured and all shall rejoice in equal rights and privileges, regardless of religious faith or the lack of it.

Contributions to the Tent fund are still needed, and will be thankfully acknowledged.

SPECIAL INVITATION.—Any minister, in good standing in his own denomination, desirous to defend orthodox Christianity, or to oppose the teachings, or attempt to refute the claims of Secularism, can hav Free, Exclusiv Use of the Tent on any afternoon, or from half-past seven until half-past eight on any evening, except Sunday.

Prove all things, ventilate the facts. Let free men and women dare to think for themselvs, and reason, right, and truth prevail.

AT KALAMAZOO, MICH.

We pitched our beautiful new tent on Saturday morning, May 30, 1885, in Kalamazoo, Mich. One half the Tent is supplied with comfortable plank seats, the other half, less the space occupied by the platform, is filled with chairs. We purchased one hundred and twenty very durable, neat, comfortable cane seat camp chairs, but as they could not be made and delivered until Wednesday, we hired ordinary wooden chairs to use till then. They are of course neither so comfortable nor inviting as our camp chairs will be We hav a bandsome serviceable family Tent, 12x17, as retiring-room for lecturer and helpers, sleeping-place for Tent-master, etc. All admire the neat and pretty appearance of the Tent. When lit up with our seven lamps at night it is very attractiv.

Mr. Henry Lewine, of New York, joined us on Friday evening, and is at present learning the arduous duties of Tent-master.

Kalamazoo is a very hard field, but our tried and true friends, Mr. and Mrs. Elias H. Gault, from Rochester, N. Y., whose devoted labors brought us, with the aid of THE TRUTH SEEKER, from the darkness of Christian superstition to the glorious light of the gospel of humanity, reside here, and their devotion to the cause of Liberalism goes far to smooth all the roughest places. Their geniality, hospitality, and unfailing kindness inspire us with redoubled energy and courage, while their good, useful, benevolent, and exemplary lives challenge admiration and giv them potent influence in the community.

The attendance is steadily increasing. The best people of the city are becoming interested, and with our more comfortable camp chairs will doubtless be regular attendants.

The press of duties and cares has prevented our advertising by painted bills, etc., as we could wish, but we initiated Mr. Henry Lewine, our Tent-master, by arousing him at half-past three in the morning, equipping him with a step-ladder and brush, while we wrestled with a huge tobacco pail of paste, and posted a few bills, one about forty feet by nine, one twenty by nine, and a few smaller ones.

We hav not deemed it best to lecture every afternoon this week, fearing to overtax our ability and fail to do justice at our evening meetings.

We shall be pleased to hear from those who desire the Tent in their vicinity.

Write full particulars, and what the friends are willing or able to do. We make all our lectures free, and positivly no collections; prefer, when practical, to hold meetings every afternoon, as our first, great, and most earnest wish is to arouse an interest and induce the women to take prominent part in the work, and our afternoon efforts would be especially devoted to this purpose.

We must make this a genuin missionary work. The chief object of Tent labor is to reach people outside the Liberal ranks.

The Tent is not designed simply to afford gratification and intellectual feasts to Liberals, but to giv without money and without price the bread of life to honest hearts, starved by feeding on the dried husks of moldy old orthodoxy.

Liberals of means and leisure can be sure of a very enjoyable time attending Tent meetings, getting acquainted with those who attend the lectures, visiting house to house, carefully and judiciously distributing Liberal literature, securing subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers, etc.

News and Notes.

It was quite pleasant after wide wanderings to return to old camping-grounds and greet familiar faces and see how the fires of freedom are still kept burning. The Newark Liberal League has been busy at work this winter. It has had lectures and debates every Sunday, with full houses and a wide range of discussion. After my lecture there was an exceedingly interesting debate on Theism and Agnosticism and kindred phases of this great problem of human thought—the whence, the how, and the whither. I suppose that our humanity will never cease to toil more or less with these mighty questions. Some will always perhaps believe in a supreme being, or perhaps a supreme intelligence, or infinit goodness, while some will accept with philosophic calm the limitations of human knowledge and be satisfied with making the best of what we know. These are questions concerning which there can be no dogmatism, there can be no mathematical certainty. It is a question of outlook, of temperament, of mental color. Victor Hugo believed in a God. He might, perhaps, with his happy and wonderful experience, with such a rich, poetic nature, that could catch all the graces and glories of human life; but those who hav seen the darker side and study its awful logic find vindication for an opposit belief—that not in God but in humanity is our great hope and trust. I am perfectly willing that one should be a Theist, but somehow or other the Theist does not seem to be quite so willing that I should be an Atheist. The spirit of Atheism seems to me therefore more charitable than the spirit of Theism, for it recognizes all the wants of humanity and seeks in a legitimate way to satisfy them. It certainly has all the knowledge of them, an equal hope and faith in essential justice, only it has not quite so large an inference as to abstract being, which to my mind is a difference hardly worth quarreling about, but rather

> "A difference without discord, which can make
> Those sweetest sounds in which all spirits shake
> Like tremulous leaves in the continuous air."

One of our best and bravest has fallen—Theron C. Leland, former secretary of the League, whose work has been so self-sacrificing, and whose spirit has been so fearless in the many combats for freedom. His life has been one of genuin triumph—his death is a harvest of precious memories, twined with flowers of hope. He has ennobled our thought; he has made more abounding our belief in human progress. The eloquent discourse of Mr. Wakeman gave us an animated picture of his unique and varied life. He was in himself an original force. He was no echo of the world about him. The light by which he advanced was the genius of his own personality. He was a dreamer indeed. He was stirred to the very depths of his soul by wondrous visions of human progress. His nature was touched to high issues, and amid the discords realized the inspiring harmony. But his dreams were wrought to deeds. He was a practical power, and the value of his work is with us in the organized Liberal movement of to-day. He has been a faithful servant of Liberty; he was a reformer through and through, and would not be satisfied with any half-way measures. He surrendered all to what to his mind was right. He gave up wealth and position, and flung himself with the forlorn hope, even that in old age he might do something for human welfare. There was always a greater good to be accomplished. One victory only made imperativ the struggle for another. He had no rest. His life was one of perpetual labor—his energy was unflagging. Gratefully do we accept the memory of his bright, heroic career. He shall be one of the saints in the calendar of human freedom—he shall make us more earnest, more hopeful, and more devoted. To his honored grave we bring the flowers of affectionate regard; over his mortal dust we twine the wreath of victory. He has fought and conquered. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Executiv Committee.

C. B. REYNOLDS, ESQ, Chairman of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League, Dear Friend: Yours, appointing me a member of the Executiv Committee, at hand.

I confess just a little pride to be an officer of the League, and considerable anxiety for fear I will not do honor to our cause, not through lack of zeal, but through inexperience in such matters, and a lack of ability to properly represent and defend our principles.

But until a better selection can be made, I will do as I think will best further the interests of the League. I hav been trying to obtain the names of our friends in Utah for a year or two, and hav got quite a little directory, and I hav lately written to what I call the leading Liberal, also to the appointees of the committee in Montana, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming, asking their opinion as to the feasibility of the five territories employing a home missionary to travel a la Watts and Putnam. I suggested that a lecturer could do immense good by lecturing, taking subscriptions for our papers, visiting and cheering the lukewarm or persecuted Infidels (I assure you that we are not by any means popular in Utah).

It is too early for answers yet. I will let you know all their opinions, and think we can surely afford one; and I cannot think of a better way to organize, and perhaps such a large scope of country may afford more than one field man. But a start of this kind will be good, however small a start, for what is everybody's business is nobody's business.

Fraternally yours, WM. REYNOLDS.

Wanship, Utah.

C. B. REYNOLDS, ESQ., Dear Sir: I received yours with appointment for me as a member of the Executiv Committee, and allow me to thank you for the honor you confer upon me. I will try to serve you and the League to the best of my ability.

There are two important points to be considered in regard to our work: First, how to get money; second, how to use it to the best advantage to our cause. And to get money I would suggest for you to appoint in each state and territory a treasurer and receiver, and let him appoint one in each county of his state or territory, to receive money in small sums, such as each Liberal could spare weekly, and each county receiver to report and remit monthly to the state receiver, and the state receiver to remit and report to the National Treasurer every three months, and also for each receiver to sell Liberal papers and pamphlets, and the proceeds to go to the National Treasurer, and hav each of those receivers' names and addresses published in all the Liberal papers, so all the Liberals will know that they are authorized to receive money in that way. I think we could collect a large sum in that way in the course of a year in the treasury; and to dispose of it let the National League hire lecturers and send them out in the field where they are most needed, and distribute Liberal papers and tracts to those that will not buy them.

It may be that some of our friends hav a better plan than this. If so, I shall be happy to receive it, or add to this and make it better. A. ERVIN.

Murray, Idaho.

Two Brooklyn churches refused to hire a choir in which a colored man was a principal singer. The color prejudice, it seems, is still strong in the churches. The negroes hav only one consolation—their white Christian brethren will hav to associate with them in the next world, or preaching is vain.

CIVIL service reform is a good thing, urgently needed. But when it takes the form of asking in the examination of an applicant for a position as stenographer how far the moon is from the sun, it looks as though a little of it applied to the civil service reformers would not be entirely wasted. The use of such information to a stenographer is not apparent, unless it be that he is expected to prompt political speakers.

Mr. TALMAGE in his Sunday sermon said: "Recently there came to me the fact that a college had been built in the far West for Infidel purposes, and not long afterward the college failed, and it was handed over to a Presbyterian company, and is now run in the interest of that orthodox religion." And this reminds us that there was recently published the fact that a church in Brooklyn had been converted into a skating rink, and as such drew much larger crowds than when it was a house of worship. Both of these facts are significant, and are distended with a big moral.—Norristown Herald.

The conversion of the church into a skating rink instanced by the Norristown Herald is genuin, we believe, but we should like to know when and where the Infidel college was built and handed over to the Presbyterians.

ALL the daily papers hav a theological editor whose business it is to detect heretical utterances in either pulpit or press, and to make comments thereon. The theological editor of the Herald seems to hav lost his hold upon orthodoxy, for in reviewing Beecher's sermons on evolution he expresses himself thus:

"The idea that God is himself gradually evolved from the human comprehension as intelligence grows broader and thought more solemn is a conception vast and beautiful in its boundless possibilities."

As the World remarks, it thus appears that in the beginning God did not make man, but in the end man made God.

THE Herald of Health has begun to collect a new series of letters from some of the oldest of our brainworkers concerning their physical habits. Ten years or so ago, Dr. Holbrook published similar letters of great interest from William Cullen Bryant, William Howitt, and others. The first of the series, Dr. Holbrook thinks, was by Rev. Dr. Bartol; the second, to appear in the June number of the Herald, will bear the signature—familiar to almost overyone who has handled an American Greenback—of F. E. Spinner, who is now in his eighty-fourth year. The third is being prepared for the next month's issue by Dr. James Freeman Clarke. These letters should possess much practical value as well as literary interest. The letter of Mr. F. E. Spinner will relate most graphically the very curious and remarkable manner in which he has preserved vigorous health to a very advanced age.

THE San Luis Obispo Mirror reports that the Lick Observatory, on Mount Hamilton, Cal., is already, even without the great telescope in course of construction, one of the most complete in the world. There has recently been added a meridian circle, made by Reifold, of Hamburg, and a house has been built for it. Two disks for the great thirty-six inch lens hav been successfully cast, and a member of the firm of Alvin Clark & Sons recently went to Europe to examin them, and to ascertain whether either of them is suitable for the lens. If a perfect disk has been obtained, it is thought that the great refractor may be mounted and in use by 1886. Already the observatory has a twelve-inch equatorial, a four-inch transit, a comet seeker, a vertical circle, and a six-inch equatorial. Then there are five clocks connected by a complete electrical system. Superintendent Frazier states that the thirty-six-inch glass, when finished, will be by far the most powerful one in the world, bringing the moon within thirty miles of the earth, whereas eighty miles is the limit of existing telescopes. The wonders which such a glass will disclose can hardly be foretold.

SOCIETY, says Donn Piatt in John Swinton's Paper, crucified Christ: "He died not because he taught the poor and downtrodden their right to heaven, but because, in the eyes of the Vanderbilts of Jerusalem, he was a low, pernicious fellow, the friend of labor and the associate of harlots. Were our savior to appear on earth to-day, with his humble disciples, he would not be crucified, precisely; but he would be laughed at and shunned as a crank, He might, on account of his miracles, get an offer from a dime museum; but in no other way could he obtain a hearing. This sounds like profanity, but the real profanity appears in the church it is claimed he founded. Were he and his dirty, nay, torn, ragged disciples, to appear at the door of one of the temples erected to his memory, the sexton would hurry out to deny them admittance, or crowd them into a corner, where they would not offend the silks and satins of the congregation."

THE Sunday Gazetteer, of Dennison, Texas, says: "Two pamphlets hav been received at this office from the New York Truth Seeker Publishing Company, one entitled 'Why don't he Lend a Hand?" and other Poems,' by Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Putnam's name is no doubt familiar to many of our readers as the author of 'Golden Throne' and other productions. Mr. Putnam, if not an Atheist, is at least a very pronounced Agnostic, yet he has 'music in his soul,' and his rhymes not only jingle, but giv expression to thoughts that will survive the shock of criticism. The other book is by M. Babcock, 'The Religion of Humanity Better than Eternal Punishment.' Some one appropriated this before we had a chance to read it, through. Mr. Babcock is a good reasoner, and in this, his latest book, he asks the clergy several exceedingly puzzling questions, which, we fear, they will never answer. The Truth Seeker Publishing Company has a large catalog of Liberal books, which will be furnished on application."

HUGH P. MCELRONE, editor of the Catholic Mirror, Baltimore, writes to a New York Protestant paper concerning the Freedom of Worship bill, happily dead: "Of course, in the necessary discussion of this measure, it was inevitable that ill-informed Protestants should refer to the Spanish Inquisition, St. Bartholomew's massacre, and other instances of Catholic intolerance in the Old World. So far as they are concerned, I, in common with my millions of Catholic fellow-countrymen, condemn them as utterly foreign to the spirit of our religion. Protestants hav been guilty of similar offenses against justice, as in Calvin's burning of Servetus, in England's Star Chamber, which exceeded the iniquities of the Inquisition, and in a hundred other instances which might be cited. But these are all things of evil ages. Why cannot we agree to bury such foul remembrances out of sight? I, for one, am willing, with our great poet, Longfellow, to 'Let the dead past bury its dead.'" How well the Catholics of this country would like to hav the world forget their acts of the sixteenth century! And what a relief to the Protestants of to-day it would be if an impenetrable curtain could be hung between the year 1885 and the years of persecution gone before! But it cannot be. The ghosts of the murdered dead will not down at their bidding. Both churches hav striven hard to keep the multitudes ignorant of their crimes against humanity, but the people are beginning to find them out, and to despise them more as their knowledge of these infamies increases.

FREDERIC R. MARVIN has collected for the Home Journal the last words of many great men. Of Paine he quotes the conclusions of O. B. Frothingham: "'I hav no wish to believe on that subject.' These words were in answer to his physician's inquiry: 'Do you wish to believe that Jesus is the Son of God?' There is a dispute with regard to Paine's death. Some writers say he recanted and became a Christian, while others affirm that he died as he lived—an avowed Deist. In his last will and testament he says: 'I hav lived an honest and useful life to mankind; my time has been spent in doing good; and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator, God.' On the other hand some authors say that he was grossly intemperate and licentious, and that he discarded Christianity not so much from conviction as from a base desire to lead a bad life. The truth is, that Paine, though not rich, was in comfortable circumstances. He had considerable property, which is specified in his will. His sick bed was surrounded by friends who ministered to his wants, witnessed the firmness and calmness of his last hours, and attested the sincerity and sufficiency of his convictions. Not even the impertinent intrusivness of the clergy disturbed the entire serenity of his death." The last words of Theodore Parker were, "It is all one, Phillip and Clarke will come for my sake." He meant that Wendell Phillips and James Freeman Clarke would attend his funeral. Of the character of Parker, Marvin says: "His tone of morality was high. His motivs were elevated, and, apparently, sincere. His firm grasp of some of the fundamental principles of natural rights, together with his unfailing confidence in his own powers, gave a strength to his utterances of truth and duty which often stirred and swayed the moral nature of his hearers. But in all his writings we find no expression of a consciousness of guilt and of need as a sinner, and no recognition of Christ as a savior. Of Theodore Parker, Lowell speaks thus wittily, in his 'Fable for Critics:'

> "His hearers can't tell you on Sunday beforehand,
> If in that day's discourse they'll be Bibled or Koraned,
> For he's seized the idea (by his martyrdom fired),
> That all men (not orthodox) may be inspired;
> Yet though wisdom profane with his creed he may weave in,
> He makes it quite clear what he doesn't believe in,
> While some, who decry him, think all kingdom come
> Is a sort of a, kind of a, species of Hum,
> Of which, as it were, so to speak, not a crumb
> Would be left, if we didn't keep carefully mum,
> And, to make a clean breast, that 'tis perfectly plain
> That all kinds of wisdom are somewhat profane;
> Now P's creed than this may be lighter or darker,
> But in one thing 'tis clear he has faith, namely—Parker.
> And this is what makes him the crowd-drawing preacher.
> There's a background of God to each hard-working feature.'"

Mrs. Slenker's Experience with Mansfield.

This is probably the last step of the Spiritual experience belonging to my trip. I giv it to my readers in full. A friend inclosed funds for me to send the inclosed letter to J. V. Mansfield. I wrapped it in tissue paper and covered that all over with impressions from my rubber stamp, pasting all up securely, so that it was impossible for anyone to read it by calcium light or in any way but by opening it. You will see by the reply that the letter was really read, though I could discern no marks of its having been opened, still I knew it could hav been and carefully repasted. But there is enough in the reply to condemn it as a spirit production.

You see it purports to be from Bennett. All who knew his style will find nothing of our dear friend in it. Not even the opening words are his way of commencing a letter to me.

I don't understand who he means by "the doctor." Was Abner Kneeland his patron saint?

You will see that several of my questions are answered (!), showing conclusivly that the letter was really read. But any of us could hav answered them just as well, and those who really knew Bennett could hav done it far better.

You notice that not a question concerning my dead cousin, or anything requiring real knowledge, is touched upon. As Ingersoll would say, we could all hav "guessed" as correctly as he did at those that are replied to. Mr. Bennett has written and printed my initials hundreds and perhaps thousands of times, and never once as "A. D. S.," though strangers often write me as "Almina."

You will see that he says Paine died in 1816. He must hav forgotten that he has it 1809 in his valuable and interesting book, "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers."

Well, I must pronounce Mansfield a fraud, just as I hav the majority of all the mediums I hav yet encountered. If there be one honest clairvoyant I shall be glad of his or her address—that is, one who is clairvoyant enough to giv us real facts that we could not find out in any other way.

J. W. Truesdell offers Mansfield one hundred dollars if he will read, in his presence, a letter of his sealing up and preparing.

Sun's Day, May 31, 285. ELMINA.

MY LETTER TO A COUSIN WHO DIED WHEN I WAS A GIRL, SENT TO MANSFIELD TO BE ANSWERED CLAIRVOYANTLY.

DEAR COUSIN DAVID: I write this to ask thee if thee is still alive, and if so will thee tell me where in the universe thy home is, and if thee is still interested in things upon this earth—this side of life—and what thee has been doing since we parted?

Has thee ever visited any other star, planet, or world since thee left us? And if so, tell me something about them and their productions and peoples.

Is thee with thy parents? And does thee ever see mine, and my child and sisters who are gone? If so, tell me what they are doing.

Tell me how I can find proof of a life to come—of some way that is feasible for me to try.

Tell me if Planchette will write for me, and when, and, if not, who hereabouts can make it write.

Where is thy brother? If living on earth, what is his post-office address? And has he a family?

Did I not honestly and earnestly try to find out the real truth of Spiritualism while I was gone?

Is materialization and independent slate writing a real fact?

Tell me of some new inventions that we hav not.

Giv me a recipe for curing and eradicating cancer.

Tell me mother's full name, and thy own.

What is D. M. Bennett doing, and Abner Kneeland?

My questions are for this world, so I ask them in the hope of full replies for print. Affectionately,

May 5, 285. ELMINA (formerly Elizabeth).

REPLY.

MY DEAR SISTER SLENKER: In absence of the doctor, I come to say a few words to you which, I hope, may not be considered an intrusion. Had the doctor been present, or within my call, I would not hav taken such precious time. I rejoice to know you are yet seeking to know if one die shall he liv again. That was my life study; and radical as might seem my views, yet I was bound to be honest to myself. I gave this subject thought, and outside what I received through this source, I had not a particle of evidence that man or woman had a continued existence beyond the body mortal. I was Infidel to the popular ideas of another life, but not because I wanted to differ from the majority, or with my most intimate friends, but it was facts I needed—facts I sought for.

I traveled the world over to glean new thought and the varied experience which I gave to the world. Not one word embraced in my manuscript or book contains a word but is as true as though an angel wrote it; and yet how heavily did it fall before the world—just because it was truth!

Well, the truth moves slow but sure. My old pattern saint, Abner Kneeland, Jo Barker, and I hav often talked the matter over touching the present, past, and to come. Kneeland is the same—same stanch advocate for truth, as characterized his earth labors; but Jo Barker weakened a bit when death stared him in the face; but now is Jo Barker again, seeing as he does and seeing as I do, we were both wrong in our conclusions touching an after-life. Tom Paine is the same champion for truth and liberty as when died 1816; but he now, as I and Kneeland, does accept immortality or more conscious identity, beyond the mortal body. I see at times your mind-sky is beclouded with doubt—even with all that you hav received to convince you to the contrary; but, sister, weigh well what you receive, and among the much that may appear rubbish, you may find the real.

As to your ever being developed to the phase of materialization, I doubt it at your time of life; but slate-writing I am inclined to think you may, when you rid yourself of the doubt which has, and now does, trouble your thoughts. Yes, you acted honestly in your investigations, but yet doubt predominated, and thus the development was greatly retarded.

You ask of the doctor a receipt for the cure of that awful malady, c——. Well, if the old doctor was present he might giv you one that might eradicate that, if taken in its incipiency; but when the blood or circulation has become thoroughly impregnated with the disease, it is then beyond human reach.

I beg pardon for taking this time, but trust it may be acceptable under the circumstances. Can I be of service to you at any time, I shall be most happy to be so.

Kindly, DEBOIGNE M. BENNETT.

To A. D. SLENKER.

[If Mr. Bennett wrote this, he has certainly forgotten his own name. DeBoigne was the name used by the United States district attorney, who did not know the right one.—ED. T. S.]

Is Science Likely to Furnish a Basis for Religion?

This question has just been discussed by the Free Religious Association in Boston. If it could actually be asked of Science, she might very probably reply, as the man did who was asked if he could play the fiddle, "I don't know—I never tried." The history of the conflict of science and religion has been admirably written, and there will be more of it still to write. Individuals may try to reconcile science and religion, but one interest or the other usually suffers in the process.

Agassiz, for instance, would probably hav become a Darwinian if he had not kept a theological prejudice for the doctrin of special creation. The so-called Christian scientists could not seriously be compared with men like Darwin and Humboldt. Religion has always rested on faith in doctrins about which science is creating skeptics. What results science achieves are in regard to those things which we see and handle. Religion founds itself on theories about the unseen, the unknown, the infinit. Religion begins far beyond where science ends. Between them is a chasm which seems bottomless. Herbert Spencer's theory of the Great Unknown may bridge over this chasm for a few daring explorers, but cannot fill it up. How do we know that the Unknown is great? Why talk of the Unknown rather than of the Unknowns? It is perfectly possible that there is one Great Unknown; it is equally possible that there are two Great Unknowns, a good and a bad one—Ormuzd and Ahriman—as is still believed by the Parsees. Or there may be three Unknowns in one, as is held in most of our churches. Or there may be an infinit number of very small Unknowns, as was taught by Epicurus and Lucretius. Why trouble ourselvs about such problems, when we hav so much that is known, especially the known laws of morality, to love and live by?

F. M. HOLLAND.

Injustice in the Courts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A better sense of justice would prevail if articles like "Socialism to the Bar" in your issue of May 30th were more frequent. Your censure of Judge Van Brunt's conduct in the case of Justus Schwab is just, pertinent, and timely.

I voted for Van Brunt when he last stood for re-election. Notwithstanding his lack of dignity, and his utter disregard of the amenities which we hav a right to expect from a judge, I believed him to be honest, and thought he could be trusted to do what was right rather than what he might deem politic. My estimate of him was based upon the fact that when Mr. Edward Lange sued the infamous Benedict for damages for a judicial outrage as inexcusable as it was lawless, and as dishonest as it was atrocious, Van Brunt was the only judge throughout the whole range of our judiciary before whom the case was brought up who did not try to pervert justice and to cover up Benedict's roguery. I regret that I was mistaken, and that my confidence in Van Brunt was misplaced.

The trial of Schwab is one of a class of cases that are becoming too frequent, cases which are simply efforts to gain popularity by managing the conviction of one against whom the cry of "mad dog" has been raised, and which are in no sense trials of the question, "Guilty or not guilty?" Such a case was that of D. M. Bennett; such a case was that of Dr. Lambert, whose pitiful appeal for mercy was spurned by the judge who sentenced him, and whose conviction was reversed by an appellate court after he had served out his sentence; such a case was that of James D. Fish, recently tried before Benedict, in which Benedict's efforts to influence the jury cropped out in a harang about the sacred nature of the oath they had taken and the oath he had taken, and thus preyed on their ignorant minds, and unsettled their judgment so that he might gain the applause of the conviction. The New York Herald, May 16, 1885, prints a letter from London in which is this very suggestiv statement regarding the late judicial farce in England, the trial of Burton and Cunningham: "There is a whisper in legal circles that Justice Hawkins some time ago declared that he would try the dynamiters, and that his harshness is not unallied to personal ambition."

I might go on at length with the enumeration of such cases, but cui bono? I hav no sympathy with malefactors, but I say that if they cannot be proceeded against legally and justly, if it requires trickery and dishonesty to deal with them, courts had better be abolished. Our Western friends prefer lynch law, and I think they are right.

New York, May 31, 1885. ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Canadian Notes.

Last evening a pleasant gathering took place at the residence of Mrs. Scadding, Wellesley street, on the occasion of the departure for Chicago of Mrs. Elliott, the daughter of the hostess. Mrs. Elliott (nee Miss Ettie Scadding) was for many years pianist to the Toronto Secular Society, and leaves behind her many warm friends, some of whom utilized the occasion by making her the recipient of a number of elegant presents, as farewell tokens of their regard for the fair lapy's accomplishments and goodness of heart and for auld lang syne. Adieu and bon voyage.

On Sunday evening last a meeting was held of the Toronto Secular Association, at their hall, when readings and other exercises made up the usual weekly bill of fare. The society hav just brought to a close a very successful lecture season. The engagements comprised Watts, Remsburg, Reynolds, Burnham, and Putnam among the professional lecturers, and Cook, Risser, Harrison, Evans, Butland, and other Toronto amateur lecturers. The next season commences with the great convention of Freethinkers from all parts of the dominion of Canada on Sunday, September 13th, and following days, on which occasion Mr. Charles Watts will come to Toronto from London, England, to take part in the Convention. Excursion trains from all parts of the dominion of Canada will bring delegates and their friends to the Convention at reduced fares. In the mean time the society will continue their lecture season during the summer months by the aid of the Toronto amateur lecturers, Cook, Risser, Harrison, Evans, Butland, and others; and seeing that these last mentioned supplied the lecture platform every Sunday for ten years, unaided and without a break even for a single Sunday, it is confidently hoped that the summer season of lectures will prove to be a successful one.

The most complicated animal organism, such as that of man, is only a combination of an infinit number of single individual cells, all working together as a co-operativ community to accomplish one definit purpose. The theory of spontaneous generation was rendered easy of conception by the existence of organisms so simple as to consist of only one single cell. But easy conception has been carried further—next door to ocular demonstration—by the discovery of organisms even lower than single cells. The bathybius is merely a lump of mucus possessing organic functions. It has been lately attracting great attention, especially the Bathybius Haeckelii, discovered by Professor Huxley, and named by him after the great German philosopher, Ernst Haeckel. The scientific corps of the Challenger expedition found great numbers of these lowly specimens of animal life inhabiting the vast depths of the ocean. So much for the nebular hypothesis and spontaneous generation. Now for Darwinism.

The investigations of Huxley, Darwin, and others in the border-land of vegetable and animal life prove that there is no dividing line, and so also in the border-land of unorganized and organized matter there is no dividing line. It is an unbroken succession from unshaped nebulous matter to orbs and worlds, thence from unorganized matter to organized vegetable and animal life. It has been demonstrated by a multitude of proofs that with regard to the infinit variety of forms of animal life, from a simple cell to man, so-called species of which there are hundreds in one department alone—that of insects—there is no such thing as species, there is no dividing line; they all shape insensibly the one into the other through the whole series.

Haeckel and other evolutionists hav traced the gradual process of the development, evolution of animal life from the lowest form, the bathybius—which is lower than a cell that assumes organic life by spontaneous generation—through all the intermediate links up to the most complicated; one form springing out of another throughout the entire pedigree, by means of variation, descent, adaptation, and natural selection.

In the same way as the nebular hypothesis, spontaneous generation and Darwinism account in a simple and natural manner for the origin of the whole universe around us, celestial and terrestrial, animate and inanimate. So language, religion, the arts and sciences, political and social economy, the soul of man, the mind, human intelligence, hav been shown to hav been a growth, to hav been developed, evolved in precisely the same manner as the earth and other orbs, and any inhabitants, vegetable or animal, which may exist upon them.

As representativs of the various forms through which the evolution of animal life has taken place may all be seen in existence at one time in our day, from the bathybius, which is only a little lump of fatty matter possessing organic functions, up through all the infinit variety of forms and species, to the most complete—man. So what is called the human soul, or mind, or intelligence, can also be seen in the different representativs of the human family in the different parts of the world at the present day, in all the stages of its development, from that of the Digger Indians, the earthman, bushman, and other tribes of men scarcely to be classed as superior in intelligence to the lower animals, up to the enlightened European or American. In like manner the germ of every living member of the human family exhibits to-day the whole process of evolution of all the infinit variety of animal life, as it assumes in succession the forms of all other animal germs.

Toronto, June 6, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

Mr. Malcolm—Mr. Wood.

I was surprised on looking over my TRUTH SEEKER of the 11th to see that friend Malcolm, of Hutchinson, Kansas, had answered my short note of February 7th. I hav been so busy that I then first learned that my letter was noticed. Please allow me now to ask Mr. Malcolm why he failed to notice the question I asked and directed all of his answer to that upon which I placed less importance. Why does Mr. Malcolm take 1879 and say there was $683,943,799 in paper money in circulation, when the treasurer's report for 1879, page 115, says there was $346,681,016, while the debts of the national bank robbers, $384,-181,418, makes nearly the amount Mr. Malcolm ($683,862,434) givs in his article January 3d. But national bankers' debts are not money, and no law can make them anything but bloodsucking robbers' tentacles? On page 107 (1879) the comptroller of the currency givs the amount of real money in circulation in 1865, which the miserable robbers' tool calls debt:

Funded debt,	$1,109,568,191.80
Matured debt,	1,503,020.09
Certificates of indebtedness,	85,093,000.00
Temporary loans,	107,148,713.16
Five per cent legal tender notes,	33,954,230.00
Compound interest legal tender notes,	217,024,160.00
Seven thirty notes,	830,000,000.00
Fractional currency,	26,344,742 51
Suspended requisitions uncalled for,	2,111,000.00
Total	$2,845,907,626.56

This was money, more than twenty-eight hundred millions of real money in use in little more than one-half of the country. It was the life-blood of a great nation, and yet there was not enough. When there is enough money in use in a country there will be no debt, and if there is no debt there will of course be no interest drawn from the lives of the people, no slavery. The great war called the slaveholders' Rebellion was rightly so called. But the slaveholders were not in the war nor in the South. The men who are and always were the real slaveowners and slave-dealers liv in the great cities by creating debts and drawing interest from the slaves of debt, and friend Malcolm wishes to hav a real national bloodsucking banking system, with the amount of circulation fixed by arbitrary enactments, which is no better than the present robber system. We want no interest; we need to pay no tribute; we want real money, issued by government, and enough to put the people out of debt entirely and forever keep them so. I ask Mr. Malcolm to read the foot note in THE TRUTH SEEKER Nov. 22, 1884, page 739, and try to see the true inwardness of it. The money lenders of the world got up the war called the Rebellion on purpose to enslave the people of this country, and if Mr. Malcolm will read the report of the comptroller, 1879, pp. 107 to 111, he will see how the money-lenders copied in the management of this country from the plans that worked to enslave the people of the United Kingdom of England. By means of the Peninsular war the amount of money issued was $4,040,543,610.

History tells us that this period, from 1814 to 1825, was the most prosperous of any that England ever experienced, and those who hav lived in this country for fifty years know that the period from 1863 to 1870 was the most prosperous of any that was ever enjoyed since this country was settled; and yet no country ever had money enough in circulation, and so no people were ever free.

I must say that for a man professing to love liberty Friend Malcolm has the most absurd idea of money, as expressed on Jan. 31st, that I ever saw. A Jew pawnbroker could not beat it for a licensed robbery. Mr. Malcolm has very queer ideas of values. He says that money has no value, and in the next moment says that to double the amount of money in circulation is equivalent to decreasing the value of the money a man has, and to paying one-half of every man's debts. This is only half true; it would not decrease the value of the money anyone held. There is no purchasing power in money. If Mr. Malcolm will get his facts and fancies separated he will do better. He contradicts himself by proving that money has value, and when every day's issue of a daily paper givs accounts of murders for money of sums varying from five cents to thousands of dollars I can see a most unlimited and most damnable value in money, a value that Mr. Malcolm and every lover of his race should condemn and fight against. There is only one way to stop the murderous system. There is at present about three hundred and fifty or four hundred millions of money in circulation. There should be ten thousand millions. There should be no limit to the amount, but wherever any man could lend money and get interest there would be evidence of want of money. The world has been governed and enslaved by money-lenders long enough. They are to-day working to set the whole eastern hemisphere at war. All of the nations of earth are in slavery to debt, and all of the earnings of labor will not pay one-quarter the interest. And yet the press of this country is used to make th epeople believe that a war in Europe will be a great blessing to them. It is liberty that the people of this and all other countries need, and no people can hav liberty without a free money in unlimited quantities.

The last number of the American Nonconformist, Tabor, Ia., tells of one county in Kansas that has six million of debts, five millions of recorded mortgages, drawing over one hundred thousand dollars more for interest than the entire surplus of production in that county last year, and the debts increasing fifty thousand dollars a month.

Is Mr. Malcolm so obtuse as not to see the value of money in this county of the new state of Kansas? If money has no value, what is it that Secretary Sherman and McCulloch destroyed $1,808,000,000 of, and put $360,000,000 of bankers' debts in the place of? If destroying one-half of the money of a nation doubles the amount of every man's debts, as Mr. Malcolm says, will he tell us the effect of destroying $1,808,000,000 of the money in use in one half of the nation, only leaving about $300,000,000 for use in the whole country, and while studying it up, will he get and read "A Fool's Errand," and tell us if the destruction of that money had any effect in destroying over one hundred thousand lives in the South since the war, and many thousands in the North, besides the other thousands in prisons, jails, and workhouses, that would be at work if there was money, not bankers' debts, in circulation to put the people out of debt and keep them so? Debt is slavery, interest is robbery? J. H. WOOD.

Edgeworth.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is on a warm trail and after big game, when with a sleuth-hound like McArthur she hunts the Catholic church in Mexico. I was familiar, through the pages of Prescott, with the outlines of that cannibal story where the Holy Mother, seeing her face mirrored by the institutions, customs, and creed of a rich country, at convenient distance from the world's observation, is struck with holy horror at this ingenious imitation by the devil, and proceeds to wash it, all except the gold and silver, in blood, from the face of the earth. The logic of a systematic lie, which claimed the plebeian iconoclast Jesus, as the founder of Christianity and Lord of Christendom, denied to the Mexicans brotherhood in Christ. Nothing less than the sacrifice of their own flesh and blood was exacted for the sacrament.

They were too rich to enter the kingdom of heaven. This excited clerical compassion.

Mr. McArthur fills out the historical picture with able zeal. A good work, however, entails the intellectual obligation to other, and at the cost of exposing my own ignorance for the public benefit, I will ask the explanation of certain points which hav not been touched upon in the two papers before me. How reconcile the antiquity of many thousand years, ascribed to the Mexican records in question, and the origin of that people's faith, with what I had supposed well established in history, viz., the comparativly recent date of the Aztecan invasion from the northward, and its conquest of the more ancient Toltecan civilization? That the Aztecans, being imitativ, should hav soon learned the arts of their predecessors, who are still found in Yucatan and elsewhere, is less improbable than the complete adoption of their superstitions and devotional customs, and what is the relation of the Aztecan dynasty which Cortez overthrew with the mystical Quetzalcoatl, etc., of the ancient Mexicans?

Again, what is the relation of the higher and milder religion described as the old Mexican Christianity, and the sanguinary tiger-worship, whose altars reeked with the blood of human victims, and whose carved idols hav so often been figured in our antiquarian plates? Was this confined to outlying provinces and tribes distinct from Mexico proper?

The tragedies of Mexico and Peru add frightful testimony to the fact that the key to theologies is financial. Admission by the Spanish Catholic of true religious fraternity with the Mexican would hav withdrawn from plunder and its accesory, murder, on so grand a scale, the sanction of religious zeal. The true animus of the church and the nullity of its doctrins are here manifest with the exclusiv sway of personal cupidity. Slit the purse, suppress the tithe, and you disarm all religions of their mischievous power, you extract the fangs of the viper. Remark the correlation of the three imperfections of the Mexican Christianity as compared with the Catholic—suppression of the priest's fee for marrying, of the legal profession, and of hell-fire tortures. It would seem that some impression of the ancient simplicity remains. Stephens says of a Central American people, that since the introduction of lawyers by the Spanish authorities, they had been found such a nuisance that this people by common consent had abolished legal forms and reverted to the judgment of their differences by umpires.

The insignificance of doctrins, which the clerical brain spawns as easily as toadstools, and the fallacy of spending iconoclast ammunition upon them, while leaving intact the organizations of authority from which they derive all their power to hurt, is most salient from studies like McArthur's. Here we see how the very coincidence of faiths is a provocation to hostilities, for greed of power and pelf. It suits the church perfectly to hav the doctrins which She* throws out as a blind, made important as the subject of attack. The enemy's Freethought forces thus diverted, She can plot and plan all the more at her ease against our liberties and purses. Her faith, her true faith, and which events hav never deceived, reposes in the boundless capacity of ignorance, the insatiable appetite for humbug, and the willingness of slaves to enslave others. EDGEWORTH.

Guntersville, Ala., May, 1885.

*I write She with a capital S, as the personal pronoun for Church, as He for God or Devil. But this triumvirate, like Rome's, is but nominal. The church is, like Cæsar, all in all. Is it not illogical to honor the figment created with capitals, which we withhold from their clerical creator?

The Holy Ghost Afraid of Satan.

On Saturday last Rev. Rufus Choat called on me, and asked if I remembered his writing to me some two or three years ago to see if he could get me to giv the people of Orion a Liberal lecture. I recollect the circumstance, and that he said that he was a professor in the high school at Orion, and he wished to become a lecturer in the Liberal cause, and would giv his first lecture at St. John's if it would meet my approval, and if I would help him a little in the good work.

In my reply I advised him not to giv the lecture, as it sometime might prevent him from getting a position as a teacher. He said that after writing me, "the Holy Ghost got hold of him, and that now he is a minister of the gospel in St. Johns," and he invited me to come and hear him, and at the same time admitted that he would not be willing to attend one of my meetings and hear me.

When I consider that he, at the time of writing me, had no faith in Christianity, and was anxious to work against it, his conversion seems almost as wonderful as was the conversion of St. Paul. He says he is under the influence of the Holy Ghost, and always speaks from inspiration, whilst he believes that I am under the influence of the devil.

I kindly invited the reverend to meet me at our public hall, and we would divide the time and giv our opinions to an intelligent audience, and let them judge as to which one of us had the best argument. But the reverend declined a public discussion either in his church or in the hall, which fact, in my judgment, is a confession that he fears the devil through me would be more than a match for the Holy Ghost through him in the discussion.

The Salvation Army in our town keeps trying to drum up recruits, but the Holy Ghost is unable to protect the Army from Satan, so it keeps a police officer to arrest those who are not afraid of ghosts, and who consequently are disturbers of their meetings. M. BABCOCK.

Fragment.

Unfortunately for truth, hypocrits can fatten on falsehood. There is a class of them who make a fat living by teaching what they do not know to be true. They are well aware of the effect of outside appearances, and dress in solemn black.

"These blackcoats," says Alexander von Humboldt, "are the only persons of my acquaintances who resemble the chameleon, in being able to keep one eye directed upward to heaven and the other downward to the good things of this world."

And the great German philosopher said: "The pfaffen [pfaffe is a sort of generic and contemptuous term for any sort of clergyman] fear God less than other men do; they use him for their own purposes. Like showmen at a fair, they exhibit God for money. They extol him with absurd panegyrics; blow a trumpet to glorify him; wear a smart uniform in his honor, and all the time despise in their hearts the poor, credulous, staring mob."

The clergy charge people with Infidelity. "I, for one," says David Page, "reply that I regard it as a senseless accusation. If it were true, it is nothing that calls for defense, or needs any vindication. It is neither a fault nor a virtue in itself. Belief and disbelief are, of course, mere results of evidence or of the lack of it."

The Mohammedans call the Christians Infidels, and the Christians call the Mohammedans Infidels, but the truth is, as David Page says, "there is no skepticism so offensiv as that which doubts the facts of honest and careful observation; no infidelity so gross as that which disbelieves the deductions of competent and unbiased judgments."

Death of Mr. Leland.

The Liberals of the city were last week shocked to learn of the death of Theron C. Leland, the former secretary of the League. Though it was generally known that during the past winter he had been ailing, sometimes seriously, and that his general health was not very robust, no one, and least of all himself, had a thought that the first bright days of summer would be his last on earth. He had planned a trip to Minnesota and Wisconsin, to visit friends, and would hav started ere this had he lived. On Decoration Day he visited his wife in the country, returning to town Monday morning. During Monday he was taken with something like bilious colic, but remedies being applied, he was relieved and slept through the night. On Tuesday a renewal of the pains did not alarm his friends, but at midnight his case assumed a serious aspect, and physicians were sent for. Two physicians were in attendance Wednesday, but their skill was futil, and a gradual failing of the pulse and heart beat ended his life in the afternoon of June 3d.

Mr. Leland was born April 9, 1821, in a log cabin in the wilderness of western New York. His boyhood days were such as usually befall the son of a pioneer farmer. He obtained very little schooling, but was an omnivorous reader, and spent all his spare money for books. In his eighteenth year his parents placed him in the Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y., from which he graduated in three years with high honors. It was the intention of his parents that he should enter the Methodist ministry, but before he began that career he was engaged to teach school in a country district. Around his school dinner one day the lady with whom he boarded wrapped a New York Tribune, then recently founded by Horace Greeley. It contained one of a series of articles by Albert Brisbane on social science, as discovered and promulgated by Charles Fourier. He obtained the whole series of articles, and the pictures drawn by Fourier of a happy social state so filled his heart that he resolved to devote himself to studying and teaching Fourierism. He joined the movement inaugurated by such brilliant scholars as Dana, Greeley, Brisbane, Channing, Ripley, and Godwin, and spent the years of 1842–4 in lecturing in and about Rochester. This activ Fourier propaganda came to an end in 1844, and the last of the associations with which Mr. Leland was connected dissolved in the spring of 1845.

His social lectures had made Mr. Leland acquainted with Augustus F. Boyle, who was lecturing upon phonography and teaching the art to such as would learn. Mr. Leland studied with him three days, picked up the basic principles of phonography, and with Pitman's "Manual," the only instruction book then published, learned the art. In six weeks from the time he took his first lesson he began lecturing upon phonography. For three years he went from place to place lecturing and teaching. In 1848 he came to this city, and joined Andrews and Boyle in their phonographic academy, which they had maintained for several years on the corner of Canal street and Broadway. He there obtained the activ skill which enabled him to report speeches. He also became one of the best teachers in the country. He always remained closely allied with Mr. Andrews, taking much interest in the later developments of the Pantarch's ideas. Though remaining a stanch Fourierite, Mr. Leland possessed an all-sided and generous sympathy with reform generally. Naturally he was one of the early Abolitionists, and worked with them in many of their campaigns. In October, 1853, he reported the first National Woman's Rights Convention. It was at this convention that Garrison's nose was tweaked. Joseph Barker was about to reply to a speech of the Rev. Dr. Nevins, of Cleveland. Garrison interfered, saying, "Oh, never mind him, Brother Barker; he is evidently only a blackguard and a rowdy." In a few moments a brother of the clergyman mounted the platform and gave Garrison's nose a vicious twist.

In 1862 Mr. Leland entered the New York Custom House as shorthand secretary of Collector Barney. He remained connected with this institution under Collectors Draper, King, and Smythe. For four years he was appointment clerk, a position of great power and responsibility. During the six months' interregnum which elapsed between Collectors King and Smythe, Mr. Leland was practically the collector, and Congress made a special appropriation to remunerate him. He was Collector Smythe's confidential clerk, and Mr. Smythe often introduced him as the real collector. "Go to Leland," he would say, when his political friends applied to him for information or official action; "he is collector of the Port of New York." In 1869 Mr. Leland resigned his position and went West, receiving the appointment of official reporter in the Circuit Court of Adams county at Quincy, Ill. In 1874 he became private secretary to the president of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, a position he held for several years, and resigned to enter upon activ work for Liberalism.

When Mr. Bennett was attacked and imprisoned, Mr. Leland espoused his cause with all the ardor of his nature. Our readers will remember the fiercely sarcastic articles from his pen which appeared in these columns. In the rupture which occurred in the National Liberal League Mr. Leland took the side of the repealers, and performed herculean work in enlightening the people upon the real question at issue. Through all those stirring times Mr. Leland was in the front of the fight, and his services were of inestimable value to Liberalism. At the Fourth Annual Congress of the National League he was elected secretary, a position he held for three years, devoting his whole energy to the labor. With Mr. Wakeman, he conducted the League Man until its consolidation with The Truth Seeker. To Man he gave his whole time, teaching evening classes in phonography to support himself. After his voluntary retirement from official connection with the League he taught day classes. As a teacher of phonography he was, perhaps, the most successful in this city.

In respect to what may be called his religious opinions Mr. Leland was very peculiar and decided, but very little understood except by his most intimate friends. He was early emancipated from the old theological belief, and was sarcastic and sometimes bitter in his sentiment toward the church. With Fourierism he adopted a sort of metaphysical Spiritualism, which was, as he thought, scientific, and which was taught by Fourier, under the name of "compound immortality." This is to the effect that there is a spiritual or aromal world, which is the day-world for the human soul, and that this life is its night-world—its sleeping and dreaming period of a less perfect or less awakened existence; that the same individual habitually and periodically dies out of this world, which is a mere resurrection and awakening into a higher life—the waking, in other words, into the true life; and that the soul remains in that life twice the length of time that it has remained in this, when it dies out of that life and returns into this. The analogical reason why the life in the day-world is twice as long as this is that we giv sixteen hours to wakefulness and eight only to our sleeping period. Imbued with this doctrin, Mr. Leland, like the Swedenborgians, held a somewhat contemptuous feeling toward the manifestations of modern Spiritualism, the consequence of which was that he was felt to be an uncomfortable critic and hopeless opponent of mediums, and even popularly ranked as a hard-headed Materialist. While he took no pains to remove this impression, and his habitual association with Materialistic philosophers tended to confirm it, yet in fact he was the farthest removed from Materialism, and held himself to be more spiritualistic than the Spiritualists.

In literature Mr. Leland was very delicate, fastidious, and rare. He had a very subtle and refined wit, which bubbled up on all occasions, was irrepressible, and greatly appreciated by the few, but it was too subtle and refined for the many, the point of his jokes being finer than the apprehension of his hearers or readers; and the temptation to yield to the ready suggestions of witticism brought them forward in too great profusion, and seemed sometimes almost to unfit him for seriously treating grave subjects. Whatever he did was admirably done in respect to execution, and his intimate friends will greatly miss the manifestations of his elastic and buoyant spirit. Socially he was one of the most entertaining of men. His conversation sparkled with wit and genial good nature. As old age approached he lost none of the youthful impulse which inspired his efforts in the cause of reform. He was ever ready to hear new thoughts and to act upon those which commended themselvs to his judgment. His thought was only to realize, or at least to make possible, on this earth that felicity which the church says must be postponed to a period beyond the grave. The here was always uppermost in his mind. The prime office of man in his view was to beautify and adorn the planet, that it might be made an intellectual, social, and esthetic paradise, in which industry could be made attractiv, poverty eliminated, and every man and woman attain the highest unfolding which his or her talents and endowments would admit of. He was one of the most unselfish of men, working always for others more than for himself. There are many in New York who will sadly miss him. There will be a vacant place at our meetings, a missing voice at our councils, a tried and true friend gone. He was one of the patriarchs of reform, preserving the connection between anti-slavery times and the present. The past month has seen two of these links shattered, and it will be but a few years more before the younger generation of reformers will be without the counsel and example of the men who accomplished a mighty political revolution, and one of the bravest of whom was Theron C. Leland.

Work Done in Massachusetts.

At the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, held May 28th, F. M. Holland, assistant secretary, reported upon the endeavors made in Massachusetts during the past year to achieve the secularization of the state government. At the annual business meeting of last year the association directed its executiv committee "to labor in protecting witnesses in court from molestation on account of theological disbelief, as well as in otherwise secularizing the state." The persons intrusted with this duty presented to the legislature a petition asking for a repeal of the law discrediting Atheistic witnesses, but it was rejected by the senate. A petition for the taxation of churches was also presented, but this request was likewise refused. Two full hearings of the association's committee were, however, given by the taxation committee of the General Court, which were so fully reported by the press as to carry to those unfamiliar with the Freethought platform the arguments with which our demands are supported.

The defects in the Massachusetts Sunday laws hav also received the attention of the association, which finds that two decisions of the Supreme Court of that commonwealth are still in force—one preventing the collection of damages for fraud committed on Sunday, the other permitting anyone who purchases property on that day to keep it without paying for it. To remedy this the following petition is now in circulation in Massachusetts, and can be obtained by addressing box 61, Concord, Mass.:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representativs in General Court assembled:

Your petitioners, citizens of Massachusetts, respectfully represent that the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth has decided that "an action cannot be maintained for a deceit practiced in the exchange of horses on the Lord's day" (Robeson v. French, 12 Met., 24), and also that payment cannot be enforced for goods sold and delivered on Sunday, even though kept by the purchaser (Myers v. Meinrath, 101 Mass., 366, and Cranston v. Goss, 107 Mass., 441). To prevent repetition of such injustice your petitioners ask that a law may be enacted substantially as follows:

"1. The provisions of chapter xcviii of the Public Statutes relating to the observance of the 'Lord's day' shall not constitute a defense to an action for damages for fraud committed on that day. 2. The provisions of chapter xcviii of the Public Statutes relating to the observance of the 'Lord's day' shall not constitute a defense to an action for the value of real estate or personal property sold and delivered on that day and afterwards retained by the buyer. 3. This act to take effect upon its passage."

An association in activ sympathy with his, Mr.

Holland hopes, will petition the next General Court to amend the law against Sunday amusements. For his part, he proposes to see to it that steps are taken to induce the legislature and governments of towns and cities to enact measures looking to the emancipation of the public schools and the purification of the laws from all sectarian influences.

We cannot too heartily commend the association for undertaking this practical work. That its efforts will ultimately meet with success there can be no doubt. We, in New York, propose to keep this state up to the old Commonwealth, and shall, so soon as the effort would be effectiv, start the petitions here.

Bigotry.

The following is from the Independent of June 4th:

"In casting about for a specimen of Protestant bigotry, the Catholic Review found, as it thought, a good case against St. Luke's hospital of this city. A priest, twenty-one years ago, had been refused permission to see a lady who was a patient in the hospital. It is a very old incident, but the chaplain and superintendent admits that it occurred, and that there hav been recent cases of the same nature. He says:

"This hospital has frequently been compelled to deny visitors free access to our patients, sometimes on the physician's orders, and sometimes because requested by the patients themselvs to protect them from visitors they wished not to see, though, where possible, it has always been the rule of the hospital, in regard to religious ministrations, to act upon the wishes of the patients."

"He also says that, though the hospital is maintained by the charity of members of the Protestant Episcopal church, its managers always freely invite for 'private ministration any priest or minister' whom the patients may desire to see, and they hav never turned away a sufferer on account of creed or poverty. Of the 22,635 patients admitted to the hospital down to the present time, 5,736 were Roman Catholics. If this is a specimen of Protestant bigotry, it is one to be gloried in."

Yet for all of this, the Catholic Review need go no farther for a case of bigotry than this same St. Luke's Hospital. Some three or more years ago Porter C. Bliss (since deceased—his death occurring in the same hospital) was receiving medical treatment at the hospital, for which he was paying. One of his visitors was A. L. Rawson. Upon one occasion Mr. Bliss asked Mr. Rawson to bring him something to read. At that time Mr. D. M. Bennett was away on his trip around the world. Two volumes of his travels had been published. As Mr. Bliss was a Freethinker and a friend of Mr. Bennett, Mr. Rawson thought these volumes would interest him, and he took them along on his next call. The clerk in the office of the hospital asked Mr. Rawson what the bundle he had with him contained. Mr. Rawson told him. "Mr. Bliss cannot hav them," said the clerk. "We do not allow such literature to be brought into the hospital."

That was a case of bigotry, undefiled by a ray of common sense. St. Luke's Hospital receives thousands of dollars annually from the state, from taxes paid by Christian and Infidel alike, and the statement that "the hospital is maintained by charity of the members of the Protestant Episcopal church" is not the whole truth; or, if designed as the whole truth, it is false. It is, therefore, purely Protestant bigotry that would keep heterodox works from its patients. Christianity is a sectarianism so long as there is a single person in the country who disbelieves in it, and a single unbeliever is constitutionally guaranteed his religious rights as fully as the mass of believers.

Is Mr. Dana Sure Mr. Beecher is Guilty?

The Sun of June 5th has this:

"It appears that Mr. Henry Ward Beecher is delivering in Brooklyn what he calls sermons on the doctrin of evolution, and that avowed and able Infidel journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, speaks of them as follows:

"In the sermons that Mr. Beecher is now delivering he takes particular pains to declare that he is 'neither an Infidel, Agnostic, nor Atheist,' but he enunciates sentiments that prove him to be all these. He rejects the Bible, which constitutes him an Infidel; he spurns the orthodox Christian conception of God, for doing which he is an Atheist; he has created his own God, which is very much like Herbert Spencer's Unknowable, and he is therefore an Agnostic."

"All true enough, we daresay, but of very little consequence. What difference does it make whether Beecher professes any religion or none, except to cast shame upon that to which he pretends to give his adhesion? The preacher who puts on the livery of heaven while seducing the wife of his bosom friend, and who lays perjury upon his reeking soul when brought into a court of justice, may still hav the impudence to preach, but all his preaching is sham, and his discussion of divine truth is blasphemy.

"There is but one honest and decent thing left for Beecher to do. That is to confess his guilt and depart from the sight of men."

Mr. Dana seems to be very sure that the Plymouth pastor is a bad man. But Mr. Beecher's conduct has nothing to do with the question. The philosophy of evolution and the theology of the Christian church must be settled apart from any moral considerations, and upon their own inherent probabilities and such evidence as can be adduced in their support. Mr. Beecher's guilt could only show that Christianity does not restrain from crime; if innocent, this long-continued suspicion of him is a proof that the world does not regard a minister's position, or a profession of Christianity, as any barrier to the outbreak of a man's passions. However it may be, Christianity ought to go.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1.50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Editorial Notes.

C. OSBORNE WARD, the well-known Freethinker and Socialist, has been appointed agent for this state of the National Labor Bureau.

JEREMIAH HACKER, we hear, is again sick and destitute. Any charitably disposed person will not be encouraging worthless indigency by sending their poor offerings to him at Berlin, N. J.

ALEXANDER COLE, of Buffalo, offers in the Evening Telegraph to sell tickets to heaven at fifty cents each. "After anyone dies and returns who says the tickets are not good, he will get $10 and a new ticket."

WE wish our correspondents who feel anxious to further discuss the calendar conundrum would transfer their remarks to suitable halls, which can be obtained low, or to pamphlets, which we will print cheap. The circle of arguments, pro and con, has been run to the entire satisfaction of most of our readers.

MR. TUCKER, in Liberty, speaking of S. P. Andrews, says: "I hav long been accustomed to assert that his work, 'The Science of Society,' is the most important political and economic work ever published in the English language. It is a great pity that it was ever allowed to drop out of sight. That work alone entitles him to immortal life in human memory."

THE citizens of Brooklyn are groaning under unnecessarily heavy taxes, and the Constitution Club will endeavor to get the tax laws amended. One of the relief measures is to tax the churches, because, said one of its members, there is no good reason for exempting them, and they may, if forced to pay their share of the city expenses, become interested in having honest government.

THE Chicago Tribune says: "One cause of Ingersoll's prejudice against Orthodoxy has been said to be because his father, a Congregational clergyman, reared him so rigorously as to deprive him of every rational pleasure. The exact contrary is true. The paternal Ingersoll, of whom Robert was very fond, was remarkably Liberal, and on account of his Liberality was always in trouble with the members of his church and other Evangelical persons, who made him very unhappy. This seemed so narrow and unjust to Robert that he came to hate the name Calvinism and all its teachings."

GEORGE CHAINEY and Anna Kimball hav issued a prospectus of a new monthly magazine to be called The Gnostic. It is proposed to be published from Oakland, Cal., whither the two editors hav gone, their Boston enterprise not proving successful. We are afraid Mr. Chainey's friends are a little tired of subscribing for his various new papers, and we hope this will prove more permanent than the Independent Pulpit. The general idea of The Gnostic, providing it survives the prospectus, will be to instruct the people in Theosophy. Those having sufficient faith can send ten cents to The Gnostic, Oakland, Cal., for a single copy; or if their faith is very great they can send one dollar for a year's subscription.

THE following letter from H. L. Green appeared in the Albany Evening Journal:

"As has been heretofore announced in your columns, the Freethinkers of this country and Canada will hold their Eighth Annual Convention in Leland Opera House, in your city, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, the 11th, 12th, and 13th of September next; and I am authorized to cordially invite some orthodox clergymen of our city in good standing in his church to occupy the platform on either Friday or Saturday evening of the Convention, and deliver an address in behalf of the Christian religion, and I will guarantee that he shall hav the whole evening to himself, shall not be interrupted, and shall be treated in the most respectful manner, and shall be liberally compensated for his labor in preparing and delivering the address. Any clergyman of your city who will accept this invitation will please notify me."

As this Convention is to hold but three days, and as the speakers from our own ranks are much better worth listening to than any Albany minister, we think an evening will hardly be given up to the clergy. If the churches will put forth a representativ man to debate with Mr. Watts, one session might thus be profitably employed. But with Colonel Ingersoll, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, T. B. Wakeman, Helen Gardener, Courtlandt Palmer, Mrs. Krekel, and others occupying the platform, the ordinary minister would be a pitiful spectacle in the Convention.

THE Secular Review flatters us in this way: "Our old friend, THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, is pressing on to higher accomplishment under the energetic editorship of Mr. E. M. Macdonald. Besides playing the role of a popular Freethought newspaper, it poses as a literary magazine of Antichristian thought, and frequently contains articles which we read with pleasure and profit, and occasionally transplant into our own columns. The last issue that has come to hand inaugurates a new departure by resorting to the artist's pencil, like our English contemporary, the Freethinker. But, unlike the Freethinker, it seems to affect metaphor rather than caricature, and the representation of the modern Balaam's ass meeting the modern angel is excellent both in conception and execution.'

DR. J. L. YORK, as our readers know, is carrying the gospel (good news) of Freethought to the New Zealanders and the Australians. A correspondent of the Freethought Review, published at Wanganui, N. Z., writes of him: "An American lecturer, Dr. York, has been lately occupying the platform in Auckland, where he has delivered a series of lectures on Freethought and other subjects. The lecture on the Sunday evening I had the good fortune to be present was on the subject of 'Revelation.' The lecturer, with a sustained reasoning power not to be excelled, went on step by step, and with cumulativ force, to show that nature was in herself all-sufficient to produce the phenomena of man's experience; that it was contrary to reason to think of an external force to nature which contained within its mighty bosom all the potentialities of mind and matter. No mere sketch could do justice to the power of the lecturer, and it may be added that the style, while distinctly American, conveyed the idea of culture. Dr. York was at one time a Methodist minister, and is now a Materialist and a humanitarian—a Materialist in philosophy, and a humanitarian in those emotions and sympathies which are sometimes called religious feeling. I hav not heard any lecturer who goes more to the 'bed rock'—to quote a familiar phrase of our American cousins—of his subject than Dr. York, and this is the opinion, openly expressed, of the Freethought party in Auckland." This correspondent makes only one error—Dr. York is a Spiritualist. We are glad to note by other correspondence in the same journal that the doctor's audiences are increasing as he becomes better known, and that the Freethinkers of New Zealand are much in love with him.

ROBERT CUMMING writes to John Swinton's Paper that our old friend George Lynn, of Lockport, Ill., was the victim of a serious accident on May 16th. "While out riding, a bolt in the carriage thills gave way; the horse became frightened and unmanageable: the carriage was dashed to pieces, and Mr. Lynn was picked up and taken to his home, nearly a mile away, bruised, bleeding, and unconscious. The doctor reported 'no ribs broken,' 'no fracture of the skull,' and expressed hope of his recovery. His accident was a shock to the whole town, where he has long been a resident, loved and respected. Mr. Lynn was a radical Abolitionist, and did efficient work as a writer and speaker on that question. He was a fearless, uncompromising leader in those dark days. He was intimately acquainted with Henry C. Wright, Charles Burleigh, Benjamin S. Jones, the Carrolls, Coffins, Post, and others of their kind. He met in convention with William Lloyd Garrison, the Fosters, Chapmans, Fred. Douglass, Lucretia Mott, Lydia M. Childs, Mrs. Rose, Mrs. Francis Gage, Lucy Stone, and others. He was a friend of Wendell Phillips, who at the close of his speech in Joliet on 'Daniel O'Connell,' which, I think, was the last speech he made in the West, while talking over old times, clasped Mr. Lynn by both hands and exclaimed, 'Oh, Brother Lynn, there's lots of Abolitionists now, but none like the old ones.' Truer words were never spoken, and George Lynn, like Wendell Phillips, is 'one of the old ones,' who will wear the armor of a righteous cause and wield the uncompromising sword of Right till the night comes on and his work is forever done. It is reported that Mr. Lynn is dying, but I believe there's hope for him. The world cannot afford to part with such men. The old warrior will surely liv to do some glorious fighting yet." We sincerely join Mr. Cumming in this wish. But why did Mr. Cumming, or Mr. Swinton, suppress the fact that George Lynn is also a radical Freethinker and Spiritualist—as are nearly all of his old comrades in the Abolition war? Mr. Cumming, too, if we recollect rightly, is a Freethinker, an old friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one with whom we once crossed swords on the labor question.

Lectures and Meetings.

HELEN H. GARDENER lectured before the Philadelphia League to a large and very greatly pleased audience on Sunday, May 31st. She is at present in this city reading the proof-sheets of her forthcoming book.

BURNHAM WARDWELL spoke to the Constitution Club, which meets at 64 Madison Avenue, this city, last Wednesday evening. His subject was "Prison Reform;" the lecture being a consideration of the best methods by which to ameliorate the condition of prisoners, the insane, and the paupers.

W. F. JAMIESON will be kept busy in the Liberal lecture field this summer. He now has calls to deliver lectures in Sterling, Mapleton, and Good Thunder, Minn., beginning the middle of June. Some of the lectures will be given in a grove. Mr. Jamieson has addressed out-door meetings of from two thousand to five thousand people. This is the season of the year to use the "leafy temples." For lectures, address him at Lake City, Minn.

THE Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its next meeting in Musical Society Hall, Academy of Music building, No. 381 Milwaukee street, Milwaukee, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of June. Warren Chase and Mrs. J. A. Shepard are engaged to speak, and vocal and instrumental music will be discoursed. The platform is free, and an invitation is extended to all Liberals as well as Spiritualists. By paying full fare to Milwaukee, attendants on the Convention will be returned at one-fifth the usual rates.

Letters from Friends.

MONTEZUMA, N. Y., May 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, amount of one year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I also inclose $1 for myself, $1 for Mrs. Edward Ross, and $1 for Brother Charles Traver, to apply on Tent Fund of Brother Reynolds, which please carry to that account.

My disposition has been to subscribe more for the Fund, but in view of the fact that the expense incurred in getting Messrs. Reynolds and Remsburg here in January last (nearly all of which was borne by Brother Traver and myself), and the subsequent misfortunes befalling me, the $2 is all we can spare at present. It is accumulating so rapidly I am determined to place myself on record as a subscriber to a fund so important; and the benefits to humanity resulting therefrom are so many, is my reasons for hurrying forward this small pittance. My untiring efforts, and my purse—so far as I can—now and ever will be with you. Every opportunity is and ever will be utilized in diffusing Freethought views and literature—not even forgetting to add, occasionally, a new subscriber to the best of all papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your many readers must remember that Cayuga county, and more particularly that part in which, unfortunately, I am located, is the hot-bed of superstition; demons and angels clog the imagination and warp the brain with ignorance and fear. The united and untiring efforts of this class of so-called Christians hav been put forth to injure my business, crush me, and destroy my social standing, but with Ingersoll I exclaim, "The church can never crush me." It may temporarily do some harm, but it cannot be lasting. Good work has been done here, and it is beginning to bud, and will soon blossom and ripen. The inestimable fruit, Secularism, right reasoning, and the dispersion of the Gods will follow, and Liberalism will stand forth arrayed in all its beauty. Heretofore clogged and dormant brains now are beginning to inquire after truth. A Methodist Episcopal preacher was heard recently to remark from the pulpit, "The way they [the congregation] were going on, in two years they would not hav a preacher here." Lack of interest, large falling off in attendance (which necessitates a corresponding decrease in salary), church piques and petty differences are the causes. The effects are more Liberals.

A fanatical young convert had the habit, while at the hight of excitement in prayer, of screaming out, "Keep the fire burning!" So I say to you and all readers, keep the fire burning till superstition and ignorance are driven from this world. For me one world at a time, and that a happy, honest, right reasoning, humanity-loving one. EDWARD ROSS.

CARROLLTON, MO., May 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Several weeks ago I sent a copy of the accompanying letter to Mr. Horace Seaver with a request that, after showing it to Mr. G. N. Hill, he would be kind enough to giv it a place in the Investigator, but, for some reason best known to himself, he did not wish to do so, so now I herewith inclose it to you, hoping that you will giv it a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you do not wish to do so, will you please return it? I did not fairly make up my mind to send it to you until I saw a short letter in the "Friendly" correspondence of THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week on the same subject. Mr. Hill seems to hav strange notions in regard to the starting of his new calendar, and says he starts with the 1st of January, 1600, and in proof of this he speaks of subtracting 1600 from 1885, which leaves 285. Now, all this would be very correct, provided he had the required 1600 to subtract from, but the idea has never entered Mr. Hill's head that on the 1st of January, 1600, he did not hav any 1600, but only 1599. Mr. Hill and I hav had a long debate on that point. Among the many positions I hav taken the following is one, viz., that he must commence his new calendar with the first of some year and century in order to hav the last two figures of the new calendar agree with the last two of the old calendar. Mr. Hill says he begins with the 1st day of January, 1600. He does no such thing; it cannot be done and hav the figures agree with the old calendar. In the place of beginning with 1600 he begins from 1600, which makes twelve months' difference, but thus far I hav been unable to make Mr. Hill see it. I hav a copy of the last letter I sent to Mr. Hill. I may send it to you in a week or two, if you think this is worth anything.

I should be pleased to hav the address of Mr. Fred. Koezly, of New York. WM. BLACK.

CARROLLTON, ILL., May 5, 1885.

FRIEND SEAVER: I see in the last Investigator a few remarks of yours in regard to Mr. Fred. Koezly and Mr. G. N. Hill, concerning Mr. Hill's new calendar. Although I think there is not much doubt that both Mr. Koezly and Mr. Underwood felt a little mortified from what you said about discussing the subject of the calendar in the Investigator, still I am sorry to learn that Mr. Koezly felt so hurt as to stop the paper. I should write to Mr. Koezly in regard to it myself if I had his address, but so far I hav failed to get that. I should certainly urge him very hard to renew his subscription and help the dear old Investigator all he can. A more worthy cause could not be conceived of; a most noble cause, that yourself and Mr. Mendum deserve great praise for your energy and perseverance for almost half a century, and your efforts, I hav no doubt, hav and will prove a perfect success for the cause of humanity. There is no doubt in my mind but that Mr. Koezly and Mr. Underwood are correct in regard to the new calendar, and Mr. Hill is in error. Mr. Hill has got a strange idea into his head; he makes an entire failure in defending his position. He says he commenced his new era with and at the 1st day of January, 1600. A more absurd position could not well be taken. I was at St. Louis and attended the Congress in the fall of 1882, when the vote was taken on the new calendar, to see whether we should use the letters E.S. or E.M., Era of Science or Era of Man. I did not vote. If I had I should hav voted in the minority, for E M. was carried by a large majority. I of course considered that final, being the highest Liberal court in the United States, but Mr. Hill ignores that altogether and comes out with A.S. Well, just so soon as the vote was taken the idea entered my head about the time we would commence the new calendar—whether we would go back six weeks to the 1st of January or forward ten and a half months to the 1st of January next, which would make 1601, when one word from Mr. Wakeman settled the matter. Mr. Wakeman said that we must commence so as to hav the last two figures agree with the last two figures in the old calendar. Well, then I knew there was no other time we could commence only on the 1st of January, 1601, as no other would make the figures agree. But Mr. Hill flies off from that and says he will commence with 1601 in the place of from 1600, which makes twelve months' difference. But Mr. Hill don't seem to see that. Here are two or three of the positions Mr. Hill takes: First, that 1600 is in the seventeenth century. Another very absurd position, Mr. Hill seems to hav a great faculty for commencing with 0. I wonder if he thinks that at the time they commenced the Christian era they commenced the first year with 0? I think not; they had no Mr. Hill at that time to tell them that 0 was progressiv. When I ask him how many 0's it would take to buy a good dinner in Boston he does not answer. I know the question was rather a silly one, but I thought his position called for just such a question, and again when I ask him how many years there are in the present century after this year is out, he tells me there are fourteen. I knew when I asked the question he dare not say fifteen, for that would condemn everything he had said before. I hav taken a great many positions, and asked him why, if I was wrong, he did not try and drive me away from them; but that he never has undertaken to do. I hav insisted that he either drive me away from my positions or acknowledge his error, or publish the whole correspondence, but so far he has not done either. I am seventy-eight years old, and I still insist that if I hav to liv to be one hundred years old I will hav twenty-two years more to liv, Mr. Hill to the contrary notwithstanding. When he says there are only fourteen years more of the present century, instead of fifteen, and when I tell him there are just 584,400 days in sixteen centuries, and defy him to make that many days without going clear to the last day of December, 1600, he does not, nor cannot answer.

Now, Friend Seaver, if you see fit to publish the above in the Investigator I will be ever so well pleased, but if anything deters you from doing so please return; I will not tell you to stop the Investigator on that account. WM. BLACK.

ALEXANDRIA, MINN., May 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. W. F. Jamieson of Lake City, Minn., delivered last Friday evening the last of a course of five lectures at the Opera House in this village. That the people were astonished and confounded at the bold and fearless manner in which the truth was stated has been plain to be seen since, and during the week that the lectures were in progress. It is impossible for people to listen to Mr. Jamieson, and not think long afterwards of his clear-cut statements and his earnest manner when he is delivering them. To Liberals who are contemplating a course of lectures I would say, Get Brother Jamieson if possible, and you will not only hear a pleasant, earnest, and talented speaker, but you will become acquainted with a splendid man—one of nature noblemen.

A course of lectures will do good in any community. It will arouse the Liberals to renewed effort for the spread of our principles, and win from the churches their best supporters. In fact, the only salvation for the Protestant minister of the future will be for him to become a Liberal lecturer, and teach truth in place of superstition and error. Hoping that the time of all Liberal lecturer's may be fully employed, and that all who hear the truth as it is in humanity may become truly Liberal, I remain Yours fraternally. N. J. TRENHAM.

STRASBURG, ILL., May 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: There are a good many county newspapers that hav a patent inside which is neutral on politics, but stands by orthodoxy. Could not some Liberal journalist and printer furnish a patent inside for county papers, and in that way spread the light of truth and get the masses to reading and thinking of what is man's true position in society? A large majority of the people are Liberals, but don't know it. When I was a little boy, attending Sunday-school, I thought I was a Christian, but I wasn't. They told me God made the little birds. I didn't believe it. In fact, I knew better. I saw the little nest, the little eggs, then the little birds, and the old bird feeding them, and that was all that was necessary. God's service was not needed at all. A. YORK.

EDGEWOOD, MICH., May 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Do you believe in dreams? I will tell you of one I had a few nights ago. One of my neighbors was very sick, and the doctor said no human aid could reach her. The sisters of the church had prayed for her, and she had bid her friends farewell. Then she asked the doctor, who is a preacher, to pray for her, and as he got warmed up in the cause the patient arose in bed and shouted for joy. God had heard the prayer and she would liv. She is now all right. Now for the dream. I dreamed I walked the golden streets of the New Jerusalem. And I saw a great golden throne, and God sat thereon, and angels were upon the right hand and upon the left. I found that the description given by his servants was nearly correct. The sweetest music I ever heard from millions and billions of sainted voices, accompanied by as many harps, filled every corner of the sainted city. You may think that the city, as its measurement is given by John the revelator, could not hold so many saints and angels, but you must know that they were corded up as we cord wood, yet those at the bottom could sing as sweetly as any of them. And it came to pass as they were singing a sacred melody in high praise to God, that Gabriel came flying over the throne. And he blew a shrill blast upon his trump and all was quiet.

And we heard a plaintiv cry come up from earth to the throne of grace, and Gabriel spoke unto the Lord, saying, "Your son and faithful servant, Dr. Gulic, is praying for a sister who is loth to be corded up just now." And God put on his omnipresent mantle and immensity was filled with his glory, and I slid down a ray of light and sat on a cloud to see and hear what was going on in Lafayette, Michigan. And the reverend doctor said, "O Father, thou before whom angels and archangels bow [and he whispered, Here am I, my son], incline thine ear and hear my prayer." And the father inclined his ear and it covered Lafayette township. "Smile propitiously on us," continued the doctor, and he was answered back, "I am smiling, my son," and he smiled. "Hear our suplication, O father!" "Yes, I hear, I will smile; I will ha, ha!" And the people of Michigan, Ohio, and York state thought it was an earthquake, but the doctor and myself knew what it was, and the father said, "Be of good cheer, my son, thy prayers and supplications hav come up before me as a sweet incense and the daughter is healed Be ever faithful; keep in the straight and narrow path, for there is a crown laid up for you eternal in the heavens, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt nor thieves break through and steal. Ta-ta." I awoke and told my wife the dream, and it fitted the cure which is called a miracle here so close I shall ever believe in dreams hereafter, and I hope you, dear readers, will too.

TERRANTILER JONES.

NASHVILLE, May 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Our friend Putnam informed us by letter that he could not come to us on May 24, 1885, and to our sorrow we hav to forego the pleasure of hearing him and our noble champion, Mr. Watts. There are only a few here who openly express their Freethought ideas, while we hav hundreds among us who lack the courage and are guided by self-interests to play the hypocrit. Since May 10, 1885, we hav had a fellow here from Georgia—Sam Jones—who has been turning the heads of our religious people by preaching three sermons every day. His attacks are mostly made and directed against the preachers and members of the Christian churches, showing up all the different practices of hypocrisy and hollowness of the present church-goers. He does not claim to know much of theology, but professes to believe the Bible literally, using the most insulting, vulgar, coarse, brutal, indecent backwoods slang of the language of his native state of Georgia. He is a reformed drunkard and gambler, and delights to attack the liquor business. It is astonishing how the people of Nashville take in all his brazen assertions, and the thicker he puts on the paint the better our fools here seem to like and swallow it. There is not a daily paper here that has the courage to say even one word of criticism against his cruel butchery of the English language, much less than against his lying assertions uttered by him three times every day to an assembly of from 4,000 to 6,000 people. He will stay with us perhaps until June 4, 1885, and how many lunatics we taxpayers may be compelled to support hereafter as the legitimate fruit of his ravings and religious ebullitions, we will very soon find out. His method is to raise a good old-fashioned Methodist emotional excitement, and then, after he gets his dupes to the mourners' bench, to leave them to the tender mercies of our resident ministers, who stuff them with their old worn-out theology in exchange for the dollars exacted for the glory of God and the benefit of the sky-pedlers.

In one of his lectures on May 17th, he used the following language: "It is a good deal like Ingersoll, while lecturing in Milwaukee. While lecturing there there were four or five drunken fools who muttered in undertones when Bob would say anything pretty sharp. In his lecture Bob said, 'There is no hell, and I can prove it!' Of course that caught the attention of that crowd, and one of them staggered up to him and put his hand on his shoulder, and said, 'Can you, Bob?' and Bob answered, 'Yes.' 'Do it, and make it mighty strong, for about nine-tenths of us fellows in Milwaukee are depending on what you say."

Now, do me the kindness to show this to our president, Robert G. Ingersoll, to ascertain the truthfulness of the above stated episode. In connection with this, I would urge upon you one fact, and that is, that in order to pave a way to place Freethought in the South and at Nashville on the same plane as at Boston and other northern cities, it is necessary that such a man as our president, with his wide fame and national reputation, should come among us and deliver several lectures. He would commend the attendance at his lectures of the so-called Christian people. Many that are now afraid would come out boldly, and a good, activ, Secular union could be formed, and our cause would receive a large addition to its open and bold ranks. We hav had our friends Remsburg and Putnam here. They delivered us some very good lecturcs here, but the result has not been what might be and is expected by us if our president could be induced to come and to help us to break the ice of intolerance and superstition.

Yours, FERDINAND PFISTER.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., May 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me by return mail five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for May 23d, also five copies of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's lectures on "Orthodoxy."

I am doing all I can to help our grand and noble cause by reading, talking, and circulating THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, and other Liberal works. This place contains eight or nine churches, and although the oldest settled town in the state, it is anything but progressiv, so far as Freethought is concerned, the ministers—especially the Baptist—still harping on hell, the Rev. F. E. Tower, of that denomination, having made that the subject for his discourse a few Sundays since, when he proceeded to quote every passage, from Genesis to Revelation, that had any bearing on the question in support of his theory of hell fire and damnation, and, as one of his audience remarked to another at the time, he was full of hell that day.

What a pity that a man can be hired to preach such pure cussedness in an enlightened age like the present! Does he imagin people are fools to believe his insane ravings, bosh that no sensible person pretends to take any stock in? Shame on the man!

This same fellow paid his particular respects to Infidels last Sunday, and gave his congregation to understand that they were not making any progress against Christianity, and raking them fore and aft, he vented his spleen on them to his entire satisfaction and the disgust of many who listened to his senseless jargon.

The man shows his dense ignorance when he prates about Infidelity and Freethought not making any progress. He knows better, if he knows anything at all. It is so seldom that ministers tell the truth, however, that it is nothing to be wondered at.

Yours for truth and justice, A. L. FRISBIE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The papers you sent me were received and carefully noted. Thanks. Inclosed is $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial, though, should it fairly sustain the reputation given it by Messrs. Wm. A. Thompson, in No. 18, and J. F. Macomber, in No. 20, I shall find no cause to complain.

Being a new subscriber, it is probably in order that I should present a brief statement of my present position on the questions of God and the Bible philosophy, so that we may note the progress I make as a pupil of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It will doubtless suggest the probability of there being at least one live Freethinker who will undertake to defend the basic prin- of the Bible philosophy against all comers, whether Christian, Jew, or Mohammedan, or any other man.

It appears to be a self-evident and incontrovertible fact that all nature is instinct with life and intelligence. It is equally evident that this universal instinct, spirit, or principle of life and intelligence animates, enlightens, and governs all things in nature that are susceptible of its influence, and to the extent of their susceptibility. Therefore, I shall accept it as the God of nature and of the Bible philosophy; the God by whose power and presence we liv, move, and hav a being; by whom all things were made that are made, and without whom nothing can be made that is made.

The Bible philosophy virtually assumes that this God created man in his own image: In the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

"And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and hav dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the face of the earth, etc. And it was so."

Now, I shall accept the fact of its being so, as prima facie evidence that the God of Nature designed that it should be so, unless it can be logically proven that adaptation of means to ends is not prima facie evidence of intelligent design.

The foregoing probable facts may fairly regarded as basic principles of Bible philosophy, and should be accepted as premises to reason from when solving other relativ statements that we meet in the Bible.

They logically imply that the male and female of the human race were created at the same time, and that fruitfulness was enjoined with a blessing, if not as a blessing. Therefore it should seem clearly evident that the rib story was intended for a philosophical illustration of the probable scientific fact that the relations of the sexes in animal formations are analagous to their relations in vegetable formations where both are combined in one body. That is the logical import of the closing sentence of the story. Therefore, seeing no good reason for intelligent, fair-minded Freethinkers, permitting themselvs to be misled by the infamous blasphemies of a corrupt and Infidel priesthood, who make it a trade to pervert the Bible philosophy, I shall look deeper for the animus of their hostility to the Bible philosophy.

The fable about Adam and Eve being the parents of the whole human race simply illustrates the common brotherhood of man, as indicated by the natural law of our being. It appears that those relations are dissolved—and dissolution is death. When we hav ascertained what has caused or effected the dissolution of our relations and condition as a common brotherhood, and substituted the relations and condition of masters and slaves, we should hav an intelligent understanding of the logical import of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and shall find that woman was the first to partake of it; and her doing so will not be regarded—even by an Infidel priesthood—as discreditable to her.

It is a well-established fact that woman was the first to till the ground and claim the product, and logically the ground on which it was growing, as her own private wealth by virtue of the labor expended upon it. That claim involves exclusiv ownership, which is the basic principle of monopoly, and is the basis of our civilization, whose justice to our working-men having become a subject of discussion by clergymen of all creeds and denominations, I desire to giv them a few points that may be of some importance to them:

(1) I will suggest that the social question involves the principles of a common brotherhood; therefore it cannot be fairly discussed on a class basis. (2) According to Webster, and the usual acceptation of the term, all movable goods subject to commercial exchange are chattels. (3) Then, a price for a commodity should subject it to commerce and make it a chattel. (4) Man and his labor—or ability to labor—being inseparable, if we make either a chattel the other virtually becomes such. (5) The basic principle of our civilization makes it an economic necessity that man for his labor shall hav a price, and be a chattel slave. Therefore, our civilization cannot be just unless chattel slavery is just.

The dissolution of our relations as a common brotherhood being the only death that the philosophy of the Bible implies or takes note of, the restoration of those relations is the only resurrection it logically promises. J. A. TUTTLE.

NORTH LOUP, NEB., May 22, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5.00. Please send me two copies of the ANNUAL, and credit balance on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sorry I could not send sooner, but it seems to be a common thing for truth seekers to be poor.

Out here we are between two monopolies—the sky-pilots and the U. P. R. R. After they get their fleece the picking is close, and we are compelled to go slow. We are more favored here than most places. We hav two holy days each week. For the benefit of the Sabbatarians God comes into the valley at sundown Friday, stays until sundown Saturday, retires, and again makes his appearance Sunday morning for the benefit of the Presbyterians and other sinners that may hav been left out on the Sabbath. I was the first to break the sacred solitude of the holy Sabbath in the valley five years ago. The Sabbatarians hav exclusiv control of the hydropathic soul-saving system patented by John the Baptist, but since the advent of the railroad other patents and other holy days are coming to the front. The mass of the people here are of the tired jassack order that you so nicely illustrated in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hav some good and true Freethinkers here, but they dare not make it public. We need some one of our Liberal lecturers here for a week or so to wake them up and giv them courage to claim their own souls. I received a letter from Bro. E. C. Walker, wanting me to make arrangements for a course of lectures in our town. I canvassed the town, but could not raise five dollars. The cowards wanted to hear him, but did not want the church people to know that they had any such thoughts. Therefore I could do nothing, as I did not feel able to stand the whole expense myself.

Hoping that through the influence of such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and of our noble workers in the field, the scales of the old superstitions will soon fall, and that they will be the means of making men straighten up and be no longer the cringing jackasses for the chicken-eating priests to ride.

Yours always, A. Z. CULVER, Materialist.

CONRAD GROVE, IA., May 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue "Constant Reader" intimates that the system of a universal science originated with Mr. Andrews, and calls it Andrewsian. What does Plato mean when he says there is a science of sciences? I hav seen none of Mr. Andrews's works—if he has written any—yet I believe there is a universal science, and hav ever since I was able to draw a continuous chain of inferences. My belief, I presume, regarding first principles, is very unlike his, came from no one else, but is an original, spontaneous growth; and why not thus with Mr. Wakeman, who is accused of purloining from Mr. Andrews? I hav thus far never found anyone with whom I could agree, so what I recite is my own interpretation of nature. Emerson commends Plato for saying there is a science of sciences, but destroys its possibility by positing Theism, or a cosmic dualism, as a first principle. He says not more than a dozen persons liv at one time who read and understand Plato, but does not say whether he is one of these. If I am not wrong, he either is not, else Plato did not mean or understand what he says. If Mr. Andrews is really the parent of Universology he may be able to set us right. My belief is that matter alone exists. All other assumed entities are but attributes. It is infinit in age, durability, quantity, divisibility, compressibility—infinitly aggregativ and attenuant. Matter annihilates all space, and to create a vacuum would shock the universe and destroy all harmony. In cosmic unity is the only possibility of Universology. Were matter and force, or spirit, separate entities, we would hav general antagonism instead of harmony. It presupposes unlimited force for matter to exist. As the supposed atom is infinitly divisible, matter can only exist as an aggregation of unlimited aggregations.

The universal sameness of all matter can only be conceived far back of nebulosity, and were it possible to supply the conditions, we could extract diamonds from the atmosphere.

Evolution is better learned by deductiv than inductiv philosophy, and becomes as axiomatic as mathematics.

There is more to learn beyond the evolution of first terrestrial protoplasm, which took the combined forces of the sun and earth, assisted by the outside universe, millions of years to evolve, than is contained in nature since the era of spontaneous generation. Spencer makes a comment upon himself and his first principles when he attempts to draw a line between the knowable and unknowable, inducing the ridicule of all his contemporaries, who pose him as the author of the "Unknowable Philosophy," as compared with Plato when he said even the unknowable may be known. There is no limit to the possibility of knowledge, no limit to the variety of phenomena. Each effect is but a link composed of endless chains in an endless chain of causes, becoming itself a cause. Matter contains within itself as a part adequate susceptibility to expressions in millions of forms different from anything we hav ever dreamed of, seen or heard. Unlimited variety in phenomena springing from unity or individuality in matter is explained by the universal law of infinity. The same combination of causes can never exist the second time, yet it may be possible, by mathematical calculation of distance, quantity of matter and motion, to outline the types of life which perambulate the ring of Saturn.

Joseph Cook beats the atmosphere on the "naturalness of the frictionless," never dreaming that there is no unnatural and no frictionless. This is a dual nothingness worse than the creativ theory, and I can find no definition of reason wild enough to include his class of intellects; yet all such stages are necessary in the exposition of Universology. When we can compute the decreasing motion and temperature of the planets we can determin their age.

Aggregations of matter now in the center of the earth hav not only enjoyed life but hav mingled with Orion and traversed the Milky Way, and will again, and when we are sufficiently sensitiv to the laws of psychometry we may read the history of dynasties and republics beyond the planets. The earth is but a bubble in time, a phenomenon which will end in becoming a cause.

Pain and pleasure, joy and sorrow, balance and are as one in the evolution both of life and consciousness. The Optimist and Pessimist are both right, as all is the result of inevitable necessity. The only true physician is the pathetist or self-inductionist. The hope of the world is not in Universology, as that has always been, but in the evolution of an army of honest, vigorous thinkers and their unevolved microscopes.

GENELLI.

CARIBOU, ME., May 27, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a pretty constant reader of the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER (and speaker) for the last twelve years, and having never seen any report from this far-famed land of Aroostook county, Me., and having seen a picture of your face, together with those other thirty-eight bold heroes of Freethought in the ANNUAL last Sunday over to the house of my friend and your subscriber, B. W. Conant, I hav come to the conclusion that you are really approachable even by an humble citizen like myself. So I hav concluded to write you a letter, which if you do me the honor to publish, or if not, I shall not, of course, bother you very often. Some twelve years ago I procured a copy of the "Age of Reason," which I read with surprise and pleasure, laughter and tears gaining alternate victory. After reading that I gave up everything but God. And after reading Colonel Ingersoll's lectures, I gave that up. I grew up a Universalist, but I hav read many Infidel tracts and documents of various kinds, and like them first-rate—so well that the more I read the more I want to.

Infidelity is as natural an element to me as water is to a fish, or air to a bird. I am now almost forty-nine years old, and hav read so much Liberalism that I don't think I hav a neighbor that cares to tackle me on the subject. There are four ministers here handy, and my nearest neighbor is a very warm-hearted, praying man, so I am almost the only real outspoken Infidel in this community. I read with pleasure the writings of almost all of your prominent writers, especially of Mr. Peck where Talmage is under the hammer. That's a first-rate article.

I think every Infidel in the nation certainly ought to take your paper, because that and the Investigator contain the most solid, sound, sensible, scientific, and truthful reading matter of any papers that I know of. I hav long ago renounced and denounced the idea of any hell, heaven, God, Christ, Bible, devil, or religion. I believe they are all monstrous traditional myths of the most monstrous and traditional kind, and I thank you, sir, not any for me. If this goes forth to the world, may my love to all my Infidel friends go with it.

H. GILMAN.

WEST HOBOKEN, N. J., May 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I obtain Freethought documents and I cut them in leaflets for circulation. I hav received many Freethought journals and then distributed them, but your journal is the largest and can be made to reach the many when cut in leaves. Inclosed please find $1 for National Liberal League. The more I read your good paper the more I find myself free from superstitions. Oh, how I am filled with surprise to see the intelligent Americans in groups marching to worship my countryman, the Carpenter! G. YOUANIDES.

WE RECEIVE ADVICE.

SAN JOSE, CAL., May 30, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Oust that disgusting-looking "Story Hour" picture. Giv the ghosts and spirits Hail Columbia. Help Elmina and Truesdell fight that gross fraud or superstition. Help Otto Wettstein and T. Winter. Don't encourage dynamiters too much. Put more ink on your type. Do you hear me? Use coarser type. Hav the print plain, so an old man like me can read it. Now, if you don't mind what I say I shall stop my paper and break your whole establishment down so you can't do a thing. Look out for S. PARSONS.

QUENEMO, KAN., May 28, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to pay up arrears, and what is over credit on next year. I am truly thankful to you for sending as long as you hav, for I don't see how I could do without it, but I hav had a hard job to get any money. If you will forgiv me this time I will try and do better hereafter. I am a Materialist "of the worst kind." By that I mean I speak my sentiments wherever I am without fear of what some one will say. Let a man show his sincerity by his actions and dealings with his neighbors and fellow-men, and, my word for it, he will hav plenty of friends. Now, I liv near to a deacon of the Christian church, and his father is a preacher, and I hav had his corn-planter two years on what they call Sunday. I can work on Sunday when I choose, and he goes to his gospel-shop. I hav heard him say he wished it would rain so he would not hav to go to church.

I like to read the arguments of Spiritualists and Liberals, for I would not giv a fig for a doctrin that will not bear investigation, and I hav no fear of Peck or Winter or Elmina or Wettstein getting defeated. There are a great many books and pamphlets I should like to hav, but am not able at the present time to get them. I shall try to get enough to keep the noble TRUTH SEEKER coming. Long may it liv.

Yours for truth and justice, W. H. GIBSON.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., May 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars, which please credit to Mr. Peter Minkwitz, formerly of this city, now living at Hensley, this state. He is an old friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and paid my subscription for your paper last year. I now take pleasure in returning the compliment.

Respectfully, TERENCE O'DOUGHERTY.

BINGHAMPTON. N. Y., May 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I find myself at this date in this beautiful city. I say beautiful, for there are few places that hav more superb mansions than this, which has taken the name of Parlor City, and boasts of its stately edifices erected for "worship." It was here that Father Harrigan, after accepting an invitation from the Methodist brethren to deliver an address, stood behind their black-tasseled pulpit and in a blatant harang insulted the whole people; and though some fifteen years hav since passed, his insolent slang still remains upon the tablets of memory as fresh as if uttered only yesterday. Hear what he said, and then say if it was not an insult to every citizen of America. He said: "Every man and woman living together, not married under the rituals of the holy Catholic church, are living in adultery, and every child born to them is born a bastard." Yet the people swallowed it down with ease, for such is the kingdom of——I leave you to tell; I don't profess to know.

I remarked that this city boasts of her fine churches. I would add that she might boast also of her bar-rooms, saloons, grogshops, her halls of vice and dens of wickedness—rum and Romanism.

I want you to send me some extra copies of your "Modern Balaam." It is one of the finest representations of priestcraft that ever was conceived in the mind of man.

Receive $2 to apply on the glorious TRUTH SEEKER, and 25 cents for your ANNUAL. B. F. WARDWELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

South-wind.

Blow, south-wind, blow,
My love with thee doth go;
Blow soft, and sweet, and low,
Blow soft and let her know
I love her, love her so;
Oh, breathe it soft and low,
My love would say it so,
Blow softly, softly blow.

Soft kiss my mother's cheek,
In soft wind whispers speak;
Tell her 'tis I who speak;
Tell her 'tis I who seek
In thy soft breath to speak;
Tell her I kiss her cheek;
Tell her and let her know,
Oh, south-wind, quickly go!

Soft lift my mother's hair;
Soft kiss the dear face where
Looks out a beauty rare,
Soul-beauty, heavenly-fair;
Oh, with thy hands of air
Touch the dear forehead fair,
Touch the loved face and hair,
Lay, lay thy kisses there.

Soft whisper in her ear
When no one else is near,
Low, that none else may hear,
Whisper of me.
Oh! tell her, one by one,
Of the good deeds I hav done,
But let thy wind lips shun
Wrong done by me.

Call to her loving mind
Not, not the deeds unkind,
But, if thou aught canst find,
Unselfish and true,
That to her mayst thou tell,
Only that I've done well,
Mention not any ill,
This must thou do.

Irwin, Iowa. M. LOUISE BAKER.

Little Meta.

Little Meta, come to me,
Sit awhile upon my knee,
"Little sweetheart," don't you know
That I cannot let you go
Till from childhood's crystal spring
Waters for my thirst you bring?
Little Meta, come to me,
And my little "sweetheart" be.

Little Meta, on some day,
When to womanhood you stray,
Some great "six-foot," moustached man
Will outbid me if he can,
And I'll bet my newest shilling
That you too will be quite willing;
Little Meta, may he be Better far than I to thee.

Little Meta, kiss me now,
Kiss my lips, and eyes, and brow;
Once a little girl like you
Her soft arms about me threw,
But upon one autumn day
Linnie went with Death away.
Little Meta, kiss my brow,
No one calls me "mamma" now.

Little Meta, when I go
Where the sleeper resteth low,
When my race of life is run,
All its pleasant labors done,
Will your heart my lessons hold
As I now your form infold?
Will you love the good and true
As I love and cherish you?

MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

Crazy Luke;

OR, A HALF HOUR'S FROLIC.

"Yonder comes 'Crazy Luke' with his apple cart. Let's hav some fun now, boys, and get him to chase us around the square. Oh, we can make him so awfully mad! Come on, boys," and Benny Carter ran down the street toward a decrepit old man who was dragging after him a small hand-cart laden with apples and nuts.

Benny was followed quickly by four or five other boys, his playmates, all intent, not on bad behavior—though bad behavior it was all the same—but on having a little, as they thought, innocent fun at a poor old, half-crazy man's expense.

"Hello there, old hobblety-gobblety! How do you sell apples, hey?"

"Say, Daddy Long-legs, why don't you get a horse?"

"O ho, Shuffle-ty-hop, why don't you go faster?"

"I say, old Father Thump-cat, what's the price of peanuts?"

These and similar insulting questions annoyed the old man very much, for he was of an irritable temperament, and not altogether of sound mind.

In his youth his brain had been injured by a severe hurt, and although at times quite rational, at other seasons he was what is termed, silly.

He was known as 'Crazy Luke,' but as he was harmless, he was suffered to go at large, and the people generally encouraged his efforts to "earn an honest penny" in his own way by peddling fruit and nuts. Only a few thoughtless boys called him names and threw sticks at him in order to see him "get mad" and fly at them in anger. Upon this occasion, however, the old man did not appear to notice the boys, contrary to his usual custom. But as ill luck would hav it, a gust of wind, as though in league with the naughty boys, lifted the old man's hat from his head, and, tossing it into the gutter, danced it up and down, along the street, to the evident delight of his tormentors. It bobbed this way and that, and rolled along, while its owner made frantic efforts to recover it.

"Oh, shoot the hat!" screamed Georgie Kingsley, and, "Tip top foot-ball," cried Rush Davis, giving the hat a kick, which was followed by a succession of kicks by every boy in the crowd.

"Giv me my hat, you good-for-nothing young sarpents, you!" and, in endeavoring to reach one of the "young sarpents," an unlucky turn upset the cart, and the old man fell sprawling upon the ground, while apples and nuts rolled about in every direction.

The boys commenced filling their pockets and laughing at the situation of "Crazy Luke."

"Oh, I'll kill you! I'll kill you? I will! I will! I shall do something dreadful—I know I shall!" and the poor peddler scrambled to his feet, a wild light gleaming in his eyes.

The boys were uproarious, and began pelting each other with apples, and applying stinging epithets to the old man, who was fast losing all control of himself, and would, perhaps, in another moment or two hav committed some evil deed, but just then a richly-dressed lady came upon the scene. Observing the trouble, and quickly comprehending the whole affair, she quietly picked up the poor pedler's hat, and gently placed it upon his head.

Then she righted the cart, and commenced to pick up the apples. When she had picked them all up she said: "I wouldn't bother about saving the nuts—let the boys hav them. Here is money to buy more," and she handed the thoroughly astonished man a silver dollar. Then she turned to the boys, who with crestfallen faces had been watching her movements and remarking thereon among themselvs.

"Boys," she said, "I do not think you intend to be wicked, but you hav been very unkind, thoughtlessly so, I must believe, to a poor old man. You cannot realize how badly you hav made him feel. Do not insult him again, please, do not insult any one. And remember always that the infirm and weak hav special claims upon us who are strong and well. We should not abuse or injure the unfortunate and aged, for we know not what our condition may yet become—perhaps as pitiful as the most abject that we see, and let us not do to another the thing we would dislike to hav done to ourselvs.

"Now, my young friends," she continued, "I think you ought to ask pardon of this man for the trouble and annoyance you hav caused bim."

The boys whispered and parleyed among themselvs.

"I think we orter," said Benny.

"Yes, you was the ringleader," remarked Charley Brown.

"You go ahead!" said another.

"No, you go," and Rush Davis slid backward.

"Let's all go together, then," and Harry Brown, Charley's cousin, drew Charley along, while the others followed closely, and, boy fashion, rather awkwardly, they asked "Crazy Luke's" pardon not only for that, but for many similar offenses. He freely forgave them, and handed them an apple each, for they had silently unloaded their pockets while the lady was talking.

As she moved on, the old man, in a reverent tone, his anger all calmed, and all trace of temper gone, said, "Stay, if you please, a minute; I should like very much to know your name if you belong to the earth."

"Oh!" she answered, laughing a soft, silvery laugh, "I am of the earth earthy, you may be sure, but names are of little consequence. Mine is simply Adelaide Grey."

"I bless you, Adelaide Grey, now and always," and the old man's voice trembled. "When I lie down at night I shall go to sleep thinking of the kindness of a good lady, and, in the morning, the remembrance of her bright face will be a stream of sunshine that will light the whole day through, however dark and stormy it may be. And when I come to die, if I should meet the Lord, as they say I will, I'll tell him how you took my part, and I don't believe he'll be very hard with me when he comes to know that Adelaide Grey stopped to notice and help me."

"Oh, never mind about that. Take good care of yourself here, my friend, do right, and do not mind it when thoughtless and silly children seek to annoy you, and I think all will be well with you hereafter. Good-day."

"She has made me very happy," mumbled the old man, "very happy, indeed."

"Who would hav thought," said Adelaide Grey to herself, "that there was poetry in his poor, half demented brain. But I hav done him a good turn, and I am happy, too."

"'Tis a little thing
To giv a cup of water; yet its draught
Of cool refreshment, drained by fever'd lips,
May giv a shock of pleasure to the frame
More exquisit than when nectarian juice
Renews the life of joy in happiest hours.

"'Tis a little thing
To speak a word of common comfort,
That by daily use hath almost lost its sense,
Yet on the ear of him who thought to die unmourned
'Twill fall like choicest music."

Thus ended what the boys intended for a half hour's frolic, and all the actors in that frolic, if such it might be called, were made happier and wiser than before.

A Prize to Write For.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: I hav no doubt that among those who enjoy reading the sketches in your Corner there are many who could write stories as well as read them appreciativly. I would like to encourage such to exercise their talent in that line. I hav among my books Lossing and Spencer's "COMPLETE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES" from 1492 up to Garfield and Arthur, and I propose to offer this as a reward for the best story contributed to the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER say within the next two months; the story not to exceed three columns in length (2,400 words).

This History is in two royal octavo volumes, bound in sheep, and illustrated with steel and colored plates. The volumes are the same as new. They will be sent, all charges paid, to the winner, whom I will leave it to you to name. This offer is open to all, though I would especially invite the youngsters to accept it.

GEORGE E MACDONALD.

[We commend the above communication to the attention of our readers. We feel quite certain that there is genuin talent among our bright young friends, and we trust that this offer will stimulate its exercise, and produce an original story worthy of our columns. Write on one side of the paper only, spell and punctuate properly, and let the manuscript be free from blots or other disfigurements. Let each do the best he can, and not be offended or distressed if another can do better. We look for a lively competition for the prize. —ED. C. C.]

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—METAGRAMIC CHARADE.

The right hand and the left hand meet;
Within something clasped between they greet.
But now if what is in were gone,
And still three others added on,
But one appears who may be styled
Your parents' other female child.
But now the abs nt we recall,
Again clasp hands for once and all.
Alas, if there be truth in sense,
And all be not a mere pretense,
Of all our right hands we're bereft,
For all that we hav left is left

REKAB SEMAJ.

2.—A CHARADE.

I'll just take a look
In Webster's big book
For charade to see how he derives it
And so I find out
Beyond any doubt
'Tis a "cart-load," no matter who drives it.
But this is so small,
Four grains, that is all,
From a bean, or a pea-pod we make it.
The vehicle part
Is three fourths of a cart;
For a team, genus mus, we must take it.
And now, 'pon my soul,
I think that my whole
Marked Aaron's gold calf with divine-ness;
At least what they stole,
Those Hebrews of old,
You may safely be told,
Was honestly gold;
And the calf was no "pinch-beck" for fineness.
So if there was fraud
It was not with that "Gawd,"
If it fashioned itself without mould
And the word says when Moses began to scold,
Poor Aaron replied to his chaff;
"I but cast the old gold in the fire
And behold you! it came forth a calf,"
But Aaron perhaps was a liar.

SOLUTION OF POOL'S SHELL-LESS PROBLEM.

Rearward ten miles the general rides
To where army's foot shall fall.
Forward twenty-five miles, he goes besides,
To head of column, no shell at all!
Ten plus twenty-five, givs "forward and back
Thirty-five miles, and no nut to crack.

PROSE POEMS
And Selections,
BY
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph facsimile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50

"'Little Lessons' are grand. I hashed and rehashed the lesson on spiders this evening in the Sunday-school. I am running two Sunday-schools. The children are slow in learning the mystery of the God-head; in comprehending the Trinity; but their eyes brighten and they take kindly to discourses on snails, toads, spiders, and lizards, so I think I'll keep it up."—Bertie Slenker.

La Roy Sunderland.

In the last few years the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers hav become well acquainted with La Roy Sunderland. His recent death (May 15th) has been the occasion of an acrimonious review of his life in the columns of the official organ of the Methodist church, the Christian Advocate. But, for the life of us, we cannot see upon what the lamentations contained therein are founded, except that Mr. Sunderland came to realize how great a fraud is Christianity, and boldly said so.

The important events in Mr. Sunderland's career are briefly stated in the review, and every incident is favorable to his honor, his humanity, his ability. Mr. Sunderland became a Methodist minister in 1823, and in the following twenty years almost rent the northern Methodist church in twain on the question of slavery. He forced that church to take an official stand against the Abolitionists, and thus put it before the world in its true light as a friend of slavery.

The Advocate givs Mr. Sunderland's history as follows:

I.

The first Methodist Antislavery society was formed October, 1834, at the house of N. Dunn, 73 Leonard street, in this city. La Roy Sunderland presided at the meeting. The next was formed by members of the New England Conference in June, 1835, and another was formed by members of the New Hampshire Conference about the same time. In less than a year after the American Antislavery Society was formed, great excitement was produced in the Methodist Episcopal church by the publication of an "Appeal" to Methodists against slavery, signed by ministers of New England. The "Appeal" was published in December, 1834. It was written by La Roy Sunderland.

So intense was the excitement caused by it that a "Counter Appeal" was written by Dr. D. D. Whedon, who still survives, then professor in Wesleyan University, and signed by Wilbur Fisk and others. To say that Dr. Whedon wrote the "Counter Appeal" is to say that it was written with great ability. We do not express any opinion as to which was right, but record two facts, namely, that La Roy Sunderland subjected the "Counter Appeal" to a critical investigation, replied to it with equal ability, and that the force of the original "Appeal" in New England was not broken. As the Christian Advocate and Journal at that time was held by Abolitionists to be opposed to "Abolitionism," La Roy Sunderland came to this city and on Jan. 1, 1836, began as editor, under the auspices of "The New York Wesleyan Society," the publication of Zion's Watchman, an organ of Abolitionism. This caused much agitation here, and the paper was continued for seven years. It is impossible to coolly read (as we hav done) the controversies of those days and not feel that Mr. Sunderland was equal in ability to any who contended with him.

The first Methodist Antislavery Convention in New England was held Oct. 25, 1837. Of that Convention La Roy Sunderland and James Porter (still living), with two others, were secretaries. May 2 and 3, 1838, a great convention was held in Utica, N. Y., of which La Roy Sunderland and James Porter were secretaries. At that convention Luther Lee, D.D. (still living), delivered an address.

In 1841 the anniversary of the American Wesleyan Antislavery Society was held in Albany, N. Y. Cyrus Prindle (still living) presided. La Roy Sunderland was appointed delegate to the first convention in the West, held at Cincinnati; also to the World's Convention in London, 1843.

In the General Conference of 1836, to suppress Mr. Sunderland, who was a superannuated preacher, on motion of N. Bangs a committee was appointed to inquire "where superannuated preachers should be made responsible when living out of the bounds of the Conference to which they belong." The committee recommended their trial "by a council called by the presiding elder in whose district they might reside, which council should hav power to suspend them till the next conference." In June of the same year the New York Conference by resolution condemned Zion's Watchman. In July, 1836, at the New England Conference, J. W. Hardy, of that conference, presented charges against La Roy Sunderland of "misrepresentation and slander." Nathan Bangs appeared as prosecutor. The trial took place before the whole conference. Mr. Sunderland was acquitted by a vote of exactly two-thirds, namely 42 to 21.

The next year the New England Conference met at Nantucket, and Nathan Bangs appeared there, and himself presented and prosecuted two charges against La Roy Sunderland: (1) Slander); (2) falsehood. The defendant was triumphantly acquitted. But at the next session, in Boston, June 1838, an opponent still more formidable appeared—Bishop Hedding, who brought a bill of five charges against him. One specification was sustained, based on a publication by the editor of Zion's Watchman of a letter by George Storrs. Every other was decided in the negativ. And on the final vote on every charge La Roy Sunderland was acquitted by a large majority. So incensed was Bishop Hedding that he threatened the New England Conference that he would bring the matter up in the General Conference, which he did.

In 1839 the New York Conference adopted a memorial against Mr. Sunderland, and appointed Nathan Bangs and Francis Hodgson a committee to present it to the New England Conference. In his defense Mr. Sunderland exhibited transcendent ability, speaking with a logic and power quite unparalleled, analyzing the evidence, and the following verdict was passed by the committee and adopted by the Conference: "That the Rev. La Roy Sunderland be, and he hereby is, acquitted on the charge preferred against him by the New York Annual Conference, and that, therefore, his character pass." Timothy Merritt, one of our predecessors in the editorship of this paper, and James Porter, were on this committee.

Eight months afterward he was suspended by certain elders of the New York Conference, under the curious provision previously spoken of, but at the next session of the New England Conference at Lowell, July, 1840, the proceedings were declared null and void.

At this Conference, however, he was charged with having slandered Bishop Soule by saying that a piece of poetry about him was true. But the charge of immorality based upon it was voted down. The penalty was that he should publish that vote disapproving of the remark "in Zion's Watchman without note or comment."

On another occasion in this state La Roy Sunderland was tried in the civil courts for slander, growing out of charges he had made against men in office. The prejudices of judge and jury were all against him. But such was the power of his speech in defense, and such his ability in cross-examining the witnesses, that the judge had to warn the jury against his mysterious influence, but he was promptly acquitted.

As a student of Methodist and American history, years ago, the writer read these proceedings, not only in general, but in detail. These controversies are long since past. Their cause—slavery—disappeared in blood and fire. This review is designed to give some idea of the personal and intellectual power of the man who could meet and prevail against such opponents as all the bishops, the New York Conference, and in direct conflict over Bishop Soule, Bishop Hedding, Nathan Bangs, and Francis Hodgson. When was the same man tried and acquitted at four successiv conferences? When were such forces arrayed against one? Never in Methodism, North or South, Europe or America. It would hav been remarkable if he had not been crushed, even though innocent; if guilty, amazing.

In another article we shall show how La Roy Sunderland came to renounce Christianity, mention some extraordinary incidents in his life, trace his deplorable plunge, not only into Infidelity, but into the depths of blasphemy, and giv an account of his attempt to convert the writer to his way of thinking, with some facts about his last years.

II.

Some historic facts are necessary to prepare the way to an understanding of his course. The bitterness with which he was pursued; the acerbity with which he resisted; the continued strain to which he was subjected; his intercourse with a number of skeptics and open Infidels who sympathized with him on the subject of slavery, and with men like William Lloyd Garrison, Henry C. Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Stephen S. Foster, and others who, having been Christians in the beginning, as the controversy between them and leading ministers became more malignant and personal, either partly (and in the estimation of the public wholly) rejected Christianity, as Garrison, or did entirely reject it, as Elizur Wright and Parker Pillsbury, formerly a Congregational minister (both of whom are still living), had much to do with preparing him to renounce the church and, finally, the gospel itself. But the chief cause was not any nor all of these.

Having read the writings of Mr. Sunderland upon a great variety of subjects, met so many of his former associates in the church, and heard in New England such extraordinary accounts of his powers and peculiarities, the writer some years ago went to see him, and had an interview of several hours, devoted entirely to conversation upon his mental exercises, on the subject of religion and certain occult doctrins of human nature, Spiritualism, somnambulism, morbid states of health, hygiene, etc., to which his writings hav been devoted. From his own lips we heard the tale delivered with a strange and weird power, and often he was in tears. For the aged man, deaf and lame, rose to his feet and, with the air of one addressing a large audience, but unconscious of their presence, narrated, argued, illustrated, and explained and appealed. Subsequently he sent us all his writings on Christianity, with passages which he considered unanswerable marked.

Excepting his deafness and lameness, he was the best preserved man, intellectually and physically, that we hav met. "His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

His head was covered with beautiful iron-gray hair, which stood as erect as that of Andrew Jackson; his eye peculiarly black and bright; his nervous force, in speaking, of the greatest and most sustained intensity. He then said that he expected to live twenty years, that he had not a symptom of disease, and slept like a child upon its mother's breast. His hight was less than five feet four inches.

When Mr. Sunderland entered the ministry, Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian (in the South) revivals—as Congregational in the time of Jonathan Edwards had been—were generally accompanied by great nervous spasms. These still prevail among the colored people, except the more self-contained, and occasionally reappear among whites. In the beginning of this century the Cumberland Presbyterians had them, and Lorenzo Dow says that, after passing through the grove where one of their camp-meetings had been held, "he noticed the large number of saplings from which the bark had been denuded by those who had the jerks holding them to prevent their spasms." They also had the "rolling exercise," head and heels together, moving like a wheel, and the "spinning exercise," when women "would spin around like a top, with such velocity that their long hair would fly out at right angles from the head," and the "barking exercise," etc., running and yelping like a dog. Such performances greatly puzzled John Wesley and Jonathan Edwards, as we learn from their writings. These great men would not hav been as much perplexed if they had known what modern travels and telegraphic and newspaper correspondence make it possible to know—that such phenomena are common to all religions, true and false, to Spiritualism, to masses of men on the field of battle, to panics of every kind, and that in certain conditions they may appear sporadically.

These things were common when La Roy Sunderland entered the ministry. Under the first sermon he ever preached, June 9, 1823, the entire audience was "struck down by the power of God," as it was called—entranced upon the floor. Ever afterward when he preached with reference to the awakening of sinners such phenomena, more or less, appeared. The people were afraid to go to hear him, yet could not keep away. The "fathers" in New England hav told us of these things. As Mr. Sunderland grew more analytical, and was absorbed in other things—that is, as he gave his energies chiefly to the slavery question and to controversy—be began to inquire into these phenomena.

In 1836 Monsieur Poyen came to this country from Paris, and created much excitement by lecturing on Mesmerism. Mr. Sunderland went to see him, and began to study the subject, and soon found that he could equal the Frenchman. What transpired afterward we giv in his own words to the writer:

"It so happened that at 131 Varick street, where my family lived, I had a visit from two Methodist friends, the Rev. C—— M—— and his wife. I recognized her as one of my 'converts' who had been entranced under a sermon I had preached in 1824. Hence, when the opportunity came, I asked Mrs. M—— if she had heard of M. Poyen and the entrancement of Miss Gleason? 'Oh, yes,' she said; 'and I hav often been entranced in the same way by my husband.' At this statement I was much surprised, and said to her that I would feel much obliged if she would allow me to see her in that state. Whereupon she immediately complied, and, leaning back in her chair, she closed her eyes in a state of trance. In a few moments she appeared to be in a state of ecstatic joy, when she grasped my hand and said: 'O Brother Sunderland, this is the happiest state I was ever in. It is heaven. And do you remember how I went into this state under that powerful sermon you preached in our church in Scituate Harbor years ago? I was then "'caught up to paradise,'" as St Paul was, and where I saw Jesus and all the angels so happy. Yes, Brother Sunderland, and this is the same heaven—the same as when my soul was converted and filled with the love of God.'"

Mr. Sunderland concluded that if all this could happen, then all conversion and all revelation might be a myth, and attempted to account for Christianity on natural principles.

He made the mistake of confounding the accidental with the fundamental. The fundamental elements in Christianity are doctrins of God and Christ—immortality, the moral law, the Sermon on the Mount, and the permanent and radical effects on the character made by belief in and practice of them. These are seen in countless multitudes where no trances or nervous spasms occur; and the trances hav occurred, and do to this day, in innumerable instances among the heathens, the Mohammedans, the more fanatical of the Jews, and among the less disciplined, and may by contagion extend to the most highly educated, and among the colored people of the South, where no change of character occurs at all. In some countries hundreds and thousands of Roman Catholics succumb to their influence, and in Russia they are common.

Not at once did La Roy Sunderland reach this conclusion, but as his own personal religion declined, and he gave up prayer and other religious exercises, he came to it. He now entered upon a career as a public lecturer, and attracted great attention. Thousands crowded to hear him in Boston, Springfield, and elsewhere. Mr. Sunderland was, without exception, the most remarkable lecturer upon what was known as magnetism, or mesmerism, and the most successful in his experiments of all who appeared before him or who hav appeared since in this country. Having great powers as an orator, he was more successful, also, in experiments than any other. He had the following controversy with John Brown, afterward at Harper's Ferry. On one occasion, when lecturing in a city in Massachusetts, he placed a young lady in a trance state, in which she endured, did, said, and acted many things to the astonishment of the entire audience. At the close of some of her most amusing performances Mr. Sunderland said: "Some persons think that this is the result of fraud or collusion, and is done because of the strong will and determination of the person. If there is any body in this house who thinks so, let him or her come upon the platform and submit to the tests of strength or endurance which this young woman will bear." John Brown arose.

"I believe," he said, "I believe she knows what she is about; and whatever she can do I can do."

"Come up on the platform," said Mr. Sunderland. Brown, with the same determination with which he afterward walked to the gallows, ascended the platform. "Bare your chest," said Sunderland. He did so. The young woman also loosened the upper part of her raiment. Sunderland took cowhage, whose common name is "cow-itch," and rubbed it all over the upper part of the girl's chest and neck until the skin turned almost as red as fire. She seemed asleep. It was obvious that her suffering must hav been awful if she felt at all. The audience applauded. Said John Brown: "Proceed; I am ready." Mr. Sunderland rubbed his chest all over until it was scarlet, and he never flinched. The applause of the audience was long and loud. Then Mr. Sunderland placed at the nostrils of the young woman a bottle of the most powerful spirits of ammonia. She took three long, deep inspirations, and remained unmoved.

"Bring on your bottle," said John Brown.

At the first inhalation he burst into the a paroxysm of sneezing and coughing, which compelled him to hasten to his seat. He subsequently confessed to our informant that he could hav borne any amount of pain without flinching, but that "cut him loose from the foundation."

Of Mr. Sunderland this may be said—he alone, of all the men of his time, mastered the real cause of these phenomena, repudiating the absurdity of "will power," and the mythical "animal magnetism."

Not one idea did the late Dr. G. M. Beard set forth on these subjects that this man had not declared before Dr. Beard was out of his cradle.

Alas that this eagle intellect should hav sunk, not only into Infidelity, but into the lowest forms of blasphemy. We quote from a work which he published in 1883, and which he sent to the writer as his last utterance upon this subject.

That barbarian book, that claims to be
A "holy revelation" or decree,
Made in our humanity's early dawn;
As to Omniscience of a virgin born,
And as to what a "holy spirit" said
When it "overshadowed" a Jewish maid—
She was "God's" mother, by the "Holy Ghost,"
And of all the thunders, this excites the most.
In the Christian arch this is the "keystone;"
The Christian's only hope, and telephone!
. . . . . .
In this way "faith" makes the "evidence" right,
When the invisibles appear in sight!
"The clouds then disperse, and all the doubts fly,
And God himself is seen by mortal eye.
. . . . . .
That same beast this myth spoke to Balaam through,
As in Balaam's journey, it came to pass,
When this myth spoke, and "ass intoned to ass."

The last words he ever uttered to the writer were as follows: The writer said to him:

"Mr. Sunderland, many men who hav renounced Christianity, as they approached the close of life, hav come back to the faith of former days, called upon God for mercy, and died professing to hav found it."

"Yes," said Mr. Sunderland, "in old age, when the mind begins to break up, such things happen; but whatever may happen to me, I think I shall be able to hold myself steady. I now know and hav believed for forty years that Christianity is a fraud."

The memory of the poor old man whose wife had left him a quarter of a century before; who was cut off by his deafness from much intercourse with his fellow-men; who had once been a powerful and consoling preacher of the gospel, and whose eyes filled with tears as he spoke of his early associates and of a daughter who had died; who yet had no communion with any other mind than his own, and was advancing to the grave without a ray of light from any authentic source, remains as a warning to all not to reject the "True Light" for the vain imaginations or the inferences of the "natural man." "Let me" [not] "die the death of" [La Roy Sunderland] "and let" [not] "my last end be like his."

Now what is there in that career that calls for hypocritical cant about Mr. Sunderland's "deplorable plunge, not only into Infidelity, but into the depths of blasphemy?" Was he a worse man after this than before? Giving the writer of the articles credit for being sincere in his Methodism, what is there but a difference of opinion between him and Mr. Sunderland? And will Dr. Buckley acknowledge it is Christian ethics to abuse a man simply because he does not believe as true what he has the best of reasons for knowing to be a monstrous imposition? Infidelity cares not a pin for these slurs, for its opposition to the religious scheme that is weighing our people down as though a millstone were about their necks is founded on love of liberty and the progression of knowledge. And could La Roy Sunderland read these articles he would be the least disturbed of all.

"A REMARKABLE BOOK," says Dr. EADON, of Edinburgh, Scotland; a graduate of three universities, and retired after 50 years' practice, he writes: "The work is priceless in value, and calculated to regenerate society. The Missing Link —IN— MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. When THE RISING SUN OF SCIENCE shall illuminate the universe, THE BURNING TORCH OF REASON shed its beneficent light into every household, when FREETHOUGHT shall be demanded by and conceded to every man and woman—then, and not till then, will humanity attain that benign condition of utopian bliss, which heretofore they have sought only beyond the skies.

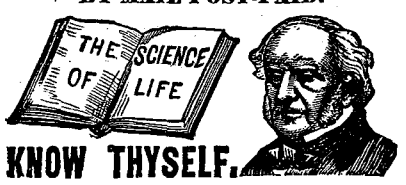
DESCRIPTION:



The above cut is about one-third larger than actual size, but no drawing or description can do it justice. It is seen only to be admired by all. Col. Ingersoll says: "Your Freethought badge is beautiful and expressiv. I have shown it to many and all agree with me that it is the best badge that has been made." It graphically symbolizes the world's transition from the night of superstition to an age illuminated by the light of Reason, Science, and Freethought. It is intended to, and, no doubt, soon will be, a popular emblem of recognition among progressiv minds throughout the world, and a potent agent in advancing the grand cause of mental reform and toleration.

Solid gold, beautifully enameled in contrasting shades. Prices, $3.00, $3.50, $4.00, and $10.00—latter with genuin diamond representing sun. 10 per cent discount in lots of 6; 15 per cent in lots of 12 or more. Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

ORTHODOXY teaches that man was created in a state of morsl perfection; in the especial image of his maker; free from sin; not subjected to death; endowed with a conscience showing him the difference between right and wrong. From this state of perfection he fell into what we know he has been in past times by a single act of transgression, and has again elevated only by the supernatural interference of his maker. On the theory of evolution, man was not created at all, in any sense in which the word has ever been understood. Indeed, there never was any personal Adam, the human race being simply the descendants of an improved race of apes. Originally man had no more conscience than his brute progenitors, and right, wrong, or morality applied no more to his actions than to those of the tiger. If he was free from sin, it was only for the same reason that the lower animals are free from it: because no conscience told him the distinction between right and wrong. Conscience was a gradual growth from such small beginnings as we now see in the domestic dog, and never attained such a development as it now has among men The progress of man, though frequently stationary with certain races and during long periods of time, has, on the whole, been steadily upward, by virtue of the primeval laws of nature itself. Death was in the world from the beginning of life, and was inherited by man from the brute. In one word, the theory of evolution pronounced the whole theological doctrin of the origin and fall of man to be a fiction as complete as anything in pagan mythology.—North American Review, December, 1879.
